The committee studied the proposals, which were tabled in the Senate on February 2, and as a result of that study a slight amendment was made to the proposal relating to the Tax Review Board Act. In addition to the proposals then submitted, three further proposals were submitted to the committee, the first of which was to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act. That amendment, I think, is clear. The various government departments have to report to Parliament through an appropriate minister. There was an oversight, in that the Auditor General does not report through a minister, and the proposed amendment simply provides that a minister may be designated through whom a report can be made by the Auditor General in relation to the Canadian Human Rights Act.

The second proposed amendment was to the Citizenship Act, again to correct an oversight—an oversight which, I must admit, I found rather surprising. The Citizenship Act, as amended last year, provides that a person shall not be granted citizenship or administered the oath of citizenship if during the three-year period immediately preceding the date of his application he has been convicted of an indictable offence. There is no provision to cover the case where the individual was convicted of an offence in the period between applying for citizenship and the granting of citizenship. The proposed amendment would correct that oversight.

There is also a proposed amendment to the Small Loans Act. This amendment is necessary—and the committee, after hearing the evidence, agreed that it was necessary—in order to restore the long-standing interpretation of part of the definition of the word “loan” which has been followed by the Department of Insurance since 1940. Apparently, a recent judicial decision cast some doubts on that interpretation, and this amendment would correct that.

Those are the three additions to the proposals which were submitted to the committee. The committee, in considering these proposals, heard from officials of the Department of Justice, the Chairman of the Tax Review Board, and the Superintendent of Insurance.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask two questions of the Chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee.

I understood him to say that a decision had been made, contrary to former practice, to refer certain proposals, which would form the subject matter of a contemplated bill, to the Senate. Do I understand that this is a change in procedure and practice? If so, it would seem to be a very important following of a precedent that has been set by one of our other committees.

Secondly, were all of the proposals suggested referred to the committee, or were there only the three to which the chairman referred?

[Senator Goldenberg.]

Senator Goldenberg: All of the proposals suggested were referred to the committee, and we heard evidence respecting those proposals on which we thought evidence was necessary.

With respect to the first question, I am advised that the procedure followed last year in respect of the first bill was unique, and that the procedure adopted this year is a further change and is also unique, in that the proposals are submitted first to the Senate committee, and then the recommendations of the Senate committee will be embodied in the bill which in due course will be submitted to the House of Commons.

Senator Grosart: May I ask whose decision it was to make this unique change in the practice of the Department of Justice?

Senator Goldenberg: I would assume the change was made on the advice of the Department of Justice, but I have no further information on that.

Senator Grosart: Where did the reference to the Senate committee come from originally? In what form was the reference to the committee made?

Senator Goldenberg: As I recall it, the government leader tabled these proposals on February 2, 1978. I am confident that my memory does not fail me when I say that he did not say where they came from. He just tabled the proposals together with other documents which he tabled that day, but at the same time he asked that they be referred to the committee.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps the Leader of the Government would help to explain this. I am not in any way critical. I think it is an important recognition of the work of the Senate that this has been done. Perhaps the Leader of the Government would tell us who made the decision. Did the idea that we should expand the procedure of the past of having proposals which are to be incorporated in legislation referred to the Senate in advance of the bills emanate from the government or from the Department of Justice? If this is a decision to utilize another committee of the Senate in this important way, it is a quite significant one.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the thought that it should be tabled in this chamber was first advanced by the Honourable the Minister of Justice in a communication I had from him.

Senator Flynn: With the approval of the Deputy Prime Minister?

Senator Perrault: I am afraid I cannot describe the scenario beyond that, but I understand that the Minister of Justice is quite cooperative in these matters and I think it is a practice which should be continued.

Senator Flynn: But you had to have leave from Mr. MacEachen.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I read this report with great interest, I need hardly say. I regret very much that some means was not found by the committee of calling attention to what I think is an error—a non-controversial error, I hope—an inadvertent error, I hope—in the Appendices to the Revised Statutes, where we have the British North America Act printed in both languages.

Some time ago, when the Revised Statutes came out, I was running through this and I discovered that in section 93 of the British North America Act, dealing with education, the English text is reproduced correctly but the French version, the French translation which appears in the adjoining column, has a rather peculiar omission, as it seems to me.

Honourable senators will recall that the section begins:

In and for each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to Education—

And so on.

In the volume compiled by the late Law Clerk of the House of Commons, M. Maurice Ollivier, "British North America Acts and Selected Statutes," in the French version which I have upstairs in my office the wording is: "dans chaque province et pour chaque province la législation . . ." but in the French version in the Appendices to the Revised Statutes it appears simply as: "Dans chaque province . . .". There is no translation of "and for each province."

It seems to me that this is at least unfortunate; and it is possible that it might have some serious consequences, especially in the light of the fact that Senator Hicks, I think, has mentioned, and Professor J. A. Corry, a former principal of Queen's University, has argued, that the words "and for each province" may have some constitutional significance and may indicate that there are certain aspects of education which fall within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, under the well-known "aspects" doctrine of interpreting the Constitution enunciated by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Hodge v. The Queen, if my memory serves.

I call attention to this error in the French translation—and it seems to me a palpable error in the French translation—of section 93 of the British North America Act in the Appendices to the Revised Statutes. I very much regret that I did not think of this when the committee was sitting and turn up at the committee, of which of course I am not a member, and mention the matter.

Senator Flynn: These are Revised Statutes of 1970?

Senator Forsey: Yes. I might add for the information of honourable senators a curiosity. I called up the Department of Justice people about this at the time the Revised Statutes of 1970 appeared, and I was referred to a Mrs. Somebody, whose name I have forgotten but who I was told was in charge of this, and when I called her she said, "I am sorry, but I don't understand French."

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I do not think Senator Forsey can blame the committee for having failed to consider a proposal which was not before it. These proposals contain amendments which were suggested for inclusion by government departments, by senators and by members of the House of Commons. If Senator Forsey had recommended that that be included in the proposals, I assure him that no committee of which I am chairman would be prejudiced to the degree of refusing to consider his recommendation.

Senator Forsey: I have already assumed a white sheet, and said that I should have been there and made the point.

Senator Flynn: I would have given you a good answer.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, February 23, 1978

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. McKinley had been substituted for that of Mr. Baldwin on the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979, together with copies of a news release containing a statement by the President of the Treasury Board on the said Estimates and a booklet entitled "Federal Expenditure Plan: How your tax dollar is spent".

Copies of Reports of the Anti-Inflation Board to the Governor in Council, pursuant to section 17(2) of the Anti-Inflation Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada, 1974-75-76, reporting its reference to the administrator of the said Act of certain proposed changes in compensation plans, as follows:

1. Northern Transportation Co. Ltd. and the Public Service Alliance of Canada, dated February 17, 1978.
2. Abex Industries Ltd. and its hourly paid Production and Maintenance Group, dated February 17, 1978.

THE ESTIMATES

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending the 31st March 1979, in advance of bills based upon the said estimates reaching the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, February 28, 1978, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, in advising you on our prospects for next week, I shall deal first with the committees.

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance plans to meet at 10.00 a.m. on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and perhaps also on Thursday to consider its report on the estimates of the Department of Public Works with respect to the accommodation program of that department. It is expected that the meetings on both Monday and Tuesday will continue in the afternoon. All of these meetings will be in camera.

The Special Joint Committee on the National Capital Region will meet on Tuesday at 3.30 p.m. and the Subcommittee on Health, Welfare and Science on Childhood Experiences has called a meeting for 4.00 p.m. on that day.

The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will hear witnesses on the subject matter of Bill C-13, the Combines Investigation Act, on Wednesday at 9.30 a.m. Also on Wednesday, when the Senate rises, the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee will consider Bill S-7, to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Lucien Roch Joseph Morin and Marie Rose Hélène Morin.

In the Senate, in addition to the items already before us, I believe we will receive another bill next week for introduction here in the first instance, and, of course, we are still looking for the Bank Extension Act. It would appear that this bill will reach us next week.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN SENATE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Flynn, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Yuzyk be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Bélisle on the list of senators serving on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that house accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

BENEFITS FROM EXCHANGE RATE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR— QUESTION

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate arising out of the very violent outbursts that followed the government's move to support the Canadian dollar after it had gone below 90 cents U.S. My question is: does the Leader of the Government feel that 90 cents is an appropriate level for the Canadian dollar under the present economic circumstances in Canada?

I can say to him that grain farmers are happy with the 90-cent dollar. It has added 35 cents a bushel to the price of wheat.

The Agriculture Committee brought in a report on the beef situation. The members of the committee asked for a five-cent tariff on beef.

My question is this: Does the Leader of the Government not agree that a dollar depreciated by ten per cent has given the beef producers five cents a pound on beef, and that this is one of the things which flow from this policy which are beneficial to the economy?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Senator Argue is using the pretext of a question in order to make a speech. I would suggest the answer the Leader of the Government can give to him is that the Senate has no choice but to accept the 90-cent dollar at this time.

Senator Perrault: The honourable leader knows more about the rules of the Senate than to suggest that in any way his is a valid point of order. It may well be that he will have an opportunity in the near future to explain to the people of Canada some of his party's policies regarding the dollar and other matters.

Senator Flynn: I rise on a point of order. The answer is also out of order.

Senator Perrault: Again that is no valid point of order and, Senator Flynn's views to the contrary, is in contravention of any rules that we have here.

Honourable senators, the so-called 90-cent dollar is certainly of real value to the exporting industries of this nation, and in many areas of endeavor it has provided opportunities for Canadians to become more competitive.

Senator Flynn: Does the Leader of the Government suggest that this is an ideal situation and that we should have a 90-cent dollar? Is it a permanent policy of the government to keep the dollar at 90 cents?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the fact is that Canada has produced one of the best economic performances of any nation in the world in the past ten years. The difficulties that we have experienced with the purchasing power of our dollar and inflation are minuscule in comparison with the experience of most other nations competing in the world today. However, I think that many Canadians are increasingly concerned with the continuing efforts by the opposition in this country to denigrate efforts by the Government of Canada to turn around the economy and provide a decent standard of living.

Senator Flynn: Do I gather from the long answer of the leader that the 90-cent dollar was an objective of the government, and that it is very happy to have achieved it?

Senator Perrault: As certain members of the honourable senator's own party have pointed out frequently—

Senator Flynn: Answer my question.

Senator Perrault: As certain members of the honourable senator's own party have pointed out frequently, there are advantages to having a dollar valued between 90 and 95 cents in terms of our competitive position in the world. I well recall when the Leader of the Opposition was a member of the Privy Council in a Conservative government in years past, that government, too, defended the value of having a dollar in the range of 90 to 95 cents as a great boost to Canada's competitive position. This is an argument which I think they should be reminded of today in view of their very critical attitude with respect to the present situation.

Senator Flynn: Does the Leader of the Government remember what his party said during that time and during the election campaign? What they said they said irresponsibly, just to win the election and to keep the dollar at 92½ cents.

Senator Perrault: Is the honourable senator thereby suggesting that the attack he makes today is irresponsible?

Senator Flynn: No, I am not. There was no attack. It was merely a question. I rose on a point of privilege. The leader is distorting the words I uttered. I asked a simple question, but the leader was unwilling to reply to it frankly.

Senator Langlois: Don't impute motive.

Senator Flynn: There was no motive; I was being very objective.

NATIONAL SECURITY

SOCAN AIRCRAFT LIMITED—POSSIBLE APPEARANCE OF PRESIDENT BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I have another question for the Leader of the Government. It arises out of the statement that Socan Aircraft Limited of Calgary is a completely or largely Soviet-owned company operating in Canada, and the suggestion that the federal government may be monitoring this company to make certain that none of its profits will be used to finance KGB activities in Canada or to support extremist elements. This is a statement made in the other place by Tom Cossitt.

My question arises out of a news item in the Ottawa Citizen of February 18 that Arthur Smith of Calgary, President of Socan Aircraft Limited, and a former member of Parliament, had informed Opposition Leader Joe Clark by telegram that he was seeking "a public apology to the company and to myself as a former MP." The news item continues:

In his message to Clark, Smith said he was requesting an appearance before the Conservative caucus because there was no other tribunal before which he could appear to deal with Cossitt's statements.

I notice that the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs is not in the house at the moment, and therefore I am addressing my question to the Leader of the Government. Is it the leader's opinion that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs is an appropriate body before which Mr. Arthur Smith might appear? Apparently he has been denied an audience elsewhere and he does not know that this forum might be available to him, as it has been available to others who have had grievances in the past.

● (1415)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the proposal seems to have at least some degree of merit. I suggest that the honourable senator confer with the distinguished Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I know that all senators in this chamber would wish to give people with legitimate grievances a full opportunity to be heard in this country, regardless of their party and affiliation.

Senator Flynn: A good joke on both sides.

Senator Argue: Only Conservatives involved.

ESTONIA

SIXTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE PROCLAMATION OF INDEPENDENCE

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, with leave I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to the sixtieth anniversary of the Free Republic of Estonia.

I do this for several reasons. The first is that the Senate has always had an interest in minorities across this country. Many senators are fully aware of the large number of compatriots from not only Estonia but the other two Baltic countries.

I do so also because next Wednesday, as many senators are aware, the Baltic Federation will be hosting us at one of their usually very wonderful affairs in the Parliament Buildings.

I do it as well because I think every senator is aware of the history of this small republic, and of the fact that, after a long history of bondage, sixty years ago they achieved independence, during which time, through social and labour legislation, they pioneered many great achievements with their small nation. They later had a constitutional convention at which they refined their parliamentary institutions. I suggest to the Senate that it is worthy of our consideration that we should study that new constitution, under which minority interests were represented in their institutions.

[Senator Argue.]

I think all honourable senators will, with me, recognize the extraordinary ability and will of free men, given the opportunity to decide their own constitution and their own destiny. All of us will, with regret, recognize that the period of independence for that little republic lasted only twenty years and now suffers under occupation.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

Senator Adams: Honourable senators, I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to the presence in our gallery of Mr. Peter Tatty and Melinda Tatty, who both work for Rankin Inlet Hamlet Council.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Daniel A. Lang moved the second reading of Bill S-9, to implement an agreement between Canada and Malaysia and conventions between Canada and Spain, Canada and Liberia, Canada and Australia and Canada and Italy for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

He said: Honourable senators, I recall very well that two years ago, in February 1976, I had the honour of introducing Bill S-32 on second reading. My recollections of that experience are not altogether pleasurable, inasmuch as the contribution by the opposition, led by Senator Grosart, consisted of a question period for me that lasted about thirty minutes.

I hope that those same questions will not be repeated today with the intensity and degree of perception which Senator Grosart exhibited at that time. I am somewhat relieved to find that he is absent from the chamber this afternoon.

I mention that because what we have in Bill S-9 is merely a continuation of a program under the direction of the Minister of Finance to bring about a revision of old tax conventions and the introduction of new tax conventions, which program will probably extend into the future for a considerable length of time.

Honourable senators may recall that in 1976, Bill S-32 introduced a tax convention between Canada, on the one hand, and France and Belgium and Israel, on the other.

In June of 1977, Senator Hicks moved second reading of Bill C-12, which was a counterpart of the bill of the previous year. That bill involved tax conventions between Morocco, Pakistan, Singapore, the Philippines, the Dominican Republic and Switzerland, on the one hand, and Canada, on the other.

We have before us today Bill S-9, which involves conventions between Canada, on the one hand, and Malaysia, Spain, Liberia, Austria and Italy, on the other.

As I have already mentioned, this program of revising the 16 tax treaties that were in effect on January 1, 1972—namely, the date of our tax reform bill—and implementing conventions with countries with whom we had no accord at that time, has been going on apace, until today we have 23 conventions in place. Some are revised conventions that were in effect prior to 1972, and some are new conventions that postdate our so-called tax reform enactments.

I can add very little to what was contributed to the debate on this subject matter by my colleagues in 1976 and in June of last year, and I would not want to bore honourable senators with repetition.

The bill follows exactly the same pattern as the previous enactments. It is like its forerunners in form. It is a massive tome, as honourable senators who have the bill on their desk will see. Of approximately 132 pages, 125 make up the conventions themselves. The enactment provisions comprise the first seven pages of the bill.

Within the enactment sections—which are in turn divided into five parts, each enacting the convention with each of the five countries—there is another part which applies in common to all five conventions.

Part VI of the enacting part of the bill deals with the mechanism providing amendments to the conventions after this bill becomes law. This gives the Governor in Council the power to approve and bring into force amendments, subject only to the necessity of tabling those changes in Parliament within 15 days after they are enacted by order in council, and thereafter those amendments remain in force unless revoked by Parliament within another 15 days.

This is an important provision in that it reserves to Parliament the power to curb the executive authority in respect of such tax matters. It is not a new provision. It is the same provision that appeared in Bill S-32, and the other.

The five tax treaties contained in this measure are, in form, very much like the ones we have dealt with previously. They follow the general draft treaty schedules produced by OECD. We depart from the OECD model in connection with withholding tax rates, particularly on dividends, interest and royalties.

In general, the main withholding tax provision is to limit that tax to 15 per cent. In the case of the treaty between Canada and Malaysia, as Malaysia has no withholding tax we accord them a reciprocal provision.

There are also provisions in the bill exempting certain forms of what I refer to as development incentives; that is, if a less developed nation offers a tax incentive to encourage pioneer industries, those tax incentives will not be taken into account by Canada in computing the reciprocal privileges, thus preserving the advantage for Canadian companies from a tax point of view when operating abroad.

As in previous bills of this type, there is also provision concerning withholding tax on royalties. With Malaysia, for instance, the rate is 15 per cent; with Liberia, 15 per cent, and, in certain instances, it is 20 per cent. But, as is general with Western European countries such as Spain, Austria and Italy, there is no withholding tax on royalties which are basically defined as payments for the use of artistic and cultural copy-right matters.

Dealing with the capital gains aspect, Canada, of course, did not have a capital gains tax until January 1, 1972. These conventions merely recognize the right of the source country to tax these gains, such as those arising out of the sale of real property, business assets, and shares in real estate companies—basically, the immovable concept in international law.

The non-discrimination provisions, as we have hitherto seen in the like bills, is again reincorporated. However, as heretofore we do exempt from the non-discrimination provisions our right in Canada to treat Canadian nationals in a special way in connection with, say, dividend tax credits and other fiscal incentives which we felt necessary to promote our own industrial infrastructure.

Senator Hicks will be pleased to see that in these treaties there is no special concession given for bringing in from abroad teachers or professors.

As is fundamental to all of these bills, there is the provision for relief from double taxation in the hands of the two contracting parties. I do not intend to elaborate on that, because it is a self-evident objective and one with which we are most familiar.

In the last bill, which Senator Hicks dealt with at some length, we had what the department referred to as the "tax sparing provision," which is rather interesting from a technical point of view because it means that, if a foreign country provides tax incentives to set up business there, we in Canada will not take that into account in applying the provisions of the convention. In other words, we preserve that incentive.

I could go further into many of the aspects of these conventions, but I would not be adding anything to what was said in this house during the debate on the previous tax convention bills last year and the year before.

The general provisions are almost exactly the same as in the previous bills. The rates on withholding tax on dividends vary slightly from country to country, but the principles involved are almost precisely the same.

There is one unusual aspect to this bill, however, in respect of the convention with Italy. I am sure it will be of great interest to Italo-Canadians to note that incorporated in this convention is an exemption of pensions up to $10,000 a year paid from either Canada to Italy or, reciprocally, from Italy to Canada. I am glad to see this provision incorporated, because one of the great sources of strength and character in the city of Toronto is our vital Italo-Canadian population. Regretfully, I rather assume from this exemption that many of these people, when they retire, return to sunny Italy rather than face the ferocious climate of our Canadian winter. This was recently a matter of interest in the press, and it is now incorporated in the convention and will become law, if, as and when Parliament passes this bill.

Honourable senators, I commend the principle of this bill to you. If it is the wish of this house, I will refer the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Before doing that, I should point out that the bill in 1976 was referred to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee because it was primarily a tax matter within the peculiar expertise of that committee; on the other hand, the bill of 1977 was not referred to committee at all. I will therefore reserve a motion to that effect until I have your opinions.

Senator Laird: Honourable senators, on that particular point may I ask the sponsor a simple question? Other than what he has stated, is there a difference between these and other tax conventions that would make it necessary for the bill to be the subject of a committee study?

Senator Lang: As I explained, the only way in which this bill differs from previous ones is in respect of the rates of withholding tax as, for example, between 10 per cent and 15 per cent on royalties, interest and dividends. It is not a matter of substance, but really a matter of rate. The only major distinction is in connection with the provisions for pension transfers between Canada and Italy.

Senator Laird: In that case, I do not believe it necessary to refer the bill to committee.

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, I would like to congratulate the sponsor of the bill for his clear explanation. However, I know that he enjoys listening to the sagacity and wisdom of Senator Grosart, on whose behalf I now move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Bélisle, for Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

THE ECONOMY

EXCHANGE RATE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, February 21, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Austin calling the attention of the Senate to the situation with respect to the Canadian dollar, the floating exchange rate and its relevance to the Canadian economy.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: First of all, I should like to congratulate Senator Austin for his excellent presentation to the Senate last Tuesday. I listened with great interest to the outline of our colleague on the economic policies which, in Canada, have important consequences for our long and short term future, results that depend on the state of the Canadian dollar, the floating rate of exchange and their repercussions on the Canadian economy.

The suggestion of Senator Austin to refer the problem of our national economic policy to a Senate committee, which could make recommendations, deserves our serious consideration. For my part, in a few moments I shall discuss its deserving aspects as I see them.

The committee Senator Austin has suggested should study the matter is our Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce; it could indeed perform the task very competently.

[Senator Lang]

It would certainly not decline to do so because of its rather heavy schedule. Still, others believe that our Standing Committee on National Finance could also carry out the task very well. As for me, I wonder which of the two, by virtue of its definition and its functions, would be better qualified to undertake the study.

I should like to consider some of the points of view of Senator Austin.

The economic problems of Canada, including the state of the Canadian dollar and its floating rate, are not that different from those that were experienced, in turn, in almost all developed countries. Such situations always call for somewhat similar comments and remedies.

Senator Austin mentioned the position of our dollar in relation to the American dollar, which of course most affects our country. I believe that a lower value of the Canadian dollar in relation to the American dollar is now of great importance for the development of our international trade. I also believe it is now important that the money of our international customers can purchase our Canadian money at a good discount to buy our national products aimed at the export trade, since this can also reduce unemployment in Canada through substantially increased production. We must recognize that our government cannot be absolutely sure that the depreciation of the Canadian dollar can be a permanent solution to the rather complex commercial problems of our country. This would certainly not be in the interests of Canada at the moment. At another time, this would not be so because other factors would affect the situation.

In spite of our anti-inflationary policies, which I have sometimes criticized in this house, I must note that from June 1974 to June 1977 the factors which greatly affect monetary values resulted in the following inflation rates in industrialized countries: West Germany 15.7 per cent, the United States 23.6 per cent, Canada 28.2 per cent, France 34.4 per cent, Japan 34.5 per cent, Italy 62.6 per cent and Great Britain 68.9 per cent. The Canadian situation was therefore certainly quite acceptable and it was even considered enviable in some countries.

As for me, in the final analysis, I consider that our situation is reasonable in this sector of our economy. I also believe that it is in the interests of Canada to maintain the value of the Canadian dollar below the value of the American dollar which is now floating below the currency of several other industrialized countries in accordance with the present policy of depreciation of the American dollar, which aims at better establishing the international competitive situation of the United States.

Since the end of the monetary agreements of Bretton Woods, which established an accepted basis among its members for international exchange payments, the developed countries are witnessing a stagnation of their exchanges and monetary values. Band-aid solutions were not sufficient to establish order in the world monetary system. The American monetary values went down and, for the reasons already mentioned, Canadian monetary values slumped further, which once more resulted in a good Canadian competitive position on foreign markets and a favourable position for our exports.

I do not feel this should be a cause of anxiety or concern for Canadians. It is my view that the situation arising from the dollar devaluation is more in the nature of a correction of an unfavourable position that tended to get worse and harm our foreign trade still further. Let us remember the favourable effects for Britain of the last devaluation of the pound.

Right now I do not feel that the Bank of Canada's role is to re-peg the Canadian dollar. Its proper role in my view right now is mainly to follow the monetary system and ensure that in this country's best interest the Canadian dollar reach and maintain a level somewhat lower than the American dollar, for reasons of international competition on foreign markets. It would be unrealistic and most unwise to panic. I am convinced that right now we should get ready to take full advantage of the coming boost in international trade. A number of major countries, including Japan, are preparing for it in silence, and indeed in secret. I believe that our government departments, with their roles in our economy, are justified in preparing themselves for substantial advances in the economy and our national prosperity. The private sector is preparing also. Renewed confidence in the business community will trigger a new impetus that will gradually bring about the Canadian dollar recovery.

[English]

The reference made by Senator Austin to the growth in Canadian personal income of 38 per cent, taking into account today's weaker dollar, compared to 17 per cent in the United States, is dramatic. Canada has all the ingredients necessary for the initiation of a rate of national economic growth that would be hard to equal anywhere in the world. The Province of Quebec will not cause that much damage to the federal economy. We shall find that common sense will prevail everywhere in Canada.

There has been so much said about allowing the Canadian dollar to float. Some years ago, the federal government supported the dollar at a certain level. The economic custom in a great many of the developed countries was to let the value of their currencies float. This became a sort of rule in the international monetary system. Most countries did very little of what was called "dirty float." Very little, if any at all, was really done by Canada.

Responsible economists have recommended the use of the floating system for currency in constant use. The bankers have recommended the floating of the Canadian dollar as the best and most realistic policy for our economy. The Bank of Canada believes this policy recognizes the stable approach to real money values. I am not certain that the floating Canadian dollar encourages speculation, as is sometimes affirmed. Actually, there is very little evidence of this, and, as was rightly said, Canada's economic policy is firmly committed to the principle of the free floating exchange rate which reveals economic advantages and which excludes political considerations. It would be, in my own opinion, a mistake to change it. I believe the inquiry would reveal just that.

In the Fourteenth Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada, Recommendation No. 4, at page 91, is:

We recommend that the federal government, together with representative organizations, establish appropriate advisory and consultative mechanisms (with adequate staff resources) to examine serious long term structural issues.

The suggestion of Senator Austin seems to me to meet this recommendation. The Senate, as an important part of Parliament, would, I believe, be well advised to analyze and review the situation with respect to the Canadian dollar, the floating rate of exchange and its relevance to the Canadian economy. It is suggested that the committee to be assigned this study is the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, but, as I said before, some believe it should be the National Finance Committee. Both of these committees are well qualified for this task.

Honourable senators, I strongly support an in-depth inquiry into the situation with respect to the Canadian dollar, the floating exchange rate and its relevance to the Canadian economy, so that Canadians will be well informed on the present economic policies of Canada.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, it was not my intention to participate in this debate, because it is usually unnecessary, in economic matters, to add to the excellent presentations made by Senator Desruisseaux. However, I am prompted, by the incredible line of questions by the Leader of the Opposition a few minutes ago, to rise on this occasion to make it quite clear on the record that nothing that is happening at the moment involves the Canadian government in an attempt to peg the Canadian dollar anywhere.

I was rather surprised that the Leader of the Opposition, for whom I have the highest regard—and I am sorry he is not present at this moment—was not better informed, and that he followed the rather specious arguments that his friends in the other place made yesterday. The Minister of Finance has done nothing more than is done by nearly all countries in the world that have a floating currency, which is to intervene in the marketplace with sufficient funds to maintain an orderly float, and that is all. We are not pegging the dollar. We floated the dollar in 1970—I think it was Mr. Mitchell Sharp who was then the minister—and it has been the policy of the Canadian government to keep the Canadian dollar floating since that time. We did not endeavour to peg it at $1.03. I think it was then too high in value, but that was induced by borrowings by provinces, and other things.

From an export point of view, as the Leader of the Government has already pointed out, it is to our advantage to have the value of the dollar go down, as it has, but the government has not dictated that it go down, has not directed that it go down, and has not stated that it should go down to 90 cents, or 95 cents, or 92 cents. The government has simply supported the concept of a floating dollar. I support the government entirely in that, and I say that it is the only intelligent manner in which we can act at the present juncture of events in the world. I can give you an example of a government that for a short time did not intervene to maintain an orderly market for its currency. I refer, of course, to the United States government. Before Christmas, and when the outcry became so loud about the completely disorderly way in which the American dollar was behaving with regard to the European currencies, Mr. Blumenthal was forced to change his mind and enter the marketplace to regulate the float.

What has happened is only a regulation of the float, and has nothing to do with pegging the dollar. I am surprised that the opposition does not understand that.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to participate in this debate initiated by Senator Austin, for several reasons. While I congratulate him on the exposé he made of the situation in Canada with respect to where the Canadian dollar now is, and perhaps how it got there, I am not sure that I am in favour of setting up a committee at this time to inquire into the reasons for this situation, because I am afraid it may have a tendency to add to a crisis situation that some people in this country seem to think the 90-cent dollar has created for Canadians. Quite frankly, I do not believe we have a crisis with respect to the dollar. It seems to me that if we refer this matter to a committee, the action may be interpreted by the public as meaning that this chamber believes there is a crisis that needs immediate investigation.

I believe that the benefits that have flowed to Canada from the devaluation of the dollar in the international marketplace far outweigh the disadvantages to some people in the country. An inquiry as to who are the winners and who are the losers as a result of the change in the value of the dollar might be useful for educational purposes, and certainly an investigation of the many questions Senator Austin raised about how this change in the value of the dollar could affect certain sectors of our economy could be a useful exercise. I also think that the general public should have a better understanding of why the value of the dollar changes from time to time, particularly in relation to the United States dollar. But I want to emphasize that I do not believe we are in a crisis situation.

As a matter of fact, I believe that an adjustment in the value of these two currencies was probably overdue by the time it happened. Our prices and costs in terms of Canadian dollars, if they are to be at par with United States dollars, had risen to the point where they were causing some difficulties in Canada. The most appropriate measure to be taken was the setting of a more realistic value as between these two currencies. Since the change has taken place, although it happened rather suddenly, there has certainly been an improvement in the export position of many of our commodities which, I am sure all senators will agree, has been of value to Canada.

A few minutes ago during the Question Period, Senator Argue said that the grain farmers on the prairies certainly welcome this change in the value of our dollar to 90 cents because it improves their position relative to other sellers in the international market. Certainly, the people involved in producing beef realize that the change has improved their position significantly in relation to the United States. While I cannot speak with great experience or authority for other commodities, I am sure they have done equally well, particularly those of our primary producers.

Honourable senators, although it may appear very complex, it can be reduced to a very simple fact. We have increased our whole price structure in Canada at a rate more rapid than in the United States, and certainly at a different time. The change that has come from the international market place is simply a reflection of that fact.

At the same time we must also agree that Canada is in an almost unique position insofar as the industrialized nations are concerned, in that there are other factors, such as foreign investment, which influence the value of the Canadian dollar significantly when, in fact, other costs such as the cost of processing and raw materials would have adjusted the difference in value. We get these distortions from time to time because of the high percentage of foreign investment coming into Canada at times. We have to recognize that this does happen from time to time.

For example, when the Canadian dollar was valued higher than the United States dollar, there was no reason for that to happen on the basis of merchandise or commodity trade between the two nations. It happened, first of all, because of foreign investment in the private sector at a very high level, and also because of very large borrowings, particularly by provincial governments, in the United States which created a demand in the international marketplace for Canadian dollars, and therefore pushed the price up.

There is one other thing which I think is important to recall during the course of this debate, and that is that about four or five years ago the inflation rate and unemployment levels in the United States were going up much more rapidly than in Canada. I can remember Canadians, and particularly the government, being rather proud of the fact that their inflation rate and unemployment rate were lower at that time. I think it is clearer now in retrospect—and, of course, everyone's wisdom is greater in retrospect—that these things do, in fact, catch up with you.

Wage demands, for example, continued at much higher levels than in the United States, particularly after the inflation pressure had slowed down in the United States, and certainly our inflation pressure, and therefore our costs for all of the things that go into manufacturing, did, in fact, go on longer than it did in the United States. Consequently, we find ourselves in this position today.

Honourable senators, I hope that we can get through this problem because it really is almost an automatic adjustment that is taking place. When the dollar goes down in value, as it has, it increases our exports and makes us more competitive in the international market, particularly in the United States market. It also decreases our imports to some extent because they become more expensive.

The general public ought to know that there have been times when we have been living a little beyond our means. Our standard of living rose a little bit too high, and a great deal of it was based on commodities and merchandise that were of the imported variety. Sooner or later that does catch up with you. I say that because there are some good and, I think, substantial economic reasons why we find ourselves in this situation today, in addition to the political instability that is perceived by some people outside Canada.

I heard the Minister of Finance last night suggest that one of the problems he runs into from people involved in the major United States money market is uncertainty about the political stability of Canada. I think that this adjustment in the value of our dollar vis-à-vis the United States was due with or without what happened in Quebec on November 15, 1976. I am sure that it may cause some additional difficulties—psychological difficulties, if you like—but our trade and our costs were such that in straight economic terms, without any political overtones at all, a revaluation or a devaluation of the Canadian dollar was required.

The minister has announced that he is going to intervene in the market from time to time with the $1.5 billion standby credit he has arranged. He made it completely clear, so far as I am concerned, that there was only one reason why he or the Bank of Canada would intervene. Senator van Roggen has already alluded to this. Making sure that the market does in fact work to set the value of the dollar from time to time has to be done in an orderly way. Therefore, if there are extreme movements, which really are not true movements but are distorted movements caused by speculation, the government and the central bank will intervene temporarily from time to time to even out some speculative action. I think that is a proper and responsible action for the government and the Bank of Canada to take periodically.

One other reason that the Minister of Finance drew to the attention of Parliament and the country was that there has been a significant withdrawal from the international money market by the provinces and their agencies. This, of course, does indeed cause some problems, because the international market becomes uneasy and does not adjust well to extreme changes in the flows. Not very many years ago the provincial governments and their agencies—such as Quebec Hydro, Ontario Hydro and many other large provincial crown corporations—were borrowing massive amounts of money, bringing it into Canada, and when that borrowing slowed down significantly, and in some cases almost stopped, there was, of course, a distortion of the usual pattern in that market. Again, I believe that the federal government has a responsibility to take up some of that slack so that we do not have a disorderly change in the market from time to time.

Foreign investment in Canada is, of course, a mixed blessing and curse. We appreciate it because in many cases it provides additional investment in manufacturing plants, creates new jobs and so on, but it also bolsters the Canadian dollar. However, somewhere down the road it has to be paid back, and it has to be paid back with interest, and sometimes with dividends—at least, that is the hope when the investment is made. That is another problem Canada is now facing, that a very large part of the money going out of Canada is to make these interest and dividend payments on investment that was made in Canada many years ago.

I am sure it was the hope of the government then, and still is, that the expansion in our economic activity as a result of foreign investment would put us in a position where we would be able to earn or create sufficient money in Canada to take care of those foreign interest and dividend commitments without difficulty. However, this also happens to be one of those eras when almost all of the industrial nations are having some economic difficulty, so our foreign account payments for interest and dividends loom very large at the same time as these other problems.

Therefore, I do not view with complete distaste—if that is the right word—a slowdown in foreign investment in Canada. I think it would be difficult if we had sudden changes, as we have experienced with some other factors, but I think that sooner or later we have to face the fact that a continually high level of foreign investment in Canada that is not matched by an increase in economic activity and earnings, so that we can pay it back comfortably, is probably not a desirable thing over a long period of time.

I should like to add, honourable senators, that for its educational value I think this inquiry is a good thing, but I have mixed feelings about the whole matter being sent to a committee now. If it is indeed referred to a committee on the basis that we perceive some kind of crisis in Canada because our dollar has decreased in value by 10 per cent, I am afraid that that would, in fact, exacerbate the problem rather than help it.

Senator Bell: I wonder if I might ask Senator Desruisseaux a question? Alternatively, perhaps Senator Austin could reply. Is there a quarterly analysis of the money supply? Perhaps that could be correlated with the consumer price index over, say, the period of the last three or four years. Do you know if there is such an analysis?

Senator Desruisseaux: I believe there is. I recall seeing it, but I cannot pin it down. I think the government publishes those statistics, and possibly Senator Austin will have looked at them in preparing his speech. I believe it is among the information that is important to those who are responsible for the rate of exchange of the Canadian dollar. Other than that I have very little knowledge of the subject. I have not seen the last one.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I would supplement Senator Desruisseaux's answer by saying that those figures certainly exist. Senator Bell's question goes to the heart of monetarist theory. The relationship is something that is not yet well understood, but the monetarists believe that is one of the significant areas of focus for policy. If honourable senators agree to refer the subject of this inquiry to a committee, the committee could well look into the question.

Would honourable senators permit me to address myself for a moment to the remarks of Senator Olson? I believe Senator Olson and I are on all fours with respect to the issues in play.

Senator Everett: Is the honourable senator closing the debate?

Senator Austin: No. I am asking for permission to make a comment during the debate.

Senator Bélisle: I shall be adjourning the debate.

Senator Austin: I apologize to Senator Olson if I did not make it clear in my speech that I was in no way considering we had a crisis. This is, as Senator van Roggen said, a normal event in the system of the floating dollar. However, I do suggest that over a period of time, and in a deliberate way, we should investigate these issues so that the Canadian people, businesses and others affected in Canada, can be better informed about the way in which that system operates.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I had not intended to take part in the debate at this point, but the superb presentation of Senator Desruisseaux and the points raised in the excellent speech of Senator Olson cause me to say a few words.

I find myself in agreement with Senator Olson in his view that, while this is a most interesting subject, it is also an extremely complex one, and one which cannot be isolated from the rest of economic policy. We cannot just look at the exchange rate policy. We must also look at the effects of monetary and fiscal policy.

What we are really talking about here is a major economic study. I might say parenthetically, in reply to Senator Bell's question about the money supply figures, that they are published every week by the Bank of Canada; once a month they are seasonally adjusted, and I believe that once a month the Bank of Canada produces a major publication, giving a wide range of statistics including money supply statistics. So there is a lot of material that is available on the rate of growth of the money supply.

What we are talking about here is a major economic study. Like Senator Olson, I would be just a little bit concerned about embarking on a study of the exchange rate at this particular juncture. Everyone knew that the Canadian dollar at $1.03 was highly overvalued, that it had to come down, and that is was supported, as Senator Olson said, by borrowing from foreign countries, mainly the United States, due to an abnormally high interest rate in Canada. It has come down, and at some point it is going to find the level that relates to the difference in inflation between Canada and the rest of the world, and most especially the United States.

Although we do not have the facts at this stage, we can suspect that it has come under some sort of speculative attack. It may be necessary for the time being for the central bank to support the dollar until that speculative attack ceases. But at some stage, under a floating system—which I personally endorse—it will find its natural level.

[Senator Austin.]

For us to get involved in a study right now, it seems that two things are wrong. As Senator Olson has said, we would be reacting at a time when our currency may be under, or may come under, a speculative attack. Secondly, these things change very quickly. Within a month our dollar could be stabilized. At that stage we could be looking into something that is past history. So I would not want to look into the question of the exchange rate on the basis that we have a problem now, but I do like the idea of having a look at our exchange rate policy, our floating rate policy, and our entire economic policy, at another time when we can do it in a way that makes good sense and allows us to involve expert opinion. I believe, therefore, that if we are going to undertake such a study it must be an all-embracing and well-founded study.

Senator Austin said that the matter should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I differ from him in that it is my view that if this matter is referred to a committee, it should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. If honourable senators look at the rules they will see that the National Finance Committee is concerned with government finance. On the other hand, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee is concerned with banking, insurance, trust and loan companies, credit societies, caisses populaires, small loans companies, customs and excise, taxation legislation, patents and royalties, corporate and consumer affairs, bankruptcy, and natural resources and mines.

I was a member of the Rules Committee, chaired by Senator Molson, when we rewrote the rules not long after I came to the Senate—somewhere around 1967 or 1968. At that time we discussed the powers that should be given to the National Finance Committee and those that should be given to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. It was decided that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee should deal with taxation, although that is a matter that in some ways falls more likely into "government finance." It was decided that the spending estimates should be dealt with by the National Finance Committee, and that taxation should be dealt with by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

It was thought that government economic policy would likely be dealt with by the National Finance Committee. Indeed, the National Finance Committee in the past has made two major economic studies and reported to the Senate. One report in which I was involved is entitled Growth, Employment and Price Stability, and the other report was made before I became a member of the committee or, indeed, a member of the Senate.

It seems fairly clear that government economic policy is a matter which comes within the ambit of the National Finance Committee and not within that of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. If this matter is referred to a committee—and at this stage I am not recommending that it should be—I believe it should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

[Translation]

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, if you will allow me, I shall congratulate all those who have taken part in the debate and have expressed their opinions from the fiscal point of view. In addition, if you will allow me another remark, those who spoke saw things from the same point of view, though, I perceived, in not quite the same perspective because they did not all share the same views.

If you will also allow me, I should like to say to Senator van Roggen that, though he may question the knowledge, the information or the sincerity of Senator Flynn, I certainly do not. I believe that during his 15 years here Senator Flynn has been one of those who have worked long hours to familiarize themselves with all the bills put before us, every subject, knowing his point of view would then be more impartial than those we have heard until now, or, at least, impartial from the government point of view. And now please allow me, on his behalf, to move the adjournment of the debate.

[English]

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, on a point of order, I would like to make it quite clear that at no point in my remarks did I bring Senator Flynn's sincerity into question. I did not use that word—I am quite positive of that—and would never do so concerning that particular gentleman.

On motion of Senator Bélisle, for Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 28, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 28, 1978

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

BALTIC HONORARY CONSULS

Senator Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I draw your attention to the presence in the gallery of the Honorary Consuls of the Baltic States. I should like to introduce and, on your behalf, welcome Mr. Ilmar Heinsoo of Estonia, Dr. Edward Upenieks of Latvia and Dr. Jonas Zmuidzinas of Lithuania.

These distinguished visitors are here to attend the Sixth Baltic Evening on Parliament Hill, to be held tomorrow in celebration of the 60th anniversary of the self-determination, independence and statehood of the Baltic nations. This was referred to by Senator Thompson on February 23 last.

I am happy to state that Canada, the United States, and several other democracies do not recognize the Soviet military occupation and the forcible incorporation of these countries by the Soviet Union which took place in 1940.

The Latvians, Lithuanians and Estonians, now numbering over 100,000 in Canada, are among the best citizens of our country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Yuzyk: These people treasure the freedom, democracy and human rights of the Canadian way of life. Their many-sided contributions are enriching our economy and the Canadian cultural mosaic.

STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT PROPOSALS

CLARIFICATION OF REMARKS MADE ON THE MOTION FOR THE ADOPTION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might, with leave, correct a misunderstanding arising out of my statement in moving the adoption of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on the Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Proposals on Wednesday of last week.

Comparing the procedure for tabling these proposals with the procedure followed in the case of the first Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Bill in 1977, I said, and I quote:

The procedure was changed this year, in that the proposals were referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee of the Senate for consideration before being printed as a bill for introduction in the House of Commons.

This was substantially the statement made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice when he appeared before the committee. As a result of questions put to me by Senator Grosart, I made further inquiries and found that the change in procedure was not as radical as the statement implied. In fact, the proposals were tabled both in the House of Commons and in the Senate and referred to the respective committee of each house. I give Senator Godfrey credit for drawing this to my attention.

The actual difference between the procedure followed in 1977 and the procedure adopted this year is that in 1977 the proposals were tabled in the House of Commons and referred to its Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, whose recommendations were then incorporated into a bill which was introduced in the house and which followed the usual course. This year the proposals were submitted to both houses, and the bill when introduced will incorporate the unanimous recommendations of both the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs and the House of Commons Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. It will then follow the normal course of a bill through Parliament but without further reference to a committee. The difference in procedure is, therefore, that this year the Senate committee will also have had the opportunity to study the proposals and report thereon prior to their introduction in Parliament as a bill. It is my hope that this procedure will be followed in future.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Baldwin had been substituted for that of Mr. Hnatyshyn on the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Committee on International Hockey to the Minister of State, Fitness and Amateur Sport (The Honourable Sidney L. Buckwold, Chairman).

Report of the Law Reform Commission of Canada for the year ended May 31, 1977, pursuant to section 18 of the Law Reform Commission Act, Chapter 23 (1st Supplement), R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Roosevelt Campobello International Park Commission, together with its financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the year ended December 31, 1976, pursuant to section 7 of the Roosevelt Campobello International Park Commission Act, Chapter 19, Statutes of Canada, 1964-65.

Letter of Agreement, dated February 23, 1978, between the Government of Canada and the Government of Saskatchewan concerning the establishment of a joint Federal-Provincial Immigration Committee to assure continuing co-operation between the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Province in matters of immigration, demography, and employment relating to immigrants and foreign temporary workers.

SPORTS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON INTERNATIONAL HOCKEY—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44 (2), I give notice that later this day I will call the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Committee on International Hockey to the Minister of State, Fitness and Amateur Sport, tabled this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE

NOTICE OF MOTION

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(d), I give notice that tomorrow, Wednesday, March 1, 1978, I will move:

That a special committee of the Senate be appointed to consider legislation concerning a northern gas pipeline or the subject matter thereof in advance of such legislation coming before the Senate; and

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

RECOGNITION OF BALTIC STATES—QUESTION

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, in view of the presence in the Senate gallery of the Honorary Consuls of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government what the Canadian government's continued position is with respect to the recognition of those occupied nations.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I want to say in the strongest possible terms that the Canadian government never recognizes, de jure, the incorporation of those states into the U.S.S.R.

AGRICULTURE

FARM CREDIT BILL—QUESTION

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question in connection with the announcement by the Honourable Mr. MacEachen in the other place on January 26 that among the bills to be introduced before Easter would be an amendment to the Farm Credit Act, which would provide moneys for the Farm Credit Corporation to carry on. The honourable leader will know that at least rumour had it that certain amendments would be included in that bill; namely, increasing the maximum eligible age to somewhat beyond 35 years and making it possible for a loan larger than the maximum loan to be made on a single unit of farm operations, where a father and son or father-mother, daughter-son, et cetera, are farming as a family.

Is this legislation still to be introduced? If so, when might we expect it?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am not in a position to indicate at this time the status of that particular proposed piece of legislation. However, I will make an inquiry as soon as possible.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 23, the debate on the motion of Senator Lang for second reading of Bill S-9, to implement an agreement between Canada and Malaysia and conventions between Canada and Spain, Canada and Liberia, Canada and Austria and Canada and Italy for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I regret to say that the sponsor of this bill, Senator Lang, is not able to be with us tonight, but I must certainly compliment him on his learned and instructive introduction of it. In his speech Senator Lang referred to some questions that I asked him two years ago when he introduced a similar bill, and said he hoped I would not ask him the same questions tonight. I am afraid I will ask one or two of the same questions because, unfortunately, it is not unusual here for important questions to be asked and the answers to be a long time in coming. In addition, I shall be asking a few new questions which I am sure Senator Lang, in due course, will answer in his usual competent way.

The purpose of this bill is to implement an international agreement, and a number of international conventions, for the avoidance of double taxation between Canada and Malaysia, Spain, Liberia, Austria and Italy; to implement a long series of agreements which have been carried out between Canada and these other countries ever since the end of the Second World War, and particularly since the inception a few years ago of that bill which we sometimes refer to as the Tax Reform Act. At the present time, it would appear that if this bill is passed something like 20 of these agreements will be implemented, leaving perhaps another 20 countries around the world with which negotiations are being carried on, and with which we can expect in due course to have similar agreements.

The agreements are basically similar to the agreements and conventions which have been before us on previous occasions, but there are some differences and changes that will interest honourable senators.

I asked some questions of the Leader of the Government regarding these agreements and conventions. He has not yet replied, but I may refer to them as I go along. My basic questions were: What are the countries with which we have double taxation avoidance agreements? What are the countries with which we do not have such agreements, but perhaps should have? This, of course, raises the question of an obvious inequality, if not discrimination, between Canadian citizens and others, particularly those who may be investing abroad in countries with which we do not have double taxation avoidance agreements. I have never been able to obtain a full answer to the question regarding the status of citizens who have investments abroad or, conversely, citizens of other countries with which there is no agreement for the avoidance of double taxation.

The first question that occurs to me and which, no doubt, Senator Lang will answer in due course is why the Malaysian agreement is defined as an agreement, and the other agreements are defined as conventions. I am sure honourable senators are aware that in international law there is always a question of nomenclature in respect of treaties, conventions, agreements, and so on. I would be interested to know why the Department of External Affairs has decided, apparently, to use a different term for the Malaysian agreement, which is not fundamentally different from the conventions with Spain, Liberia, Austria and Italy. It may indicate a different relationship, although I have not been able to discover what the difference might be from either a reading of the bill or the explanation given by Senator Lang.

This bill raises some other interesting questions in my mind, and perhaps I should quickly describe its structure. It is a bill to implement these agreements or conventions, the reason being that under our system, the Westminster system, any international agreement, treaty, or convention does not automatically become the law of the land and cannot in itself be pleaded in court. That is a fundamental difference between our constitutional usage in that respect and Washington's, where an international treaty automatically becomes the law of the land and can be pleaded in court. Our system is to have these agreements made, and then for the government to introduce legislation such as we have here to implement them.

[Senator Grosart.]

The bills are practically identical and are very short. The schedules attached thereto—which are the agreements, or conventions, themselves—are very long and involved. Furthermore, they are generally similar, but are, in one important aspect, different.

The bill we are now considering has the usual short title in the first clause. Subclause 2(1) states that the agreement and the schedule thereto are declared to have the force of law in Canada. This is the part concerning the Canada-Malaysia agreement. Then there is a second subclause to clause 2, which perhaps I should read.

In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of this Part, or the Agreement, and the provisions of any other law, the provisions of this Part and the Agreement prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

I have been concerned previously with the phrase “any other law”, and I would hope that either from Senator Lang or, perhaps, in committee, we will have a clear assertion that “any other law” here does not refer to provincial laws, where there may be a conflict. I say this because it is sometimes said that Canada, in terms of international legal definition, is not a fully sovereign nation since we cannot enter into a treaty as a sovereign nation with another sovereign nation without making the reservation that no provision of such a treaty which involves an area of exclusively provincial jurisdiction does not affect that jurisdiction. I am not sure of the intent of this phrase, but I hope we will have clarification in due course.

As regards the third subclause of clause 2, I merely draw it to the attention of honourable senators because it is an excellent provision. It reads:

The Minister of National Revenue may make such regulations as are necessary for the purpose of carrying out the Agreement or for giving effect to any of the provisions thereof.

I have said on other occasions that I hoped that whenever special discretionary powers, such as these, are given to a minister, particularly in regard to regulations, the Senate would insist that there always be included the phrase “as are necessary”, which, of course, brings any action by the minister with respect to the regulations within the purview of the courts. This would not be the case if we had the phrase “in the opinion of the minister,” which was formerly used. This is the kind of phrase I would hope we would insist on whenever such discretionary powers are given to ministers. This language runs not only through the enabling part of the bill before us, but is carried into some of the treaty provisions themselves. I call them treaties because that is, in effect, what they are.

In connection with that matter of provincial jurisdiction, I would draw attention to clause 7, which appears on page 19 of the bill as it is before us, and elsewhere, to the effect that when the payer of royalties, which come under the provisions of this bill, is a contracting state—that is, either of the sovereign states—or a political subdivision thereof, the act applies.

I have some concern as to whether a royalty payment, or a tax payment, under provincial legislation can be covered as this bill attempts to cover it, in view of the effect of the exclusive legislative power of the provincial legislatures in tax areas as well as in other areas.

I am going to suggest to Senator Lang and to the Leader of the Government that this bill go to a committee. At other times we have had a discussion about which committee such bills should go to. This one obviously deals with taxes, but it also deals with international agreements, treaties or conventions. The suggestion has been made that it should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, because under our rules the first group of subjects that should go to that committee comprises the kind of thing dealt with in this bill, namely, a treaty on an international agreement. It has also been suggested that because of the long-term expertise of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in this field, the bill should go to that committee. I leave that to the decision of the Leader of the Government and, perhaps, the sponsor of the bill. However, it is my opinion that this bill should go to a committee for a very thorough information-type examination, because it deals with a great many matters with which not too many Canadians are familiar in this whole area of taxes paid reciprocally by citizens of the contracting parties, withholding royalties, and so on.

The bill deals with gains from the alienation of immovable and movable property, independent personal services, dependent personal services, fees of directors, and artistes and athletes. The word used throughout is "artistes", even in the English version. I do not know whether there is any distinction between "artistes" and "artists", but there it is.

It deals also, of course, with pensions and annuities, which are becoming of increasing interest to many Canadians who for various reasons, spend part of their retirement abroad. It deals with people in the government service, with students, and with estates or trusts. I think it would be useful to have an explanation of the differences in the treatment of these various types of Canadians in respect of the avoidance of double taxation.

A commendable aspect of the bill is that it provides perhaps necessarily for the situation where between the passage of an implementing bill such as this and the next possible time it could come before Parliament changes might be agreed on between the contracting parties to the agreement or convention. The bill provides that in that event, any such change agreed to by the contracting parties, the two nations, may be given, in effect, legislative validity in Canada by order in council. On the surface that might seem quite alarming, because it includes revoking the whole agreement. The phrase is, "alter, revoke, replace or add to the Agreement," which would seem to indicate that here the government is being given, in effect, the power to repeal an act of Parliament by revoking the agreement to which it refers.

However, there is a saving clause, clause 17, which I commend to honourable senators. This is the famous, but not often used, negative clause, and I hope that in committee we will have a full explanation of the way this would operate.

There is in the provisions one apparent anomaly, but this negative clause says, in effect, that the order in council must be tabled in Parliament—that is, in both houses—within 15 days. If no action is taken by either house—that is, action taken by one house and confirmed by the other—the order in council stands. That action must be taken by 50 members in the Commons, or by 20 members in the Senate, within 20 days. Then there are provisions for what happens if one house goes ahead and the other house does not. Generally, if 20 senators, for instance, raise the question and the Senate votes to revoke, or not to approve, an order in council, that decision would go forward to the House of Commons in the usual manner and the House of Commons would be in a position to either accept or reject it. However, a rather interesting provision in this formula is that if that does not happen in either house, the order stands. So it is a question of concurring, or not concurring.

The reason I raise this, and the reason I believe we would have some discussion of it in committee, is that I know there are many honourable senators who feel this is the type of device that should be used much more often in our legislation. It is fairly simple, but it would get us away from many of the problems that arise, particularly in connection with regulations and orders in council. In fact, I would almost go so far as to suggest that every regulation and every order in council be tabled in Parliament and subject to negative resolution. It would merely mean that on the Table would be placed every regulation, and every order in council, and it would then be up to the required 20 senators or 50 members of the House of Commons to raise the issue.

We all know that we have a joint committee dealing with regulations and statutory instruments, and they complain continually that they never know what orders in council, in particular, are being made. It is a real problem, and it seems to me that we should discuss this in committee with the officials to see if they will not agree that this particular device, if I can call it that, or this format, should be used more often.

One major difference between the various agreements is that there is a special provision with respect to the matter of pensions being received by citizens of Canada or Italy. Senator Lang's explanation was this:

There is one unusual aspect to this bill, however, in respect of the convention with Italy. I am sure it will be of great interest to Italo-Canadians to note that incorporated in this convention is an exemption of pensions up to $10,000 a year paid from either Canada to Italy or, reciprocally, from Italy to Canada. I am glad to see this provision incorporated, because one of the great sources of strength and character in the City of Toronto is our vital Italo-Canadian population.

I will not suggest what Senator Lang was looking forward to when he made that comment; it is fairly obvious. He continued:

Regretfully, I rather assume from this exemption that many of these people, when they retire, return to sunny

Italy rather than face the ferocious climate of our Canadian winter. This was recently a matter of current interest in the press, and it is now incorporated in the convention and will become law if and when Parliament passes this bill.

Far be it from me to criticize or even question any such generous concern for any citizen of Canada. But the question has arisen in my mind as to why this provision is not extended to all citizens in Canada or in other countries with which we have double taxation avoidance agreements or conventions. I just wonder why this general provision has been extended only to Italo-Canadian citizens when they retire.

I simply put that on the record. No doubt Senator Lang will give us an explanation of it later, because in his explanation of the bill on second reading he did not indicate why this was incorporated only in this one convention and not in the other conventions and agreement which are before us, and why it is not in all such agreements. One wonders why this provision was not incorporated in the United States agreement, particularly when one considers there is a sunny United States as well as a sunny Italy, and the fact that many Canadian pensioners go there at certain times. I am sure it would be interesting to know why this provision is here. It may well be it is the intention to extend it, but I do not know.

Honourable senators, I hope this bill will be referred to committee because there are matters in respect of which I am quite sure you and I would like more information.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

MAGAZINE ARTICLE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Forsey calling the attention of the Senate to a most mischievous article by June Callwood in the January number of L'actualité—(Honourable Senator Langlois).

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Hicks.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I wish to speak briefly on this inquiry. First of all, I should like to say that I agree with the points made earlier by Senator Forsey. I do not intend to repeat them or paraphrase what Senator Forsey said, but merely underline the points which he made.

[Senator Grosart.]

I wish to make two other observations which Senator Forsey did not make. I take second place to no one in upholding the rights of persons to speak and write articles expressing the most divergent views from my own and, indeed, to be highly critical even of our country, provided they stay within the limits of the laws of the land, and particularly the laws relating to sedition, to which Senator Forsey referred in his remarks on February 9.

However, this lady is an employee of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I think that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which is an agency supported to the extent of many hundreds of millions of dollars per year by the Government of Canada, ought to be expected to employ persons who adopt attitudes which conduce towards the integrity and unity of Canada rather than towards its disruption and its breaking into several parts.

I realize that June Callwood did not make these remarks on television, but wrote them in a magazine article published in the province of Quebec. Nevertheless, I took the trouble to watch some of her programs. I regret to say that her attitude seems to be generally negative and destructive of the unity and integrity of Canada, not to mention the absurd ignorance which she expressed concerning our Constitution, concerning the state of human rights and some other aspects of the laws in Canada to which Senator Forsey made reference on February 9.

If she spoke as an employee of, or on behalf of, an independent or private television company, I would say that she had every right to make these remarks, provided they stayed within the laws of the land. However, I think that Parliament ought to exercise a stricter control over the CBC. I think we have a right to insist that the CBC be an agent of Canada, not a part of Canada, not a fractured or disrupted Canada, but the whole of Canada. I suspect that the lady referred to in this inquiry does not share those views.

The second point I wish to make is that I was disappointed to discover that in January of this year the committee which makes recommendations for membership in the Order of Canada recommended the nomination of this person as a member of the Order of Canada.

There are at least five companions and officers of the Order of Canada in this house, honourable senators, and I think we are all sensible of the great honour conferred upon us when we were inducted into the Order. I, myself, am impressed with the motto of the Order, which is: Desiderantes meliorem patriam. It is taken from the 11th chapter of Hebrews, 16th verse, and translates into English as, "They desire a better country." Into French it translates as, "Nous aspirons à une patrie meilleure."

There is no doubt that the country referred to is Canada. Again, it is all of Canada, not a part of Canada, not two Canadas or a particular section of Canadian society. The members of the Order are challenged to desire a better country, and that country is Canada.

I conclude by saying that if June Callwood is a person of principle, I should think that she has no alternative but to decline installation into the Order, which would normally occur in April of this year.

On motion of Senator Langlois, debate adjourned.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON INTERNATIONAL HOCKEY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold rose pursuant to notice of earlier this day:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Committee on International Hockey to the Minister of State, Fitness and Amateur Sport.

He said: Honourable senators, I appreciate the waiving of the rules in order that I might speak to this report this evening. The report was tabled in the House of Commons on Thursday last, and it was tabled in the Senate earlier this evening, copies having been forwarded to all honourable senators.

When I asked for leave to call the attention of the Senate to this report, one of the great stickhandlers in this house, a great hockey player in his days, Senator Goldenberg, said in a quiet voice that he would have much preferred to have heard from the very charming, lovely and capable minister herself. I am sure that all of you would have agreed with him on that. I am sorry to have to disappoint Senator Goldenberg, but the minister's stand-in, who is not exactly the world's greatest representative of fitness and amateur sport, is going to have to carry the puck.

Honourable senators, the Committee on International Hockey was formed by the Honourable Iona Campagnolo, Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, last July. It came about as a result of a stormy performance by Team Canada at the World Hockey Championships in Vienna last year. As honourable members will recall, although the Canadian team played sound hockey at times, it did not fare well in the tournament and its truculent style of play and its behaviour off the ice created a furor in Canada and across the hockey world. Some incidents arising from the team's conduct were an embarrassment to the people of Canada.

The criticism, coupled with the presence in Vienna of the minister, led to the decision to form this parliamentary committee to look into Canada's participation in international hockey. The minister instructed us to report back to her on the options which would be open to the Canadian government and to the hockey community generally to improve our performance in international hockey. The committee then had the responsibility to outline these options and to indicate ways and means of influencing the structure of the national team so that future national teams could consistently reflect that which is best in our nation.

That was the mandate given to our non-partisan parliamentary committee, which originally consisted of myself as chairman, and Armand Caouette, Roch La Salle, Stuart Leggatt and Gus MacFarlane of the House of Commons. Dr. Bruce Halliday and Dr. Victor Railton were added to the committee later because of the inability of some of the original members to attend some of the meetings. Our advisor was Derek Holmes, the Executive Director of Hockey Canada.

Senator Grosart: There were no other senators on the committee?

Senator Buckwold: No, there were not.

Senator Asselin: Were you chosen by the minister?

Senator Buckwold: I was appointed by the minister, yes. Why I was chosen, other than the fact that, like Senator Goldenberg, I am qualified as a very skilled professional, I am not sure. I might say, I have had a significant interest in hockey over the years, and I also had the privilege of touring Europe with a hockey team some years ago—not, I hasten to add, as a player, but as the mayor of my community. It was my responsibility to give the after-game speeches.

Senator Asselin: You are a good skater.

Senator Buckwold: On thin ice. The committee heard from both groups and individuals. As a matter of fact, over 100 groups and individuals were interviewed, many of whom presented briefs. There was a great deal of correspondence. In addition, an interesting questionnaire was sent out by certain members of the House of Commons to their constituents. The members were chosen so as to achieve a representative group across the country. To give you an indication of the wide interest in this subject, the response to that questionnaire was well over 15 per cent, which for a mail-out is considered well above average.

Honourable senators might be interested in some of the questions and the responses. I do not intend to comment on them. The first question was:

In your opinion should Canada participate in international hockey?

The response to that was 93 per cent in favour.

The second question:

If you agree that we should participate, which is more important to you?

And the choices were to win or to compete.

Senator Steuart: To win.

Senator Buckwold: We have Senator Steuart representing the large group of citizens who wish to win at any price, to bring back the medal. That is the way some Canadians think.

I was personally pleasantly surprised that only 3 per cent of those who responded shared Senator Steuart's view. By far the greater number, 65 per cent, said that our major objective should be to compete—and certainly to win, but not to win at any price.

The third question:

In your opinion does Team Canada represent you as a Canadian when it competes?

In response to that, 83 per cent said yes. The next question:

In your opinion should Canada select players for Team Canada when needed?

And 40 per cent replied "yes" to that. Or:

Develop an ongoing national team?

And 53 per cent opted for the latter. The results were very close. The idea of developing an ongoing national team may sound appealing, but from a practical point of view, given the salaries now being paid to players in the National Hockey League and the World Hockey Association, it is unrealistic.

The fifth question:

In your opinion which of the following are the most serious problems for Canada in international hockey: team selection, team preparation, team conduct, rules and officiating, tournament dates?

Interestingly enough, 28 per cent picked team selection, 24 per cent picked team preparation, 24 per cent picked team conduct, 13 per cent picked rules and officiating, and 11 per cent picked tournament dates.

The sixth question:

In your opinion are Canadian hockey players suited for international hockey in skills, attitude, conditioning?

In skills, 88 per cent replied in the affirmative; in attitude, only 45 per cent replied in the affirmative; and in conditioning, 43 per cent replied in the affirmative.

Senator Grosart: Too high.

Senator Buckwold: I think that is a very important statistic.

Senator Everett: Could you give the figures for skills again?

Senator Buckwold: In terms of skills, 88 per cent said yes; 6 per cent said no; and 6 per cent had no answer.

These are revealing statistics insofar as the opinions of Canadians generally.

The last question is an interesting one:

In your opinion should the Federal Government become more involved with Team Canada?

● (2100)

Honourable senators, I think there is significant support for a mandate to be given to the federal government to be more involved in international hockey.

The committee, as I say, conducted hearings, heard groups and presentations, literally thousands of pages of briefs, and our report is relatively short—just a handful of pages—which I think you will find interesting reading. I do not want to go into the details of the report but I should like to deal with some of the over-view.

Canada has a difficult role in international hockey. Our best hockey players, as all of us are aware, are in the National Hockey League and the World Hockey Association. In those leagues, only six teams represent Canadian cities; the rest are American franchises. This puts a very touchy complexion on the whole problem of our participation in international hockey, because although almost all the players are Canadian, the team owners are American and the teams are located in American cities. I suppose it could be said that American owners are not that much interested in how Canada as a nation does in international hockey.

The professional leagues, of course, have a very important influence on our attitude to hockey in so far as the development of our young players is concerned. In my opinion, and in the opinion of our committee, the professional leagues are certainly skilful in their approach to the game; their players are topnotch and really are the best we have. In addition, the professional leagues are spectator oriented. It is important that they play a style of hockey that will fill the rinks and produce revenue, and the result is that sometimes the action on the ice is something that we would not be particularly proud to see our young hockey players emulate. But that is what happens. The heroes of our young, aspiring hockey players are the stars of the professional hockey leagues, and they adapt to the style of play they see on television. This also has influenced the style of game that has been developed in Canada.

As you know, the National Hockey League and the World Hockey Association playoffs take place at the same time that the International Ice Hockey Federation holds its annual hockey championships, generally in April. As a result we have not been able to form the best team we can to play against the best teams from other countries, but I think we have done as well as possible under the circumstances.

Honourable senators, a milestone in international hockey was reached in the Fall of 1976 with the staging of the first Canada Cup. It was a great series. Hockey nations such as Sweden, Finland, Czechoslovakia, Russia, and the United States were invited to send teams to Canada to play in a tournament in September. This was at a time when our professional players were available, although perhaps not in the best of condition. But the Canada Cup saw our best go against the world's best, and it is planned to hold this event again in 1980.

The first Canada Cup tournament was organized basically by Alan Eagleson, and while our report says little about Mr. Eagleson I think it is important to draw the attention of the Senate and of Canadians generally to the role that he has played in bringing back Canada into the international hockey scene. There has been a good deal of criticism of Mr. Eagleson, some of it justified, perhaps, on the grounds of conflict of interest. We listened to Mr. Eagleson and received his brief in which he told us he is the lawyer for more than 150 professional hockey players in North America, and the executive director of the National Hockey League Players' Association. However, he went on to say:

Now that I have advised you of the many conflicts I have, let me assure you that I have one desire above all and that is to establish as often as possible that Canada has hockey players second to none.

If you look at the record, keeping in mind this possible concern, and perhaps justifiable criticism, you will realize that that man has really put Canada back into the international hockey scene. I doubt if anybody else could have done it. I might say that in 1976 the Canada Cup generated a profit of over $3 million, of which $1.5 million went to the professional players' pension fund and the other $1.5 million was turned over for hockey development of our young players through the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association. I do not think that Mr. Eagleson receives enough credit on that side for what has happened as a result of his leadership in the international hockey field.

Again I am not here to act as a one-man band for Alan Eagleson, but I think it is fair to say that he has made an unselfish contribution to the development of international hockey.

As we looked at the international hockey scene it soon became apparent to the committee that international hockey was really just the tip of the iceberg, that it was really just a reflection of what has occurred in the domestic hockey scene. It was almost impossible for us to differentiate between international hockey, on the one hand, and domestic hockey—the hockey that is played in Canada—on the other hand. When I say hockey that is played in Canada, I am referring basically to the amateur hockey, to the minor league hockey, to the junior league hockey, to the development process that we have in hockey and our report moves into this field, I think, fairly extensively.

I think it is fair to say that we came to the conclusion that we are not keeping up with the skills that have been developed in recent years by some of our European competitors, that there be increased stress on techniques and skills, and that we need improved coaching to make better utilization of the excellent research which has been done by Canadian universities. All kinds of research have been done in a variety of physical education facilities, and most of the material is just lying on the shelf and not being utilized. We go on teaching our young people to play hockey the same way we did 25, 30 or 40 years ago when, in fact, there are improvements that have been developed by some of our European friends.

I think that Canada still has the greatest hockey players in the world, and I am sure the members of our committee do. On the other hand, we have to accept the fact—and this many Canadians find difficult—that other nations also have good hockey players who are able to perform, and that there will be times when Canada will not be the champions. We have to accept that. We can take some credit for the fact that basically the game has come from us, and that the world has adopted and adapted it. We have been able to give to the spectator a wonderful form of entertainment, as well as a great exercise to young people in those countries that play hockey.

One of the major concerns of the committee over and above the question of improving our techniques, and taking advantage of our skills and our research, was the question of education. This could be the subject of a major address in itself, but there is no doubt in my mind, or in the minds of the members of the committee, that our major junior hockey leagues are not contributing in the way they should to the development of the full person. They concentrate on hockey skills to such a degree that in many cases they have made it difficult for the young people who play with them to obtain an education.

Some of the major junior hockey leagues are almost mini-pro leagues. The Western Major Junior Hockey League has teams that go from Flin Flon, Manitoba, down into the state of Washington. It also has a team in Billings, Montana. Some of these teams have schedules of 100 games, and they travel thousands of miles. It is almost impossible for these players to continue their education.

The sad thing is that, lured by the magic of $90,000-plus—the average salary in the National Hockey League—hundreds if not thousands of young people are sacrificing themselves to this whole junior hockey system in the hope of winning that prize at the end of the rainbow, which is there only for the chosen few—the very best. There are relatively few players drafted to play for the top professional teams. The rest make a significant sacrifice, many of them finding themselves with little education and, by the time they get out of junior hockey, no place to go. They become unhappy and disgruntled citizens.

The committee took a serious view of this problem and felt that it is important that there be an alternative for young Canadian hockey players—an alternative that would give them the chance to play hockey, develop their skills and also get an education at some post-secondary educational institution. Many of our bright young hockey players are going to American universities on hockey scholarships. We were told that there are about 1,000 Canadians playing hockey in a variety of American universities. The evidence we received was that, generally, the universities did not sacrifice their academic standards for these players on hockey scholarships. In other words, they demanded the same entrance requirements from the students on hockey scholarships as from any other students. The bad name that has been given to athletic scholarships in some American universities over the past years is really disappearing, and now high standards are set, and well they should be.

The committee recommended to the government that encouragement be given through Hockey Canada for a series of scholarships to post-secondary education institutions, either universities or trade schools, but these should not detract from the academic requirements of those institutions. As I have said, these youngsters are going to American universities and, in many cases, they eventually become American citizens. Interestingly enough, last year about one-third of the National Hockey League draft came through the American college system. Of that number, about 90 per cent were Canadians.

More and more, the National Hockey League and the World Hockey Association are looking to college-educated hockey players. This is the system that is followed in other major sports in the United States. There is no such thing there as a junior draft or midget draft for football or basketball. There are agreements there among all professional teams that until a player has had at least three years of college he is not signed up or drafted for those particular sports, and the result is that you have well-educated players. It is our hope that the same thing will happen in Canada. I hasten to add that our players are bright, they are intelligent and they are able, but because of the system many of them are not able to carry on with their education in the way that we would like.

I am not sure of the accuracy of this, but it was reported to us by one of the witnesses that a few years ago only three or four of the players on the Calgary Centennials junior team had better than a grade nine education. I would say that is a sad commentary on the whole hockey system.

The committee is really quite concerned about junior hockey. We are concerned about minor hockey and how it is developing. We are concerned about the role that parents play, and I could make a complete speech on some of the briefs that were presented to us on that side of the question. Apparently some parents of kids seven and eight years old really goad the children into playing violent hockey. Again, that is not the kind of performance we like to see in Canada, nor is it the kind of development we want for our young hockey players.

Honourable senators, I could go on to discuss in detail a wide variety of recommendations which I know you are able to read for yourselves. The committee has recommended that the Government of Canada instigate an in-depth study—which the committee was not able to do—into the whole question of junior hockey. The minister has accepted that, and she is now discussing it with provincial ministers, because the educational aspect does involve the provinces, of course. We have suggested that there be an attempt to encourage intercollegiate hockey on a much wider scale than at present, because we feel it is important that hockey become a school sport. Some of us would even like to see hockey back in the high schools—but that, of course, is a different subject.

We have suggested it would be advisable to have a permanent coach and manager for Team Canada, so that we could learn from our experience and not have to “invent the wheel” every time we entered a team. Much more care should be taken in the choice of players, and judgments should be made as to how they react under pressure, and the kind of attitudes they have. This is a very difficult subject. We have indicated that better use should be made of psychologists and sports experts from the universities in an attempt to develop the kind of team that will represent us with honour.

Honourable senators, I have tried to give an overview of some of the things that we learned. I can say that there is tremendous interest in this country in hockey. The committee, in its meetings across the country, was impressed with how seriously Canadians regard hockey. Hockey is really a part of the Canadian culture, and it is important that the Government of Canada, through the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport, recognizes this fact and assists wherever possible to improve our performance.

In conclusion, I believe, as a result of the committee's work, the actions of the minister, the reactions of the press in a wide variety of ways, and the concern of the players themselves, that we can look forward to a much improved performance when the teams meet again in the world championships in Prague this April. I am not suggesting that we are going to win, but I have the feeling that those magnificent players who wear the name “Canada” on their sweaters will conduct themselves in such a way as to reflect pride on all Canadians.

Perhaps I should add that those players are not highly paid for playing in international tournaments. What is not generally known is that the average salary paid for 17 games in the Vienna tournament was less than $2,000. It worked out to a little less than $120 per game, which I think all will agree is much less than the players earn when playing in their regular leagues. So the players themselves made a significant sacrifice.

I have been pleased to discuss the report. I hope that all honourable senators will enjoy reading it, and that it will have some impact on the future role of Canadians in international hockey.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, may I pose a few questions to Senator Buckwold? I am not seeking answers tonight, but perhaps he can provide the information later.

My first question concerns the evidence obtained in connection with that most regrettable and distasteful performance in Vienna last year. I would like to know if the committee obtained evidence from the participants. By “participants” I mean the Canadian referees, coaches and players. Secondly, I would like to know whether that evidence is available in printed form; and, thirdly, whether similar evidence was obtained with respect to other hockey competitions in which Canadians participated.

Senator Buckwold: In reply to the honourable senator, several players who represented Canada at last year's international ice hockey championships in Vienna were interviewed by the committee. The adviser to the committee was Mr. Derek Holmes, who was the general manager of Team Canada. So we were able to obtain a good idea of what went on, and the kind of frustrations and pressures faced by the players.

I regret to say that there is no printed evidence, but the briefs which, as I indicated, represent literally thousands of pages, are available and can be obtained at any time. We obtained very little evidence respecting previous tournaments, other than casual references to the Canadian experience.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I shall detain honourable senators for only one moment. Again there is no one in the Press Gallery this evening to hear Senator Buckwold's most interesting speech. I should like to suggest that we undertake to send a copy of the honourable senator's speech, together with a copy of the report, to the sports editors of most of the papers across the country—those in our own cities, for example. That would be a useful service to perform. I am sure they would be interested in the information.

We are grateful to Senator Buckwold, not only for working so hard in the hot weather to produce a report in the cold weather about hockey, but also for doing something for the Senate. That is something which we should all recognize.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Before I move the adjournment of the Senate, I am sure I reflect the views of all honourable senators when I say that we are proud and pleased with the excellent report prepared under the chairmanship of Senator Buckwold. It has received praise from coast to coast, and reflects great credit not only on the committee and its chairman but also on the Senate, which was the subject of some discussion in events over recent days. We can point once again with a great deal of pride to this report of a committee chaired by one of our members.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

POSTPONEMENT OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before the adjournment is moved, I should like to remind you that the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, scheduled for tomorrow after the Senate rises, for the purpose of considering Bill S-7, has been postponed until next Wednesday, March 8, 1978.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, March 1, 1978

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the names of Mrs. Holt and Mr. Hnatyshyn had been substituted for those of Messrs. Pinard and Balfour on the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Senator Marchand, Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the National Capital Region, presented the following report:

[English]

Tuesday, February 28, 1978

The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the National Capital Region has the honour to present its first report as follows:

On Wednesday, December 14, 1977, your committee was constituted to consider and report upon matters bearing upon the development of the National Capital Region, including the programs and operations of the National Capital Commission, and submit a final report within 90 days of December 13, 1977.

Your committee is of the opinion that it will be unable to complete its inquiry within the time prescribed by its order of reference. Your committee recommends therefore that the date of submission of its report be extended.

Your committee also recommends that members of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the National Capital Region be granted leave to travel outside Canada; namely, to Washington, D.C., U.S.A., for the purpose of pursuing the consideration of its order of reference, and that the necessary staff accompany the members on the inquiry.

Respectfully submitted,
Jean Marchand,
Joint Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Marchand moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

ATTENDANCE OF MINISTER OF FISHERIES AND THE ENVIRONMENT AT COMMITTEE MEETING—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. I note that this committee is to meet tomorrow and that the witness will be Mr. Jack Hall, Acting Director, Small Craft Harbours Branch, Department of Fisheries and the Environment. In view of the fact that during the debate on second reading of the bill in question we on this side, at least, wanted to hear the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, and representatives of the Treasury Board, I would like to know from the chairman, first, if it was his idea to have this Mr. Hall appear before the committee; secondly, whether eventually we shall have the opportunity to hear the minister and representatives of the Treasury Board.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, this meeting was called on my instructions. I had understood that the minister might not be able to be with us tomorrow, but I am now advised that he will be present. With reference to the Treasury Board, more than one senator has mentioned to me today the desirability of having a witness from the board, and I have therefore instructed the clerk of the committee to make whatever arrangements he can to have such a witness attend tomorrow. I am not in a position yet to say that that will be possible, but certainly, with the consent of the committee, it will be possible on a subsequent date.

NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Langlois moved, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, February 28, 1978:

That a special committee of the Senate be appointed to consider legislation concerning a northern gas pipeline or the subject matter thereof in advance of such legislation coming before the Senate; and

Senator Flynn: Explain.

Senator Langlois: As all honourable senators know, the Northern Pipeline bill is now at the committee stage in the other place. Since it is a very important proposal, which is of interest to all of Canada, it is felt that a committee of this house should give consideration to the subject matter of the bill as soon as possible.

The pipeline is a project which must be carried out with all expediency, in view of its importance to the economy of this country, and I am sure that a special committee of this Senate, which would be formed if this motion were passed, would set itself to the task of giving every consideration to the project itself and to any other matter relating thereto.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I recognize the urgency of this legislation. It is twofold: First because the project itself must start as soon as possible, and second, if we are to have an election campaign, it is necessary that this legislation be adopted for the government, the party in power, to refer to it during that campaign and benefit from it as much as it possibly can. I am aware of that and I do not object. But the point in Senator Langlois' proposal which worries me is the fact that its purpose is to appoint a special committee, when we already have under our rules the necessary committee which is responsible for looking into this kind of legislation. If honourable senators will kindly refer to rule 67(1)(i)(iv) of the Rules of the Senate, which sets out the responsibilities of the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, they will realize that matters relating to pipelines, transmission lines and energy transmission are almost automatically referred to that committee. Why, then, a special committee? We already have a committee. If it were unduly busy, I could agree to the appointment of a special committee. But such is not the case. I do not understand why the Deputy Leader of the Government insists on setting up this special committee. Why not make use of the committees we have already—unless we want to imitate what was done in the House of Commons? However, I am not pleased at all with this idea.

Therefore, I do not see why the acting leader could not withdraw his proposal and move instead a motion calling for the referral of the legislation to the committee properly appointed under the Rule of the Senate.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it had been anticipated that observations of that nature would be raised, and quite understandably so. However, in the matter of the northern gas pipeline there is so clearly a possible committee involvement that goes beyond the terms of reference of any one standing committee that it is felt, just as all parties agreed in the other place, that a special committee should be created in this chamber equivalent to the special committee in the other place to consider this extremely important matter.

Honourable senators, allow me to point out why this bill could be referred to a number of our standing committees. While the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications appears to be an obvious choice, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has a responsibility to examine matters relating to treaties and international agreements. The natural gas pipeline agreement is one of the most important international accords into which Canada has entered for some considerable period of years. Indeed, it is one of the most important international agreements since Confederation. That committee has under its terms of reference external trade, foreign aid, and territorial and offshore matters. The Transport and Communications Committee very clearly has an involvement. On page 18 of Rules of the Senate we see where transport and communications by land, air, water, and space are matters which may be referred to that committee, as are radio, television, common carriers, pipelines, transmission lines, and so on. The Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs could be clearly involved. We see in their terms of reference federal-provincial relations, administration of justice, law reform and all matters related thereto. The Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Science could be involved because of the effect of the northern pipeline, for example, on the rights of indigenous peoples, Canada's aboriginal citizens.

Senator Flynn: Come on, be serious!

Senator Perrault: Very clearly the members of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Science have a responsibility with respect to proposed legislation as it affects the well-being of humans. We have the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce with its concern for natural resources and mines. Clearly, a special committee of the Senate should be appointed to consider this important measure.

● (1420)

Senator Everett: Will the honourable leader mention the National Finance Committee? We hate to be left out.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I commend the honourable Chairman of the National Finance Committee for making a valid point. Last, but not least, the National Finance Committee could conceivably have a direct interest in the matter involved in the natural gas pipeline agreement.

The proposal is to bring into being a special committee because of the extreme importance of this measure. Perhaps the committee could be made up in part of some members of the standing committees who are in a position to contribute their understanding and special expertise. I think it is important that the Senate acquit itself in its usual responsible manner.

Senator Grosart: I am surprised the Leader of the Government did not mention some of the other committees.

Senator Flynn: Internal Economy, for instance.

Senator Grosart: The Agriculture Committee will be involved, and no doubt the Restaurant of Parliament Committee will be involved.

Senator Argue: The Rules Committee.

Senator Grosart: I suggest that the rationale given by the Leader of the Government in response to the intervention by the Leader of the Opposition is too specious, if I may use that word, to be parliamentary.

Obviously, under our rules, the subject matter of any bill that comes before the Senate can be found to come within some of the competences of other committees. A prime example is Bill S-9 with which we dealt yesterday, and which concerns international treaties, agreements and conventions. The very first requirement for bills that, on motion, shall be referred to the Foreign Affairs Committee is that they be bills dealing with treaties, agreements and conventions. It was agreed that Bill S-9 be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce because of the competence which that committee has shown over the years.

This decision was made by the Leader of the Government, I presume, and I have no objection to it whatsoever. But to say, because the contents of any bill presented to the Senate may involve some of the competence of other committees, that it should therefore go to a special committee would mean there would hardly ever be a bill that would not go to a special committee.

Surely the purpose of a special committee is to deal with a specific reference in principle. The last occasion this occurred was, of course, when the Special Committee on Science Policy was appointed. At that time there was no committee in the Senate which had the competence, under the rules, to deal with a matter of science policy. We now have the Health, Welfare and Science Committee which probably has the competence, but it did not at that time.

So one wonders why the decision to copy the House of Commons has been made. Our committee structure is entirely different from theirs. There is a committee to which this matter can be referred. According to our rules, as the Leader of the Opposition stated, all matters relating to pipelines shall, on motion, be referred to that committee. What is most interesting to me is that when the Leader of the Government read that rule he omitted the word "pipelines."

Senator Perrault: That is not so.

Senator Grosart: It may have been by accident. If my memory is incorrect—and Hansard will indicate this—I apologize, but my recollection is that in reading—

Senator Perrault: I read it.

Senator Grosart: We will see. I merely point out, as an indication of the speciousness of the suggestion that has been made, that in reading subparagraph (iv) of rule 67(1) (i) he read it in these words:

—transmission lines and energy transmission—

But it actually reads:

(iv) pipelines, transmission lines and energy transmission—

It may have been a slip of the tongue.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there was no slip of the tongue. My recollection is that I did read the word "pipelines"; if I am incorrect and my memory fails me, then I ask that the word "pipelines" be placed in there.

Senator Forsey: You said "pipelines."

Senator Grosart: I am merely saying that that is my memory. I may be wrong. I am not concerned about that. I am getting old. I may be a little deafer than I think I am.

Senator Perrault: You are too lively yet.

Senator Grosart: My observation, within the limitations of my hearing and my memory, was that the Leader of the Government, in reading that subparagraph, did not read the word "pipelines." I could be wrong, quite wrong. Our friends in Hansard, who are very accurate with these things, will indicate whether I am right or wrong in that.

However, I am unable to agree with the suggestion by the Leader of the Government that Hansard should be changed at this stage. We will see, and I can assure the Leader of the Government that if the Hansard report proves me wrong, I will make a full apology to him tomorrow for having made that statement.

To get to the principle of this thing, we have a highly competent committee which could consider this matter. I do not like to suggest that the reason for this motion may be that it happens to be the only committee of the Senate which, by tradition, does not have a chairman who is a member of the party in office—

Senator Bourget: That is not fair. We like our chairman and we all support him.

Senator Asselin: Touché; touché.

Senator Bourget: Touché, yes, because we are right. We like our chairman, and that has been proven.

I apologize to my honourable friend for having interrupted him.

Senator Grosart: That is quite all right. I merely said, "I do not like to suggest . . ." those were my words.

Senator Bourget: Well, we have all been in politics long enough to understand what was meant.

Senator Flynn: We have indeed.

Senator Bourget: Ask the chairman. He will tell you.

Senator Grosart: My statement was that I do not like to suggest that this has anything to do with the decision—and I repeat that statement. I do not like to suggest that that may have something to do with the decision of the government not to send this matter to that committee which, under our rules, is the committee responsible for dealing with matters that affect pipelines. I say I don't want to suggest that—

Senator Bourget: We heard that.

Senator Grosart: If that suggestion is not proper—and it is not one I want to put before the Senate—then it would seem to me to make sense for the Leader of the Government to explain to us why this matter is not being referred to that committee.

Here we have a rule—and we try to abide by our rules—under which, on motion, any matter on any bill—in this case, a contemplated bill—that deals with pipelines should be referred to that committee. I think the Senate is entitled to an explanation as to why a decision has been made not to follow our rules, and not to move a motion under this particular rule that this matter be referred to that committee. That is the point I raise.

Again, I do not want to suggest that the reason had anything to do with the chairman of that committee who, as has been said, is one who has the confidence of all honourable senators. But I think we are entitled to an explanation as to why a decision has been made not to refer this matter to the committee which, under our rules, is the committee to which it should be sent.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, let me state at the outset in the most unequivocal way that all senators have an immense amount of confidence in the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Both in his term of service here and in his previous career, he has served with great distinction. I want to say as well that we have a group of other distinguished chairmen who serve on committees of the Senate—the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the Chairman of the National Finance Committee, the Chairman of the Health, Welfare and Science Committee, the Chairman of the Agriculture Committee, and all other chairmen who are competent in their own way.

Senator Flynn: What do you mean by “in their own way”?

Senator Perrault: Competent in their areas of interest and expertise.

Honourable senators, I can think of no better committee to study this extremely important measure before Canadians than a committee made up in part of people like the distinguished Chairman of the Transport and Communications Committee, the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, perhaps the Chairman of the Health, Welfare and Science Committee, and the chairmen and members of various committees who can bring their abilities and their expertise to a special committee, just as has been done in the other place. I am sure that the interest of all senators in the natural gas pipeline—a concern that exists regardless of party affiliation—transcends any kind of political consideration.

Senator Flynn: That is so obvious.

Senator Perrault: I think it is very important, for example, that the distinguished senator from the Yukon Territory be a member of such a special committee, and there are other honourable senators with a special interest in the pipeline issue because their provinces are going to be directly affected by the proposed measure. Some possess special knowledge and yet they are not members of the Transport and Communications Committee or the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Senator Asselin: Just change the members on the committee.

Senator Perrault: And it is important that their interests be respected, and that they be given an opportunity to contribute and to serve and to vote on such a special committee. This is part of the government's thinking.

Senator Flynn: Would the leader yield at this time and tell me whom he has in mind as members from his side, and whom he has in mind as chairman of the committee? What he has said may be an explanation, but I suggest that he would have more room for appointing all those he considers knowledgeable on the subject given a committee of 20 members than he would given a special committee of only 12.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator is aware, of course, that the members are designated by the selection committee, and in due course we would know the name of the chairman who would be selected from among the members of the special committee.

Senator Flynn: Have you nobody in mind?

Senator Perrault: I have the names of a number of outstanding senators in mind, all of whom would serve with distinction. But, of course, that is a choice that will be made by members of the committee.

Senator Flynn: Whom have you particularly in mind? Do you have Senator Denis in mind?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must remind the Senate that if Honourable Senator Langlois speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Flynn: Then we will adjourn the debate.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, what I find odd in the suggestion of the government leader and his deputy is that they say that this is what the House of Commons did and we should proceed exactly in the same way because the House of Commons agreed to set up a special committee to consider the subject matter of this legislation. That may be another reason for the other place wanting to abolish the Senate. That is because we never keep our distance with respect to the other place. Once again, we have an opportunity to say: “We are not going to do like the other place, like the House of Commons.”

We have our own rules and rule 67(1)(i) says that this kind of bill can be referred to the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications whose terms of reference provide for the consideration of such a bill.

The government leader says that things were done differently in the other place. All parties agreed to it. The fact that they all agreed in the other place does not mean that we have to follow blindly their procedure, their decisions. Our procedures are set out in our rules. The rule previously referred to by the Leader of the Opposition and his deputy, rule 67, sets out the terms of reference of the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications regarding bills of this nature. You can say all you want, that this is not a reflection on the ability of the chairman of the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. As the Leader of the Government suggested, he is an excellent committee chairman. That is all very nice. When he brings an important matter before the committee some of the members can occasionally be changed so that the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will be made up of senators who are more familiar with the problem, whether they come from the province of Alberta, British Columbia, or elsewhere where that work will be done because, obviously, it is in the interest of their own province—

Senator Côté: U.S. senators.

Senator Asselin:—that the pipeline is built. I say this is only a matter of introducing a motion to change certain members of the committee for other senators who are more knowledgeable about the problem and give them an opportunity to consider objectively the subject matter of this legislation before it is decided upon. We could follow the rules of the Senate and refer the inquiry to the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications even if the chairman sits on this side of the house. I take the word of the Leader of the Government who said that he is a talented and excellent chairman. So I think the committee is in good hands. Let us simply change the committee members and appoint people who are more knowledgeable about such problems than those who are actually there and we could then choose from 30 members instead of the 12 that would be assigned to the special committee you want to create. This way, I think we will stop copying the other place while respecting the rules of the Senate. I strongly advise the government leader to make this decision.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I must say I had no intention at this stage to close the debate on the motion. Let me first comment briefly on the remarks of my friend, Senator Asselin.

At the beginning of his remarks, he seemed to suggest that because the Senate follows a procedure of the House of Commons, it is slowly moving towards its own abolition.

● (1440)

[English]

Senator Grosart: If the honourable senator will excuse me for interrupting—

Senator Langlois: Yes.

[Senator Asselin.]

Senator Grosart: On a point of order, is he merely answering questions?

Senator Langlois: Yes. I am not closing the debate, if that is what you mean.

Senator Perrault: He is just answering questions. He has the right to do that.

Senator Grosart: Surely, it is for Her Honour the Speaker to decide whether the honourable senator is closing the debate. The translation, at least, of his opening remarks was to the effect that he would be making some comments. I suggest to him that if he is specifically answering questions directed to him, he is in order; but if he intends to comment on the whole question that has arisen, then, in effect, he would be closing the debate.

Senator Langlois: I am answering the questions that have been put generally both to myself and to the Leader of the Government.

Senator Flynn: In that case, I may speak later myself.

Senator Langlois: I have no objection at all to that.

[Translation]

Senator Langlois: As I have just said, Senator Asselin seems to suggest that by doing what has been done in the House of Commons, if only procedurally, we are going towards abolition of this assembly.

I do not believe that the honourable senator could prove convincingly what he seems to have said. However, I would like to draw his attention to the rules of our assembly, since he seems to have suggested, like Senator Grosart, that the fact of doing this, of not referring this study to the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, contravenes rules 67(1)(i) of our rules.

This rule certainly does not give any instruction as to the composition of our committees. This rule gives the Senate the power to refer any legislation to any one of its committees. For instance, paragraph (i) of rule 67(1) of our rules includes the words "on motion", which allow for various motions, such as a motion to refer one of the subjects mentioned to another Senate committee.

[English]

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, on a point of order, I think it is clear, if the translation I am hearing is correct, that the honourable senator is making comments on comments. He referred to one comment I made, which was not a question. I am suggesting that it is quite improper to make at this time the kind of speech that would be made in closing the debate. If the honourable senator wishes to say, "I was asked these specific questions," and then replies to them, I would say he would be quite in order.

I am not really being critical in this, but I believe it is important that any comment from Senator Langlois should come after a full discussion, which may follow the adjournment of the debate today. I know he is concerned about the rules, and I am merely suggesting that this may be the position. He may be confusing his right to answer questions with his right to comment on the course of the debate when he is closing the debate.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I am surprised at the attitude of my honourable friend, Senator Grosart. We are dealing with an urgent matter. It was considered urgent not only in this house but also in the other place—so much so that the formation of a special committee was agreed to in the other place without debate or discussion.

Senator Flynn: Do you want to close the debate or not?

Senator Langlois: I am not closing the debate.

Senator Flynn: When you say it is urgent, what do you mean? Are you insisting on closing the debate? What is so urgent about your reply? You can reply when the debate is over.

Senator Langlois: We want to have the motion passed as soon as possible.

Senator Flynn: But you are not helping matters.

Senator Langlois: Do you think you would be helping in adjourning the debate?

Senator Flynn: I will certainly do so if you keep that up.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have some comments to make from the back benches.

Senator Flynn: I am quite sure the honourable senator will be very objective.

Senator Buckwold: I shall be objective to the extent that I am trying to find some consistency in the attitude taken by the opposition, as expressed by the Leader and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. Just a few weeks ago this chamber appointed a special committee to deal with the question of aging and retirement. Let us look at the Health, Welfare and Science Committee—

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, on a point of order, surely the situation is that the Deputy Leader of the Government—

Senator Buckwold: Madam Speaker, I believe I have the floor.

Senator Grosart: I am rising on a point of order. Perhaps the honourable senator is not aware of our rules. I should remind him that any senator who rises on a point of order has the floor.

Senator Argue: Provided he has a point of order.

Senator Grosart: The point of order, which I was starting to explain, is that the Deputy Leader of the Government was, presumably, answering questions. He had not finished answering those questions, and he had not yielded the floor to Senator Buckwold. My understanding is that Senator Buckwold rose to comment on the motion before the house, which at some point he is perfectly entitled to do. I am merely suggesting that it is not in order for him to do so when Senator Langlois has the floor, which I believe he has.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, certainly it would be presumptuous of me to rise when the deputy leader has the floor. I would be relegated even further on the back benches. I am participating in the debate.

All I am saying is that there are many precedents for the appointment by this chamber of special committees on subjects of national and vital interest which could rightly have been referred to a standing committee. We did it in this house just a few weeks ago in connection with the Special Senate Committee on Retirement Age Policies.

Senator Flynn: We did it for Senator Croll. But Senator Croll is always a special case.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, it is rather funny that the moment we find the soft underbelly of the gentlemen opposite, they immediately rise as if they have been pinpricked.

Senator Flynn: Not really. I just couldn't miss the opportunity I was offered.

Senator Buckwold: I wish to draw the attention of the Senate, despite the eloquence of the gentlemen across the way, to the fact that there are many precedents in this chamber for appointing special committees on matters of national interest, which supersede what are perhaps the more narrow confines of a standing committee. We have done that on many occasions. That really is the answer to the points raised by the opposition.

Senator Grosart: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Would he cite an instance of where a bill has been referred to a special committee? I emphasize "a bill" because that is what we are dealing with, or the subject matter of a bill.

Senator Buckwold: Again the answer is obvious. It is not the bill that is being referred; it is the subject matter that is being referred.

Senator Grosart: Can the honourable senator cite an example of where the subject matter of a bill has been so referred?

Senator Flynn: What is the difference?

Senator Buckwold: That is up to you to determine. The fact is that the subject matter has been referred.

Senator Flynn: If you can't explain the difference, you should not make a point of underlining it.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before the motion to adjourn is moved, I should like to remind you that when the Senate rises the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will meet in room 263-S to consider its report on the Accommodation Program of the Department of Public Works, and the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will meet in room 356-S in connection with its inquiry into the desirability of long-term stabilization in the Canadian beef industry.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, March 7, 1978, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, before the question is put, I should like to give you a brief resumé of what we can expect in the Senate and its committees next week.

Next Tuesday we shall continue with the items now on the order paper and proceed with second reading of the two bills that have come before us today from the other place, namely, Bill C-16, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act, and Bill C-27, to amend the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act.

The meetings of committees scheduled for Tuesday are as follows: The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 9.30 a.m. to consider the Green Paper on Public Access to Government Documents; the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will meet at 2.00 p.m. to consider long-term stabilization of the Canadian beef industry; the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science Subcommittee on Childhood Experiences as Causes of Criminal Behaviour will meet at 4.00 p.m.

On Wednesday, the Banking Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. to consider the subject matter of Bill C-13, to amend the Combines Investigation Act. The Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee will meet when the Senate rises to hear witnesses on Bill S-7, to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Lucien Roch Joseph Morin and Marie Rose Hélène Morin.

On Thursday, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at its usual time, 9.30 a.m., to consider Bill S-3, respecting Canadian non-profit corporations. The Transport and Communications Committee will also meet at 9.30 a.m. to consider Bill C-2, respecting fishing and recreational harbours. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments is scheduled to meet at 11.00 a.m.

Motion agreed to.

THE ECONOMY

DECISION TO BORROW ABROAD TO SUPPORT CANADIAN DOLLAR—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on February 22 a question was asked by Senator Grosart with respect to a decision by the Government of Canada, as announced in the other place by the Minister of Finance, to borrow money abroad to support the Canadian dollar. I have just received a communiqué from the office of the Minister of Finance, which reads as follows:

The decision to borrow abroad was made by the Minister of Finance on behalf of the Government, on Tuesday, February 21, 1978. It was announced via a press release issued by the Department of Finance on Tuesday evening.

Prior to making this decision, the minister, of course, had the benefit of advice from officials of his Department and the Bank of Canada.

● (1410)

Senator Flynn: Did the minister consult Senator Argue on whether an 85-cent dollar would be better for grain growers?

Senator Argue: We like it the way it is.

Senator Langlois: That is your answer.

THE SENATE

NEWSPAPER REPORT OF MINISTER'S PURPORTED SUGGESTION FOR ABOLITION—QUESTION

Senator Yuzyk: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate? I have before me a copy of a news item from the Star-Phoenix of Monday, February 27, 1978, with the heading, "Lang says Canadian Senate should be abolished."

Senator Flynn: Who is Lang?

Senator Yuzyk: Minister of Transport Otto Lang. I have to make that clear. I should like to ask the government leader if he could give us any idea whether Mr. Lang has support in the cabinet, and what his reactions are to such a statement.

Senator Flynn: That is a difficult question.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can report that I had a conversation with the Honourable the Minister of Transport yesterday in which he discussed with me a news report that is purported to have appeared in one of the western newspapers. Mr. Lang suggested in this conversation that his remarks had really been taken out of context, and that he did not wish to convey the opinion that he does not possess the highest respect for the members of this chamber.

Senator Flynn: For the members only?

Senator Perrault: And for the institution.

OFFICIAL RECORD

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of our proceedings last night and the report of those proceedings in the Debates of the Senate dated Wednesday, March 1, 1978.

My purpose in rising is to retract a statement I made on that occasion, not once but three times, to the effect that the Leader of the Government, in discussing the allocation of subjects to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, had omitted to use or read the word "pipelines." I said that the record of our proceedings would show whether I was right or wrong, and they show that I was wrong.

The proceedings make it quite clear that in spite of my remarks that he had not used that word, he did do so, as reported on page 387, when he said:

On page 18 of Rules of the Senate we see where transport and communications by land, air, water, and space are matters which may be referred to that committee, as are radio, television, common carriers, pipelines, transmission lines, and so on.

I therefore ask permission to retract the statements I made, and to make my apology to the Leader of the Government.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Langlois: You won't be prosecuted.

Senator Perrault: I certainly appreciate the extreme parliamentary courtesy extended on this occasion by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition.

NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Langlois:

That a special committee of the Senate be appointed to consider legislation concerning a northern gas pipeline or the subject matter thereof in advance of such legislation coming before the Senate; and

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, my purpose in adjourning the debate last evening was to keep the discussion open in the event that others on this side wished to participate. Since there do not seem to be any others, I shall say a few words before the matter comes to a vote.

I think it is acknowledged that it comes down to the question of whether this subject matter should be referred to a special committee or to one of our standing committees. If it were to be referred to one of our standing committees, there is no doubt, given that pipelines come under the jurisdiction of the Transport and Communications Committee, that that is the committee to which it would be referred. There can be no doubt that the main thrust or purpose of the proposed bill is to enable the construction of a pipeline and other matters incidental thereto.

I think it is unfortunate that the reasons were not given for referring this matter to a special committee when the motion was first put forth. Certain reasons have since been given, most of which, to my mind, are not very convincing. In fact, the only one to which there seemed to be any substance was that the establishment of a special committee would allow the appointment of those senators who have special knowledge or expertise on the subject of pipelines.

The reference to the fact that other committees might also have an interest in the subject is, to my mind, of little importance; indeed, one will find an overlapping in the terms of reference of our various committees.

With respect to the suggestion of the Leader of the Government that the membership of a special committee could be made up of those members of our standing committees who are in a position to contribute their understanding and special expertise to the subject of pipelines, this can be achieved with or without those persons being members of the committee. Any senator has the right to attend committee meetings and participate in every way in the activities of any of our committees, the only restriction being that only members of the committee can vote.

The Leader of the Government mentioned that he anticipated that these objections would be raised. That being so, I am wondering why an explanation was not given as to the reason for the motion in the first instance.

Given the manner in which the whole matter has been handled, I could well understand if the members of the Transport and Communications Committee felt that they had been passed over when an important piece of legislation is to be considered. They might well feel—and I hope they do not—that the government has a general lack of confidence in their knowledge and ability to examine a measure such as this. I would hope that when consideration is given to the composition of this special committee, assuming that the motion is passed, the members of the Transport and Communications Committee will be given the first opportunity to become members of that special committee. Personally, I would urge the government, even at this late date, to withdraw this motion and to substitute therefor a motion to the effect that the subject matter of this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, before the deputy leader answers, I wonder if he could give us some reply to the suggestion made yesterday by Senator Asselin, if my memory serves, or some explanation as to why it was the government did not feel it appropriate to proceed in that way. As I understood the Honourable Senator Asselin, he suggested that the existing members of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications could be replaced in whatever instances were necessary by people with special knowledge or capacity in this field.

I wonder if the honourable the deputy leader would address himself to that point among others.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Langlois speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on this substantive motion.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I should commence my remarks by answering the question just put to me by Senator Forsey. Indeed, I intended in the course of my remarks this afternoon to cover the very point that he has raised, and which was raised yesterday by Senator Asselin.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, yesterday the Honourable Senator Flynn referred to the urgency of getting the pipeline legislation through, but what he apparently meant was to emphasize the urgency for the government to get the project going for electoral purposes, given the likelihood of forthcoming general elections. In my opinion, the prospect of the impending elections seems to bring back to the honourable senator's mind the nightmares and disappointments his party experienced in the past, to such an extent that he seems no longer aware of the considerable damage which could result from delaying the construction of the pipeline project for several months. The work may not even be started until as late as the fall of 1978 or even the spring of 1979 unless the Canadian Parliament manages to get this legislation through before dissolution, which is expected to take place within a few months.

The honourable senator is certainly aware that in the other place all political parties except one, to which he does not belong anyway, have refused to delay referring this bill to an ad hoc committee because of the impact this project will have on the Canadian economy and the general benefits which will result for the whole of Canada without any concern for their own interests as a political party. With this in mind, after reading over the official report of the House of Commons debates, a little too rapidly, I admit, yesterday evening, I picked up a few comments on this bill, particularly from the Conservative member for the Yukon, Mr. Nielsen, who referred to this bill as a "bill national in scope" and added it was a project "so essential to Canadian interest—"

Senator Asselin: On a point of order. I am under the impression that the honourable senator who now has the floor is completely beside the point. I raise a point of order to the effect that the official opposition never stated that it wanted to delay the passage of the bill. In his remarks yesterday, the Leader of the Opposition did not say so. All the Leader of the Opposition said yesterday in his remarks was to the effect that he was begging the Leader of the Government and his deputy leader to refer this bill to the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. There has never been any question about it, and that is why I think that by making the kind of remarks he is presently doing, Senator Langlois is actually indulging in politicking. That I cannot accept.

Senator Flynn never said that he wanted to delay the passing of that bill. He never said that this is what the official opposition wanted. During the debate, his position was simply to ask the Leader of the Government to refer this bill to the appropriate committee, namely, the Senate committee on Transport and Communications. And when the deputy leader tells us that we are trying to delay the passage of the bill, I think he is completely misrepresenting the facts and the actual debates which took place in the house yesterday.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I submit that this is not a point of order; this is a little politically oriented speech which once again is quite irrelevant. Yesterday, as I said before, if the honourable senator had listened to me and if he had listened to his leader yesterday, he would have realized that Senator Flynn had said that the project was urgent for one reason only, namely, that the government wanted this project to be underway before the elections to gain political advantage during the electoral campaign. I challenge my honourable friend to prove to me that his colleague the Leader of the Opposition did not say that. It is to that remark only that I am responding now.

Let me continue. Senator Flynn is certainly aware, as I suggested earlier, that the other place did not criticize at all the urgency to pass this bill and get on with that construction. This project was even called very important and of national dimension. I will continue by saying that if I was surprised by the attitude of Senator Flynn I was even more surprised by that of my friend Senator Grosart who, I think, seemed to agree with the motion last Tuesday, February 21, when I gave notice of the motion now before the house, as he also did in a telephone conversation he had that very evening with my leader. I was not witness to that conversation but I am relying on the information I received from my leader in that respect. However, I was particularly amazed by the attitude of our colleague when he implied that this bill was being referred to a special committee simply because the chairman of the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications was his colleague Senator Smith (Colchester).

Honourable senators, I was one of those who suggested the election of Senator Smith as chairman of that committee. I even believe I was the first one to do so. I recall talking about it first to the Leader of the Opposition, Senator Flynn, because Senator Smith was absent then. I also recall and I believe, unless I am mistaken, that I was the first to tell Senator Smith he had been elected chairman of that committee when we met by chance on the same plane going from Montreal to Quebec City.

I have much respect for Senator Smith, as do all my colleagues in this committee, so I have been very upset to hear such an allusion in this house even if it was formulated in thinly veiled terms. Never have I had any reason to doubt not only the competence but the impartiality of Senator Smith. And if such had been the case, I would have had the courage to tell him instead of making public allusions in this house or outside. So I give my full support to the appreciation expressed yesterday in this house by our deputy chairman of the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, Senator Bourget, as concerns our dedicated committee chairman. I would like to assure him of the complete confidence and respect of every member of the committee.

Now, as concerns Senator Asselin—I regret that he has left his seat—I do not think he has impressed many of our colleagues in this house by saying that the mere fact that the Senate is adopting a similar procedure to that followed in the other place concerning the bill under study justifies the representations of those asking for the abolition of this house. In fact, it is not the first time that the Senate has referred a substantive motion to a special committee even though, according to our rules we might prefer another committee. I have studied precedents and have found several cases where this house referred public bills to committees other than those to which they would have been referred had we followed the rules. I could give you several examples and the first one that comes to my mind was in 1928. It was a bill entitled "An Act to amend the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act" that was referred to a special committee of the Senate even though at that time this house had a Standing Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. There was also another bill from the House of Commons, Bill 290, also in 1928, entitled "An Act to amend the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act" that was referred to a special committee of this house. And again in 1928, another bill of the House of Commons, Bill 289, "An Act to amend the Pension Act" was referred to another committee of this house although there was a Standing Committee on Public Welfare to which it could have been sent.

And in 1930, Bill 265, "An Act to amend the Pension Act" was referred to another committee although there was a Senate Standing Committee on Public Welfare to which it could have been sent.

Still in 1930, another bill, Bill 19, "An Act respecting War Veterans' Allowances", was referred to a special committee. It was another bill coming from the House of Commons.

In 1931, Bill 113, "An Act to amend the Criminal Code", was also referred to a special committee of this house. In 1936, Bill E2, a Senate bill entitled "An Act to enable the establishment, operation and maintenance of free foreign trade zones by provinces and municipalities or by public agencies of either thereof". This was another bill sent to a special committee of the Senate. And there were many more.

In 1931, Bill A-1, "An Act to provide for Alien Identification Cards", was referred to a special committee of this house, although there was a Standing Committee on Immigration. Also in 1931, Bill (G), "An Act to amend the Criminal Code as regards the use of force to prevent escapes by flight", was referred to a Senate special committee.

Here is a typical example that certainly will impress honourable senators. It was Bill (B), "An Act respecting Divorce and Matrimonial Causes". The bill was referred to a House committee, although we had at that time a Standing Committee on Divorce that was fully operative, and indeed at the height of its glory.

Finally, in 1940, Bill 99 "An Act respecting debts due to the Crown.", was referred to a special committee of this house, although we had a Standing Committee on National Finance, et cetera, until 1958.

I believe I have given enough references. I have no wish to further impose on honourable senators with other cases. This should convince honourable senators, not only that we did not blindly imitate the House of Commons but that we have followed a long standing practice of this house when we referred a bill to a special committee, although there were provisions in our rules for the establishment of a standing committee which could have examined this legislation.

Going further on yesterday's statement by Senator Asselin, I would like to add that I am not in agreement with his apparent interpretation of rule 67, that the Senate did not have the option of referring to another of its committees, let alone a special committee, any of the matters listed therein as being the responsibility of a particular standing committee.

First I would like to point out to honourable senators that under rule 67, two committees only can scrutinize on their own initiative certain particular matters. Those are the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration and the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

As regards other standing committees, under rule 67 they must first obtain a referral under a Senate motion before they may look into matters of their stated responsibilities. Nothing in that rule can make me doubt or even suspect that the Senate might not refer certain matters to a committee other than the one to which it is allocated under rule 67. I would also refer honourable senators to rule 2, which provides:

Except so far as is expressly provided, these rules shall in no way restrict the mode in which the Senate may exercise and uphold its powers, privileges and immunities.

I think that this rule lends us full support and gives us all the latitude required to depart from or even violate, if you will, any other rule, unless the rules contain a clear indication to the contrary.

Now, I will get back to the specific purpose of setting up a special committee to study the pipeline legislation. Besides, this purpose was described yesterday by my leader, and I say this particularly to Senator Macdonald, namely, that the purpose consists in having this legislation studied by senators from localities closer to the project who would therefore be more directly involved. To my mind, this project concerns primarily the regions of western Canada that are more likely than any other region in Canada to be affected at the ecological, economic and sociological levels and even from the standpoint of their natural resources. As far as I am concerned, it would be unthinkable not to seek in these regions all the expertise we need about the needs, the conditions and the regional interests of that part of Canada. Some senators representing the western part of the country in this chamber have that expertise. Furthermore, to that end, I would like to remind honourable senators that a brief look at the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications as it stands now shows that of the 22 members of the committee, 18 come from eastern Canada whereas only four come from western Canada. I take the far western frontier of Ontario as the division line between east and west. In this regard, I feel the committee representation is altogether unbalanced.

While supporting the point of view expressed by his leader, Senator Asselin gave an excellent reason for not entrusting this task to our Standing Committee on Transport and Communications as now constituted. In fact, Senator Asselin, while suggesting that this legislation be sent to our Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, insisted that its composition be changed to introduce into its ranks the expertise required to do a good job of studying the proposed legislation. I have just given you the membership of our committee. I believe I have thereby proved that it does not represent equitably the western regions of our country.

Instead of reorganizing the committee as it now stands, the motion before the Senate suggests, and rightly so to my mind, that we form a special committee on which members of the Senate could sit who represent the areas of the country most concerned in the project. That proposal would avoid changing the present constitution of a committee which, I believe, works quite well and which in the past gave proof that it has expertise in the general field of transport and communications, and would enable us to avail ourselves of its services for the important tasks it has performed until now. Besides, it is now studying Bill C-2, an act respecting the administration and development of certain fishing and recreational harbours in Canada. Judging from the debate in this place the other day, and the first sitting of the committee this morning, I think the committee will be kept busy by this bill for weeks to come. In addition, that is not the only bill that may be sent to the committee during this session, for many others could be sent to it, of which among others, the bill that kept it busy for several weeks last summer when the committee studied the bill on the Canadian Maritime Code, on which it did a lot of work and which it sent back, with about 80 proposed amendments, to the House of Commons. That bill, honourable senators, according to my information, is just about ready to come back to us. It is therefore important not to jeopardize, in advance, the work that remains to be done by that important committee of the Senate, when that bill comes before us again.

Honourable senators, I conclude my remarks by commending to your support, with all the persuasion at my command, the motion now before us.

[English]

Senator Phillips: I should like to direct a question to the Honourable Senator Langlois. Will he please tell us how many members the special committee will have and, in view of the fact that he spoke of the geographical distribution of the membership of the Transport and Communications Committee, could he give us some indication of how this membership will be divided among the geographical areas?

Senator Langlois: At this stage of the session, and having regard to the work which is presently before our committees, I believe we will have to limit this committee to something in the order of 14 or 15 members. It is our intention to see that the western part of the country is well represented on this committee because, as I have just said in French, there are aspects of this legislation which will be of interest to that part of Canada. It is a project which might cause some difficulties in regard to the ecology of the region, and create social problems for the Indian population in the territory inhabited by them. There is also the fact that this is a natural resource which so far belongs to the west. We have yet to find oil or gas in commercial quantities in eastern Canada.

I do not believe senators from eastern Canada would like to see such an immense project built in eastern Canada without adequate representation of that part of the country on the committee that considers the legislation. I would not like to be a member of a committee that will take a decision of this type when my part of the country is not concerned in it, for then I would be speaking on behalf of someone else. Although this committee must be limited to 15 members, we have to bear in mind that does not prevent other senators from eastern Canada attending the meetings and taking part in the discussion. Of course, they will have no vote, but they will be able to voice their points of view, which is an important matter.

I hope I have answered the question. I have given the composition of the Transport and Communications Committee as it stands at present, which is 4 westerners against 18 easterners. I do not think this is a fair balance in a committee to which legislation affecting western Canada would be referred.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I was of the opinion that the pipeline is a matter of national concern, and not solely a concern to those in western Canada, as Senator Langlois states.

Senator Langlois: I understand that, and that is why I said that there is nothing to prevent other members of this house from attending the meetings. Of course, it is a project of national stature, but it will particularly affect the regions of western Canada, and not so much those of eastern Canada. There is the ecology, as I mentioned, and there are social problems created by the fact that this project will cross the Yukon Territory and part of the Northwest Territories, and will affect the population there. Who are the best spokesmen for this population, other than Senator Lucier and other senators from western Canada? I know nothing about the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, and I would be a poor spokesman to represent the population of those regions.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, reference was made by the deputy leader to a private conversation, and, as I understood him, I thought he said that he was surprised that I had opposed the motion after that private conversation. If that is a correct interpretation of what was said, I will not comment on the appropriateness of bringing such conversations before the Senate. However, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government if he will agree that the substance of that private conversation was to ask me, in the absence of Senator Flynn, the Leader of the Opposition, if we on this side would agree to give leave to give notice. I would ask him if that was the total substance of our conversation.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not think much can be achieved by discussing a private conversation with respect to the business of the Senate, and it would not be my intention to suggest that the official opposition has anything but an absolute right to adopt whatever stance or position they may choose with respect to this special committee, and even to alter their views with respect to that special committee.

As the result of a conversation with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, I was under the impression that the opposition at one point generally accepted the idea of a special committee to study the subject of the northern natural gas pipeline. Perhaps at that time there may not have been a full opportunity for opposition members to discuss the matter. Perhaps I misunderstood. In any case, I feel no sense of chagrin or grievance about any events or changes in policy which may have taken place after this conversation.

I do want to point out, however, that the matter of a special committee should be an all-party exercise and concern. I think it is very important that all Canadian regions be officially represented on that committee. It is national work.

Senator Grosart: That was not my question.

Senator Perrault: Among other things, we most certainly discussed the idea of notice of motion and obtaining leave. There is no question about it.

Senator Grosart: That is all I need.

Senator Perrault: I do not believe the honourable senator or I need engage in any recrimination about the point. Of course, government and opposition discuss matters of this type on a continuing basis.

Senator Grosart: There is perhaps a danger of my being misunderstood. The reason I rose was that I understood the deputy leader to say that he was surprised that I had opposed the motion after undertaking, as far as this group is concerned, that we would not oppose notice of a motion.

Agreement to the principle of leave for notice of motion, when we do not even know what it is, is in no way binding to any undertaking prior to the debate taking place. That is the only point I want to make.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the first report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the National Capital Region, which was presented yesterday.

Senator Marchand moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, I believe this is a simple report which includes two points. I think it is not necessary to indicate why the report of the committee has been delayed.

That is the first point. We simply need another delay to complete the report.

In addition, the committee asks that it be authorized, of course, to travel, to go particularly perhaps to Washington to find out how the national district works in Washington.

So this is, I think, a very simple resolution, and I humbly submit to my colleagues that it should be accepted now.

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, would Senator Marchand allow me to ask him the following question: how many working meetings has that committee held since its re-establishment on December 13? Furthermore, is the extension being requested for a definite or indefinite period?

Senator Marchand: Offhand, honourable senators, I believe that four or five meetings have been held since December 10 because there was the Christmas and New Year's recess.

As to the second question, we are asking for an extension to about May 1, honourable senators, to produce the report.

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, I was a member of that committee. I am under the impression that in the present climate, basically a pre-election climate, that committee could be in danger of becoming an arena for partisan politics and municipal politics. So I have doubts as to its capacity, its ability to produce a valid report for the nation as a whole on what is much more important from a national point of view than a local point of view, the National Capital of Canada, in a pre-election period.

Personally, I would not be very sorry if the committee were to close shop before the dissolution of Parliament, if that were to happen soon. I cannot go beyond that. I do not know any more than anyone else whether that will happen soon or not. In any case, I do not object to this report being tabled, as was done in the other place. However, if it should be asked that this report be agreed to, to that I will object.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it gives me great pleasure to welcome the Parliamentary Interns from British Columbia.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, 8th March, 1978, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Grosart: May I, as a matter of course, ask the reason for this motion, because on this side, owing to our own problems, we feel that if a committee requests permission to sit when the Senate is sitting there should be particular reason for it.

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, we have been spending some time considering Bill S-2, which includes a substantial number of amendments to the Canada Business Corporations Act. We have reached the stage at which there are still some amendments to be disposed of at the earliest possible date, owing to their importance, which importance will be stated in the committee tomorrow. I do not feel I should make that statement at this time, because I am not officially aware of that matter yet, although I am, unofficially.

Senator Grosart: I take it that the honourable senator is saying it is a matter of urgency.

Senator Hayden: Yes.
Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

STRIKE OF BEEF PRODUCERS IN SASKATCHEWAN AND MANITOBA—MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER RULE 46(g) TO CONSIDER MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, pursuant to rule 46(g), I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Steuart:

That the Senate do now adjourn for the purpose of considering a matter of urgent public importance; namely, the strike of beef producers in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, the subsequent drastic reduction in cattle marketings, the laying-off of employees at the auction markets and in the packing houses and the need for action to establish confidence among beef producers.

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Flynn: On a point of order, I should like to know what rule of the Senate this motion is moved under.

Senator Molgat: Rule 46(g).

Senator Flynn: Rule 46(g)? Why would the mover not use the proper method of asking leave to proceed with an inquiry on this matter later this evening? I do not see the point in this. There are many matters of urgency, but whether the urgency is of such a nature that a debate in the Senate is immediately required is something else. I can't see what he would settle by debating this matter before any other that is before us tonight. And I really don't see anything in the rules that would allow us to do that.

Senator Langlois: Yes, rule 46(g), page 12.

Senator Flynn: I suggest it would have been better to have asked for leave to proceed by means of a notice of inquiry, placed properly at the end of the order paper for tonight, rather than by means of this device, which is, I submit, simply a matter of propaganda.

Senator Langlois: The Leader of the Opposition—

Senator Flynn: I am sorry if I have said anything that Senator Langlois doesn't like. Every time I say something that Senator Langlois doesn't agree with he gets carried away, as he did last Thursday.

Senator Langlois: You should have been here last Thursday.

Senator Flynn: Yes, I should have been here and I wasn't. But I will be here tomorrow, and I hope that Senator Langlois will be too. The honourable senator should not become annoyed every time we on this side of the house criticize him.

[Senator Grosart.]

Because if we can't criticize him then we might just as well not be here.

An Hon. Senator: We need you.

Senator Flynn: The honourable senator says "We need you," but Senator Langlois, I'm sure, doesn't agree. Whenever we criticize the government—

Senator Langlois: I haven't said a word tonight.

Senator Flynn: You didn't say a word, but you grumbled, as you usually do.

Senator Langlois: I didn't say a thing.

Senator Flynn: I have no objection to the motion. If Senator Molgat wants the motion placed on the order paper for tonight in its proper place, I have no objection at all. That is the only point I want to make. I have no objection to dealing with this matter tonight; but he could have said "With leave, I would like this to be put on the order paper tonight." The device Senator Molgat has had recourse to is one that is never used in this house. And in this case it was unwarranted. I do not think the subject matter really deserves to take precedence over the other matters we have before us.

Senator Denis: You have just said it.

Senator Flynn: How nice of you to notice.

Senator Denis: Well, you should sit down now.

Senator Flynn: I suggest that the honourable senator could address similar comments to Senator Langlois when he is repetitious.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, is a motion for adjournment debatable?

Senator Molgat: Yes.

Senator Bonnell: I thought that a motion for adjournment was not debatable.

Senator Flynn: This is. Our rule is not the same rule as in the other place where there has to be unanimous consent.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, if I have agreement, I am prepared to make my case. Certainly the subject matter is debatable and I understand that debate will be allowed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I regret that my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, seems to think that my motion is a frivolous one.

Senator Flynn: I didn't say that. Don't imitate your deputy leader, for God's sake.

Senator Langlois: You are a bad enough example yourself.

Senator Molgat: I do not want to put words in my honourable friend's mouth, but he did use the words "propaganda" and "device".

Senator Langlois: Yes, he did.

Senator Flynn: I did say "device." But I also suggested to the honourable senator what I think would have been the better way to proceed tonight. I am prepared to give leave to have the motion put in its proper place on the order paper tonight.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I repeat that I regret that my honourable friend does not seem to understand the importance of the motion.

Senator Flynn: You are misinterpreting what I said.

Senator Molgat: I can only assume that that is what the leader means if he says it is propaganda and a device. I submit, honourable senators, that it is not. The issue that I raise is, in fact, an important issue and it is urgent, because the matter is directly before us at this time.

Senator Flynn: And if we discuss it at 9.15 p.m. instead of a quarter to nine, what difference will that make? I said we would give leave to discuss this matter if you put it on the order paper in its proper place.

Senator Molgat: I can only conclude that the Leader of the Opposition does not read newspapers, that he does not know and does not understand what is going on in the agricultural community, because this subject is an urgent one.

Senator Flynn: You're not only deaf; you're dumb.

Senator Molgat: The motion I am placing before the Senate is perfectly in order. It is within the rules. This is a perfectly proper procedure, and it is one that I submit might be used more frequently in this chamber.

Be that as it may, the situation that exists at the moment, only in Manitoba and Saskatchewan—and if it were not only in those two provinces it might well be regarded as a serious national problem—is a symptom of a serious difficulty that exists in the whole of the agricultural community in this country, and that is why it is of urgent importance now.

This is what has been going on. Very recently a group of farmers in western Canada, who are not associated with any political party or with any existing group or association of farmers, who are simply farmers acting on their own, have established an association, and within a very short time have started a strike of farmers. In the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan at the moment cattle marketings have almost completely ceased. There are almost no cattle coming to market. You can check this with the livestock yards in Winnipeg or Prince Albert or any other market in Manitoba or Saskatchewan. There is very little moving in. The reduction has been something in the order of 75 per cent. In other words, only 25 per cent of the normal number of cattle is coming on to the market.

Senator Riley: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit a question? Is he referring to 75 per cent of the beef that is slaughtered in Canada, or 75 per cent of the beef that is slaughtered in those two provinces?

Senator Molgat: No, it is 75 per cent of the normal marketings in those two provinces, through those channels.

The farmers' strike, with picketers at the various yards, has simply decreased the number of cattle moving in. In addition to this, many other farmers are voluntarily not shipping, because they are sympathetic to the strike.

The serious issue is: Why is this happening? Why is it that a group of farmers is taking this action? That is the fundamental, deep issue before us. These farmers are reacting to an extremely serious economic situation in their particular industry. They are finding—and I will admit that this is not the first time that this has been debated in this chamber—that they simply cannot continue to produce at present prices. They are finding that their incomes are going down rather than up, and that their debts are increasing steadily. To give you an example, I will quote from the Regina Leader-Post, as follows:

The debt position of Canadian farmers increased to $9.5 billion from $6.9 billion in two years, and many producers are having to take out new loans to pay outstanding loans.

The farmers simply cannot continue. Hence they are having this strike.

I shall discuss briefly the other effects of the strike. Obviously, if it continues it will mean a very serious problem insofar as food supplies in those two provinces. I think, in a very reasonable and realistic manner, the farmers who have organized this strike have agreed that they will not continue it on an extended basis, but will do so for a period of two weeks. The reason they are acting in what I consider to be a very reasonable and responsible manner is that they want to impress on the Canadian people the position in which they find themselves. The fact is that they simply cannot continue, and they must bring their difficulty to the attention of the overall Canadian community. This is why this house must pay serious attention to the problem that this exemplifies. I repeat, I think that the farmers have acted in a reasonable, responsible manner, but their problem cannot be allowed to continue in this way.

● (2020)

What are we to do? What do we in our responsible position in government do about this? The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, chaired by Senator Argue with senators from both sides of this chamber as members, has been studying for a little over a year the problems of the beef industry in Canada. I give credit to Senator Argue for having launched this inquiry some 18 months ago.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear.

Senator Molgat: It was evident then that there was a problem and that action should be taken. An interim report has been submitted by that committee and adopted by this chamber, but I regret to say that no action has been taken on the recommendations in that report. I think it is urgent that action be taken. The reason why the debate should be allowed now is that this house—

Senator Flynn: But the debate is in progress—at least, I hope it is. Are you debating the urgency of the matter, or debating the debate itself?

Senator Molgat: I am absolutely within the rules. My honourable friend does not like the rules.

Senator Flynn: I like the rules more than you do.

Senator Molgat: Until they are changed, these are the rules of this house, and I submit they are sound rules because they permit an opportunity to discuss urgent matters when they need to be discussed.

Recommendations have been made, but I regret to say no action has been taken on those recommendations. The Minister of Agriculture has stated on a number of occasions that he supports the idea of a long-term beef import policy for Canada, and that is precisely the first recommendation made by the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture. I quote directly from the report:

The committee recommends that Canada adopt a long-term beef import policy and that Parliament enact legislation to regulate the importation of beef, veal and live slaughter cattle.

That is Recommendation 1. Recommendation 2 follows along the same lines with further details as to how it would be imposed and how the quotas would be established.

I submit it is urgent that the Canadian government proceed with this move and that the statements made by the Minister of Agriculture some months ago indicating that he supported the idea of a long-term policy be now enacted into legislation. The strike that is presently going on in Manitoba and Saskatchewan by farmers is, I think, just a beginning unless action is taken by the government.

Honourable senators, I feel it is important at this stage, because of the urgent situation created in two provinces, that this house declare itself once again very clearly as to the course of action that ought to be taken by the Canadian government.

Senator Lang: Am I correct in assuming that the honourable senator is urging upon this chamber that it is now urgent that the government start on a long-term policy? Is not that somewhat self-contradictory?

Senator Molgat: I do not believe so, because the important thing is for the cattle producers to know that there is a policy in place. Farmers know very well that they do not make a profit every year. They are accustomed to the ups and downs, and the problems of weather and price. Unless there is a long-term policy in place, the people who are presently in the industry will lose faith, and the difficulty is that those directly affected in those two provinces now under strike are mainly the young farmers. They are people who have recently gone into the cattle business, sometimes at the urging of the government, and sometimes at the urging of bankers. There was the possibility of easy credit, and the idea that there was going to be a world shortage of beef. That has not turned out to be the case. Unless we can provide them with some assurance of continuity of a long-term policy, these unfortunate people will find themselves forced into bankruptcy and getting out of the industry altogether, and the losers in this will be the overall Canadian consumers and the Canadian economy.

[Senator Flynn.]

I think we are faced directly here with an industry that could very well find itself replaced—replaced by imports from New Zealand and Australia, for example, which can normally produce, because of their weather conditions, at lower prices than we can, and we may simply find that this industry will disappear in Canada. Hence the importance of having a long-term policy in place, so that these people in the industry can make their plans, can stay in the industry and can look forward to a future. These people are not looking for a guaranteed future, because they are not asking for any kind of income guarantee, government subsidy or anything of the sort. They are prepared to take their chances provided there is a policy on imports of beef into Canada from other nations.

So, honourable senators, I submit that the subject is urgent, that it is crucial not simply to the beef producers but to the whole Canadian economy and to the Canadian consumers, that this debate now should be heard by those in a position to make decisions, and that a policy should be established very soon. I am afraid that if that is not done we may well face further problems in the agricultural industry.

Senator Flynn: Right on.

Senator Riley: I should like to put a couple of questions to Senator Molgat. A while ago I asked him a question and he said that 75 per cent of the beef producers in Saskatchewan and Manitoba were on strike. I now ask him: What percentage of Canadian beef is slaughtered in Manitoba and Saskatchewan? I appreciate the honourable senator's concern when he says that 75 per cent of the beef producers in Saskatchewan and Manitoba are on strike, but the beef producers in Canada are concentrated mainly in Alberta and Ontario, and I should like to know how the figures for Manitoba and Saskatchewan relate to those for Alberta and Ontario. Are they on strike in Alberta and Ontario?

Senator Molgat: I have some figures province by province. I have certain figures respecting the total cattle population. Let me make it clear that I did not say 75 per cent of the producers are on strike. I said the cattle marketings at the livestock yards are down, on the average, by 75 per cent; it may vary from one yard to the other. There are other ways of marketing. There could be direct sales, so this changes the whole picture. However, the yards themselves are down to that extent. The bulk of beef cattle in this country is produced in the province of Alberta.

Senator Riley: And Ontario.

Senator Molgat: And Ontario. The province of Alberta, though, is the biggest if we are talking in terms of supplying other parts of the country. The province of Alberta supplies, particularly, the province of Quebec markets. The province of Ontario depends largely on its own marketings. Some comes in from other provinces, but to a large extent it is from within Ontario. The provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba are also substantial shippers to other parts.

• (2030)

Senator Riley: My second question, if you will permit it, Senator Molgat, is: By how much per pound, or per hundred-weight, is the federal government subsidizing beef cattle in Saskatchewan and Manitoba?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I would have to obtain some specific figures in order to answer that question in the detail that I would like. There is basically, as I recall it, no subsidy insofar as normal cattle production is concerned. There is a program for cow-calf producers, some at the provincial level and some at the federal level. There is also a program of slaughter assistance but, by and large, the industry is really not a subsidized industry, but part of a free market.

Senator Riley: I am not very conversant with this. I am only an eater of beef produced in the west, as is my family, so what I cannot understand is why in Manitoba and Saskatchewan they are on strike, and in Alberta and Ontario they are not, but are taking their chances.

An Hon. Senator: They are all farmers.

Senator Riley: They are tough guys, and again I come back to this question of subsidy and of how much per hundred-weight those producers receive. I know they are in trouble; our producers in the east are in trouble and farmers all over the bloody country are in trouble. Our potato farmers do not go on strike in the east, yet we are consumers of your beef from Manitoba and Saskatchewan. Now, why would they go on strike when the Alberta beef producers say they are not going on strike?

Senator Molgat: I am sorry, Senator Riley; I cannot reply as to exactly why farmers in other provinces are not taking the same action. However, I expect that unless something is done this present strike will extend to other provinces. That is the really serious problem before us, because the problem does not involve only those two provinces. The facts are that cattle producers have been unable to earn sufficient to even cover their costs, let alone make any profit. So I believe it will extend to other areas.

I might point out that this has been a very rapid development. This whole idea of the strike has developed since the beginning of this year. On the American side, a number of producers there picketed the entry ports from Manitoba and Saskatchewan into the United States, and completely prevented the movement of cattle for a period of some two or three weeks after the Christmas season. This may have spurred farmers in those two provinces to take action on their own. I presume that they have seen the successful American action, and decided that they could well do the same. However, the problem is not peculiar to those two provinces. The problem concerning the cattle industry is throughout our whole country.

Senator Riley: Is it not true, Senator Molgat, that the beef producers in Manitoba and Saskatchewan are not involved in producing only beef, but also dairy products? And is it not true that the people involved in the production of dairy products are making a profit?

Senator Molgat: No. In these two provinces, by and large, people are either in the beef industry producing beef for table consumption, or in the dairy industry. There is not much straddling of the two.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, like Senator Riley, I may be more familiar with the bull than the cow.

I do think this debate is urgent and timely. It is timely because the federal cabinet is travelling to Regina at the end of this week. I think the Senate should do everything in its power to impress upon them the urgency of this matter, and also impress upon them the fact that they have at hand a solution that will satisfy this group and, in fact, satisfy the 60 or 70 per cent of the people involved in the cattle industry in this nation.

The cattlemen of Alberta and Ontario could join the cattlemen of Saskatchewan and Manitoba in this strike. This occurred in the United States, and, as a matter of fact, it spread to Canada.

The Canadian agricultural movement is a recent phenomenon. It cuts across political lines. Most of those involved in this strike and movement are involved in other agricultural organizations, but they joined together in this strike out of a sense of urgency. It is urgent and it could spread. It may not appear to be a national crisis at this time, but if one looks at the facts one will find that a great many people in the cattle industry—and this is not just in Manitoba and Saskatchewan—are selling off some of their basic herds.

If Canada has to depend upon foreign producers for its beef supply, it will be a sad day, particularly for the consumers of this nation.

Yesterday I met with some of the strikers in Regina. Most of them are small producers—cow-calf operators. Most of the large ranchers are not supporting them at this time. Insofar as Saskatchewan and Manitoba are concerned, and to a lesser degree, Alberta, the strikers are, in a great many cases, the backbone of the cattle industry. And they are in trouble.

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture has a solution to this problem. In fact, I talked to the strikers about this solution and they are interested in it. If the Government of Canada were prepared to follow the recommendations in the first report brought down by the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, this strike would be over and it would not spread. A sensible solution to the major problems facing the cattle industry in Canada would be to establish an automatic quota, especially on offshore beef that is brought into this country.

These people are reasonable. They are in trouble, and they need help. I think it is a timely motion.

● (2040)

If the Senate can get behind the recommendations of the Agriculture Committee and impress on the cabinet that this indeed is a solution, it would accomplish two things. It would indicate clearly the value of the great work done by the Agriculture Committee and, at the same time, it would provide the cabinet with a ready-made solution that would be acceptable to the producers. I have it from the people engaged in this movement that it would be acceptable to them. A recent study conducted by the Wheat Pool, which is a very powerful farm organization, recommends much the same thing.

This is a motion that deserves the support of all senators. By throwing our weight behind what has already been proposed by the Agriculture Committee we will satisfy these particular cattle producers. If this recommendation is followed by the government, the cattle industry in Canada will be much more viable and will be on much safer ground than it is today.

Senator Côté: I wonder if I might put a question to the honourable senator. The word "strike" has been used a great many times during the course of the debate so far. As I understand it, a strike results from an inability on the part of an employer and his employees to reach agreement. In this particular case, who is the employer and who are the employees?

Senator Steuart: In response to that question, a strike, in another sense, is a withholding of services by employees. In this case, the cattlemen are withholding their product, and they choose to call it a strike. You may call it something else. What is happening is that a great many of the cattlemen in Saskatchewan and Manitoba are withholding their product from the market. They choose to call it a strike. Relating it to an industrial strike between employer and employees, it may not fit that exact category or definition, but certainly they call it a strike. If you want to call it something else, that's fine. They are withholding their product from the market. This, they feel, is a last resort, and constitutes the only weapon they have right now to bring their cause forcibly to the attention of the people of Canada and the Government of Canada.

An Hon. Senator: A good explanation.

Senator Riley: I wonder if I might ask Senator Steuart a question. Are they withholding their product or are they withholding food?

Senator Steuart: They are withholding their product. Since the end use of that product is food, I suppose one could say they are withholding food.

Senator Riley: They are withholding food from the rest of Canada. Is that not true?

Senator Steuart: Yes, until the rest of Canada is prepared to pay them a living wage for what they work for and what they produce.

Senator Riley: Is that what they say in Alberta and Ontario?

Senator Steuart: A great many of them will say it. If an answer is not given to the cattlemen in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, this thing could very well spread, because the problems facing these cattlemen are also facing the cattlemen in Alberta and Ontario. If it spreads, we could find ourselves in a much more serious situation a few months down the road. We have an excellent opportunity to stop this thing now. We have an excellent solution in the recommendation of the Agriculture Committee. We have an excellent opportunity to nip this thing in the bud before it becomes too serious.

An Hon. Senator: In the meantime, no one is starving.

[Senator Steuart.]

Senator Riley: What if we in the Maritimes and Quebec withheld our blueberries, our fish and our potatoes from the consumers in the west?

Senator Steuart: You would probably get a better price and they would all live happily ever after.

Senator Riley: We are not starving.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, from the explanations that have been given by Senator Molgat and Senator Steuart, the mover and seconder of this motion respectively, it is clear that this act on the part of the producers is an act of desperation.

The question was raised as to whether or not this is a strike in the usual meaning of that word. A strike, in the usual sense of the word, results in the failure of a union or organization to negotiate an agreement. This particular action is not being promoted or administered by any organization that was in place a month ago. It is not the Farmers' Union or the Stockgrowers' Association particularly. A group of beef producers in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, as a last resort, in an act of desperation, have come together in an attempt to draw public attention to the problems which have been confronting beef producers over the last three or four years.

This is a spontaneous movement or group that has sprung up only in the last three or four weeks. It was preceded by a similar situation in the United States some five or six weeks ago. There was an inability in the United States to get enough producers together, or one of the existing organizations, to actually take steps to correct the situation. The fact is that the American producers made their feelings known at the Canadian border. They know that Canada is not the major source of beef going into the United States market. It amounts to something less than 2 per cent, even at the best of times. But it was the most visible place to make their grievance known. Since that time, the price of beef in the United States has improved rather substantially.

As a matter of fact, one could argue today that the timing of this particular strike, or this withholding of supplies, may be wrong, because since the withholding of the supplies of beef started some two weeks ago, beef prices have increased rather dramatically. Indeed, there has not been a period in the last four years when beef prices have gone up so fast. Beef prices have improved dramatically in the last week particularly, but there was improvement even the week before the withholding of the product was initiated.

There are probably some people in the beef industry who will say this increase was going to come anyway. Some will say that because of the slaughter and sell-off of brood cows and replacement heifers, the total capability to produce beef in Canada is down to the point where we are heading into a deficit position, or even a greater deficit position than we have been experiencing; but they will never be able to persuade the producers who are involved in this particular strike that their action did not have something to do with bringing about increased prices when, in fact, the prices came up far more rapidly when they were on strike than previously. Exactly the same thing has happened in the United States.

I think we should look a little deeper at this cause and effect aspect of the matter. It is a sad commentary on our beef marketing system that the only time a beef producer can get a reasonable return is when there is a shortage position. The marketing structure and those people who defend it cannot tell us why we have to put up with prices to producers that are so low day after day, month after month—and, in fact, year after year—that they cannot meet their cost of production when, in fact, all that meat goes through the system and on to the consumer.

The executive vice-president of Steinberg's Limited appeared before the Agriculture Committee earlier today, and it was his view that it was wrong that the producers, over a long period of time, should go on getting deeper and deeper into debt as a result of the marketing system being unable to respond to their cost needs. Mr. Levine said very plainly that there is a place for a floor price related to the cost of production and, in his opinion, all that is necessary to achieve that is a change of attitude. Then, of course, one gets into what he meant by a change of attitude. It gets a little more difficult. But he is not happy to be part of the beef distribution system when he knows that week after week the return to the producer is below his cost of production.

It is a fact too, honourable senators, that the producers at the present time simply have no means of influencing the price that their product is sold for at two or three levels—not even at the level at which they sell it to the packer in the first instance. They do not have any means of influencing the price—except one, and that is that if they are not satisfied with the price they can withhold their product. That is one method that they have, and that is the method that they are using now. But the fact also is that that is not orderly marketing. It is also a fact that when beef is ready to sell there are only a few days during which it is in prime condition. After that it becomes too fat, and the cost of keeping it in prime condition is excessive.

Surely, honourable senators, we can find a better way than the system that is in place now so that we do not have these acts of desperation such as are now taking place in Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

A question was raised as to why Alberta and Ontario were not also involved in this. They will be before long, unless the price rises enough so that there is a chance for their producers to recover their costs—and that, by the way, is happening. I do not believe it is going to be many more days, judging by the way the price is escalating now, before they get it up to a reasonable level.

But you have to go back again and look at these people in Canada—Saskatchewan and Manitoba—as well as people in North Dakota and Montana and a couple of other states in the union who did, in fact, have a public manifestation of their grievances, and it seems to be producing results. I hope that we can find some better means than having this kind of confrontation with the public of getting any kind of justice out of the marketplace. You know, that can become a habit. The only way we can get any response to our financial requirements is to have this adversary system working in the marketplace. You have to use desperate measures to get any reasonable justice.

I certainly agree with Senator Steuart and others that there were some recommendations made to the government that would have helped the situation somewhat, and I think the fact that this has happened also puts a greater onus on the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture to find some further modifications within the beef marketing industry in Canada so that it is not only in periods of desperate shortage that a farmer can get a reasonable price for his beef.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the honourable senator who raised this question if it is his intention to move a motion that the Senate might debate, because the motion that he put was that the Senate adjourn. I do not know whether we are adjourned or not, or whether we are still debating the motion to adjourn. If we are not debating the motion and if we are adjourned, then surely we cannot continue the debate without an appropriate motion. I am not concerned too much about the procedural point, but what are we going to accomplish by just carrying on the discussion?

I would ask him a second question—and this refers to my question about the possibility, or the procedural correctness, of having a motion before us. Is the major cause of what was just called “a desperate situation,” and the situation calling for “desperate measures,” the failure of the federal government to act in a preventative way before this happened? Is this the purpose of raising the question?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I presume I am replying on the point of order, because I do not think I can reply otherwise, not having been the immediately preceding speaker.

Senator Grosart: I did not raise a point of order. I asked the honourable senator two questions.

Senator Molgat: I don't think I can reply unless the Senate so agrees. Normally, I think, it is the last speaker who has the right to reply. However, I am prepared to do so if honourable senators agree. My understanding is—

An Hon. Senator: With leave!

Senator Grosart: I am now completely confused. The honourable senator has been answering questions asked here most of the evening. I have simply asked two more. What does he need leave for?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I may not know the rules of this chamber, but in the chamber in which I had been accustomed to speak the rule was very clear—questions were allowed to the last speaker, but if there were intervening speakers, then you could not go back to a previous speaker to ask a question. That is my understanding of the rule.

Senator McIlraith: That is a correct understanding.

Senator Molgat: Thank you. That is certainly the rule as I know it.

Now, honourable senators, coming to the present rule and the motion before us, it is my understanding that a motion of this sort can be discussed as a matter of urgent public importance. This permits a discussion of the subject. It is a debatable motion; a debate can be held, and at the end of the debate the mover of the motion can ask for leave to withdraw the motion having accomplished the debate which was the purpose of the motion in the first place. That is my understanding of the rule, and it is certainly the one under which I have always operated in the Manitoba Legislature where I sat for a number of years.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, may I ask the honourable senator if he will answer the second question? I would point out to him that it has always been the custom, for as long as I have been here, for questions to be asked, within the rules, of the mover of a motion. I do not suppose a day goes by when the mover of a motion is not asked some question here, regardless of who has spoken in the intervening period.

Senator Molgat: Perhaps we should clear this matter up at some other time. I have no objection to answering, but, I repeat, it is my understanding that you may ask a question of somebody who is speaking, if he gives leave, or somebody who has just finished speaking, but if there are intervening speakers, then you cannot go back. However, I have no objections.

Senator Grosart: There is not a word to that effect in the rules.

Senator Molgat: Then possibly we should ask for a clarification on the subject. My honourable friend has been here longer than I have, but I submit that he is wrong in his interpretation of the rules. However, I leave that for another discussion.

In reply to a specific question as to whether the government has failed to act and whether the situation is caused by the failure of the government to act, yes, in my opinion, the government should have acted in establishing a long-term beef import policy. The Minister of Agriculture indicated some months ago that this would be done. I do not know why it has not proceeded further. I think it is urgent that such a measure be placed on the statute books to ensure stability within the industry. I know it is not going to answer all the questions or solve all the problems, but it would in that area at least ensure stability.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I think it is most appropriate for senators—in this instance, senators from Saskatchewan and Manitoba—to raise this as a question of urgent public importance. The rules of the Senate are excellent in that they provide this particular avenue for bringing a debate forward if, in fact, the Senate so agrees, and if it is a question of urgent public importance. The other place has a similar rule in Standing Order 43. They try it every day, but it requires unanimous consent, so really they are going through a kind of superfluous exercise—and they know it. It is a phoney type of motion, because one person—and it takes no more than one—can stop that debate.

[Senator McIlraith.]

This is a debate to discuss a question of urgent public importance and the motion is that the Senate adjourn for the purpose of discussing this question. It is a debatable motion. At the end of the debate, if the mover wishes to withdraw it, and the Senate wishes him to withdraw it, that concludes the debate. If the motion is put and carried, I take it that we would adjourn. If it is defeated, we are back to our regular business.

● (2100)

This is a vehicle, a method of bring forth a question of urgent public importance for debate. I think it is an excellent rule. Although it has not been used often in the Senate, it is something that should be used more often. How often are we criticized for failing to speak out for our regions or our provinces? We have the rule, we have the vehicle. If we can convince our colleagues that the question we raise is of urgent public importance, then in fact in this chamber we can engage in a debate.

Senator Riley was asking about the importance of the position of Manitoba and Saskatchewan in the beef business. We are not as important as Alberta, but we are major factors in the beef industry in this country.

Senator Riley: So is Ontario.

Senator Argue: Yes, Ontario is also a major factor. Now, obviously you cannot have beef cattle unless you have beef cows—unless, of course, you bring the cattle in from some other country. In Canada, Alberta has 36.9 per cent of beef cows; Saskatchewan has 28.3 per cent; Manitoba has 11.4 per cent; and Ontario has 11.5 per cent. Ontario is way down in numbers of beef cows, but beef can be and is produced as a by-product of the dairy industry. There is, therefore, a major source of beef from the dairy industry in Ontario and, of course, Ontario buys feeder calves from western Canada and puts gains on them, and thus by that avenue also produces beef.

Senator Riley: There is also processed beef.

Senator Argue: One of the major indications of the importance of these two provinces in this business is what has happened since the virtual shutdown of those two markets—the price across the country has been rising.

This is not a strike in the normal sense of the word, of course. It is a protest. Farmers go to an auction market or to a packing company, and they set up so-called picket lines. There is no force. There is no evidence of force, and no intention of force. They simply say to their fellow farmers who are bringing in loads of cattle, "Don't you think you should take them home instead of selling them today? In that way you can join in the protest." Most of the farmers and producers have been supporting the strike by staying home and keeping their cattle at home. That is why it has been effective.

On Tuesday of last week, it was 75 per cent effective, and has become more and more effective ever since. Instead of seeing the thing dying down within the two-week period, the producers have been receiving more and more support.

Obviously, the producers are not trying to starve the country of beef. It would be silly to think that by shutting down beef processing in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, that by shutting down that food supply for two weeks, all of a sudden there would be no beef in the stores across the country and people would be without that food. It is simply a method—it is a legitimate method, a valuable method, but it is not necessarily the best one—it is a valuable and legitimate method of bringing grievances to the attention of the people of this country.

It has been said here tonight, and it is 100 per cent true, that the people who are suffering the most are the young producers. This is not a movement of the old leaders, of the old farm movements. This is something that has just sprung up. There are no leaders. At least, we do not know the names of the leaders. But they have had a tremendous amount of publicity and they do have a tremendous amount of support, because the producers have been suffering. They are not just suffering this year. They have been suffering for years.

The Canadian Cattlemen's Association, which is not at all happy with this kind of protest, has said that the beef producers have lost $400 million in the last number of years. It is a combination of many circumstances, but they have really been losing money.

Senator Riley asks what subsidies or what federal money those beef producers in Saskatchewan and Manitoba get.

Senator Riley: And what provincial moneys?

Senator Argue: I do not have the provincial figures. For example, a cow-calf producer, who will tell you that he is losing $100 per calf or more, will receive a subsidy this year from the federal government. I congratulate the Minister of Agriculture who has put this program on the statute books. The amount is not as much as we would like, but it is something. Those producers will receive approximately $10.57 per cow. It is a kind of complicated formula, but it works out that a farmer with 100 cows will receive about $600 or $700. He will tell you he is losing thousands of dollars, but he is grateful for the $600 or $700.

With respect to support on slaughter cattle, last year it was paid on a quarterly basis. The prices paid to support slaughter cattle were different in the different quarters, but it worked out to about 2 cents a pound. That worked out to about $20 a head, in quick, rough figures, with a ceiling on the number on which it could be paid. Twenty dollars a head is not enough to rescue the beef producers of this country.

As has been said tonight, this agricultural movement really sprang up in the United States a couple of months ago. It was unstructured. It was not the old organizations. It just sprang up. The producers were after parity prices on all of their products—not concentrating on beef but on a broad range of products.

I have had the opportunity, and others have had the opportunity, in the last few days, to discuss with our agricultural representatives in our embassy in Washington what is happening down there. They say that never in their memory can they recall a time when so many agricultural bills were introduced in the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States. Their Senate agriculture committee has been meeting in the last few days on these very questions, and we are trying in our own way in the Senate here and in our committee to bring to the attention of the public these most important grievances of our producers.

One can take the attitude that the way to handle the beef business is to just leave it alone. Some people say that. They say, "Let us not have any barriers between us and the United States." But that does not mean, if we take that attitude, that that, in fact, is what happens. There are controls between Canada and the United States. There is tremendous pressure from beef producers in the United States to have controls on the importation of Canadian beef into the United States.

It is my contention that, instead of taking the attitude that we would just like to have free trade, as some would say is theoretically the best method, our strongest position is for the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States, for the beef producers in Canada and the beef producers in the United States, to talk about their trade problems and work out, on a fixed basis, on a known basis, the limits of trade in beef that can flow from Canada into the United States, and from the United States into Canada. Only if we have some kind of orderly understanding of our trade in beef is there any hope of having reasonable prices for the beef producers in Canada.

The American beef producers have a lot of support. The Secretary of Agriculture in the United States announced just a few days ago that from now on the beef used in the school lunch program in the United States must be American beef. As a matter of fact, they do not know yet how they will distinguish between their beef and imported beef. It may mean that only those packing companies that handle American beef exclusively will be able to provide that beef. Or perhaps they will have to go into the packing houses and differentiate there between the American beef and the imported beef.

My point is that the move is on in the United States to control the marketing of Canadian beef in the United States, and it is of urgent necessity that our government undertake immediately trade talks with the United States. It is suggested in our beef report that we should formalize the trade in beef between our two nations so as to assure Canadian producers a reasonable market.

What is the urgency of this question? The government should act. One of the reasons why we have this demonstration today is because there is a feeling among beef producers that Ottawa does not care or does not care enough. I know that the government in Ottawa does care. I know that the Minister of Agriculture cares, and I know that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce cares.

Senator Bourget: And he is going out west.

Senator Argue: And he is going out west. We are bringing forward this debate to suggest that when he goes out west, he should go with a program and should not simply say, "We are going to listen to them," because producers there have been making representations for a long time and are looking for action.

There have been controls established under the Export and Import Permits Act on beef imports into Canada—a total of 140 million pounds last year from all countries. It has continued this year. But the government has said, "We will add 1.5 per cent." Beef producers say, "Oh no, the 140 million pounds is bad enough. Why add any per cent to that?" They say, "Tell us what you are going to do in advance." The program for 1978 was not announced until we were into 1978. Producers want control over imports, they want a reasonable import, they want it based on historic figures. They consider that 140 million pounds is much too high and feel there should not be any increase in that amount which the government brought forward as a program.

The Minister of Agriculture is very strong on marketing boards. He says to beef producers, "Well, until you get a marketing board, you will have all kinds of problems; unless you have a marketing board, you can blame yourselves." I do not believe the answer is that simple or that easy. What the government should be saying to producers is, "You want a reasonable import policy, and we agree to that. You want some reasonable stabilization programs announced in advance, on a known basis—not a price that varies 90 per cent for the last five years and 95 per cent at some other time." Producers say, "If we are going to have a stabilization program, we want it known in advance."

Although it is not really clear, I believe the producers also would like to see in Ottawa, in government circles, a body of agricultural experts to whom they could come, to whom they could look for leadership, who would help solve some of their problems. We have had an ongoing development with regard to a grains policy in Canada. We have had a grains group which represented the different departments, and was established to develop a grains policy. I have been critical of the Minister of Transport who handles the grain policy, and I shall continue to be critical whenever I feel that criticism is necessary.

I say sincerely that with regard to the grain business in this country there is some momentum in developing agricultural policies. The department is on the move. Farmers can now see some action. Rail lines are being improved. There are hopper cars, and there is talk of new facilities for handling grain on the west coast. Those things are developing. Producers of beef want to be assured that their interests are being considered, that there is a developing policy, that the policy is not standing still. If they receive that kind of assurance, then I believe that the demonstrations will cease and that beef producers will feel grateful and much more secure.

Senator Riley said, "Well, it is confined to Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and they are not supporting it in Ontario." That is true. They have not supported it, but the Ontario Federation of Agriculture supported the same kind of objectives by means of a different method. When the food conference was held in Ottawa a week ago, farmers—1,200 of them—came here to what they called a counterconference, and put forward their ideas for agricultural development.

I will not say which is the better procedure—what the Ontario Federation of Agriculture did in sending 1,200 people to Ottawa to tell the authorities what should be done, or what the producers in Saskatchewan did. The Saskatchewan producers are 1,500 or 2,000 miles away, and they cannot simply drive down to Ottawa after breakfast to talk to the government. They are far away, so they undertook to do what they thought could be done effectively at home.

I am one who believes that we have to talk to the authorities, the powers that be. The cabinet will be in Regina, Alberta and Manitoba this coming weekend. I hope that the people involved will read this debate and will consider the ideas which have been put forward by those who have taken part in this debate. It is constructive to bring forward, in advance of that conference, in advance of the cabinet meeting, those things which we think should be done. I bring forward these suggestions, believing that I represent in the Senate the region from which I come—and that is my job.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture had a difficult row to hoe. One of the reasons why farmers are not supporting this in every province is that it is difficult to get farmers to agree unanimously on something. Therefore, it has been difficult for our Senate committee to bring forward the kind of report that would receive general support.

I suggest that the policies which we have brought forward with regard to imports have received general approval. As a demonstration of the kind of general approval received, I can say that invitations have come from the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, the Purebred Breeds Association, the Government of Ontario through officials of its Department of Agriculture, the Western Cow-Calf Association, and the National Farmers' Union, for members of the Agriculture Committee to appear before their conventions and meetings to discuss the committee's proposition.

It is my sincere belief that the Senate, in conducting this type of debate, can play a useful role in the development of agricultural policies that will make it possible for Canadian beef producers to have what they call parity, and which they define as having the same kind of income as those in other occupations in this country.

Senator Austin: For the sake of information, could the honourable senator give us some background on the levels of consumption of beef in Canada. Have they seen a declining per capita, or are they beginning to grow?

Senator Argue: I do not have the figures in my head, but I know that they have been growing very substantially over the past 10 years or more, from 70 pounds per capita up to 100 pounds. Perhaps Senator Olson has the figures in his mind. They have increased to 110 pounds per capita, from the point of view of consumption level. So consumption has been growing.

Senator Austin: Does the honourable senator recall whether there is a price and supply elasticity with respect to that growth?

Senator Argue: I have no doubt there is. I think the cheaper the beef, the greater the consumption. There are probably other developments which tend to provide an increase in the consumption of beef—namely, the hamburger eat-out places, and so on, where one can buy cheap fast service foods. The consumption of hamburger has been growing very rapidly, as has the consumption of beef. I have no doubt that there is elasticity.

Senator Austin: Before Senator Riley gets to his feet, may I pursue briefly with the honourable senator the question of the addition to the cost to consumers in British Columbia of a level of return to your producers that would ensure a healthy industry in Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

Senator Argue: How much more it would cost consumers in British Columbia?

Senator Austin: Yes.

Senator Argue: One has to speculate, and when I have speculated in the past it has always been dangerous. I imagine that if our producers could receive another 10 cents per pound—they may not be getting 45 cents—I am sure they would find it more reasonable. On live animals, with the dressing out, I suppose it would add 20 to 25 cents per pound to the price of beef across the board to consumers. Everything else has been going up. Costs go up all the time. When the farmer gets exactly the same price for wheat, or less, the price of bread still goes up. That, however, might be a reasonable answer to your question.

● (2120)

Senator Austin: But is it clear that it is a permanent state of affairs that American producers and other foreign producers can lay beef into Canada at a constantly competitive price vis-à-vis the Canadian producer?

Senator Argue: If Senator Hays were here he would say that in relation to the States we cannot compete. We have higher costs, and our climate is a very important factor. Certainly I do not think we can compete in any real sense with beef being produced in Australia and New Zealand. But Canadians generally have said we should have a beef industry, we should have an agricultural industry, and that while it might look economically sound for us to have all our beef produced in Australia and New Zealand, this is not the way to go. A few years ago, Canada was a net exporter of beef. Today we are a net importer of beef. We produce about 90 per cent of our own consumption, and our producers are disturbed that they are losing the Canadian market, that prices are low, and that if something is not done they will be out of business permanently.

Senator Austin: Then our best argument for the beef industry is that we require our own security of supply of food, even if it is at a somewhat higher price, and that is what I should tell consumers in British Columbia, I presume.

Senator Argue: I think that is right. Then you come to the producers and you ask them, as good Canadians, to pay perhaps a little more for textiles, and a little more for automobiles, and so on. It is a question of working out a balance. The beef producers feel that they need a somewhat higher price; they need protection from imports of beef from very low cost countries; and they feel that if they are given these kinds of breaks they can keep on using the tens of millions of acres of land in Canada that are really only suitable for the production of beef.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I should like to add a word or two to what I consider to be a very worthwhile debate. I should like to express my appreciation to Senator Molgat for drawing this matter to the attention of this chamber.

What we are seeing is a manifestation of the unrest that has resulted from the dissatisfaction on the part of farmers across the entire nation, not just in Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and not just in the cattle industry, because of the very low prices they have received for their products. It is sometimes difficult to convince Canadian consumers that the best bargain they get today is the food that is produced by our farmers. I am sorry that I do not have with me all the relevant statistics, since I was not prepared for this particular debate; but I am sure that all of you know that the percentage of our income that is spent on feeding ourselves has been steadily decreasing, in line with increased earnings of Canadians. The man who is paying the price for this is the farmer, or the fruit producer in British Columbia, or the fish producer in the maritimes. This is the malaise that is affecting the whole agricultural and fishing industries.

What we have seen in this strike, which is a relatively small one, although in our part of the world a very, very important development, is an indication of what could happen in the months ahead as this discontent spreads across the country. The group sponsoring this strike is a very unusual organization. As has been indicated, it is crossing all kinds of organizational and party lines. They call themselves the Canadian Agricultural Movement. I draw your attention to the name, because it is not just an association of cattlemen. It is the Canadian Agricultural Movement, and in our part of the world their activity has been intense. Already there have been some serious injuries on the picket lines. One man is still lying unconscious as a result of a clash between workers at one of the livestock yards, and the farmers are picketing all the yards so that the cattle cannot be delivered.

I wish at this time not only to emphasize the importance of this debate but to indicate that it is essential to let the Government of Canada, the decision makers, and particularly the cabinet—who will be meeting in Regina and discussing this issue with the people concerned—know that it is of concern to us, that we feel some action should be taken and that the matter should not be allowed to drift.

Perhaps the Canadian Agricultural Movement are asking for too much at the moment. They are suggesting they should get $100 for every cow that is marketed, and, in addition, a 15 per cent cut in the importation of cattle. That is what they say they need in order to be in at least a break-even position, and to get some return on their investment.

Senator Argue has indicated that the present subsidy is about $10 per head. The sum of $100 may be too much; but it is my hope that the cabinet members, when they go to meet with these leaders, will put something on the table that will show that they intend to review the situation, not just the importation of cattle—which is very important, and which is a subject that is discussed in this excellent Senate report—but also the question of a cash subsidy as cattle come to market. I think this is essential if these people are to avoid going bankrupt.

There is one warning that I want to issue to the Minister of Agriculture. I have an excerpt here from a Canadian Press dispatch in which it is indicated that the federal Minister of Agriculture, although he is very sympathetic to the plight of the prairie cattlemen, will soon be giving them a gentle reminder to mend their marketing ways. The dispatch goes on to say that that gentle reminder will tell them that other producer groups in supply programs are making money by the utilization of marketing boards.

This is Mr. Whelan's major push. Marketing boards, for him, are the answer. Well, I have to say that in the opinion of many of us they are not the answer, and the producers of cattle are not looking for that solution. The Saskatchewan Stock Growers' Association, which have about 6,000 members, have said that they want as little government interference as possible. They want government help, and government action, but they do not want the government telling them how to run every detail of their business, and they are strongly opposed to marketing boards. If Mr. Whelan reads this particular debate, and if it has any influence on him, I hope he will keep in mind that there are other solutions to this problem than the imposition of more bureaucracy and government intervention through marketing boards. I think it is important that he be made aware of this opposition by the cattlemen of the west, and in particular by the Saskatchewan Stock Growers' Association.

Honourable senators, I hope that you have appreciated the importance of this debate, not just because of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and because of those of us who are involved directly, but because what is happening there will move in a direction which will become increasingly evident as militant agriculturalists, farmers and fishermen decide that they have to get a suitable return on their investment or at least meet their costs. For that reason, this is a matter of real interest to this Senate as well as to the regions involved.

● (2130)

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, if a mere easterner may venture to have a small part in this debate, I should like to mention one thing which, as far as I can recall—I was obliged to leave the chamber for a few moments—has not been mentioned in the course of the debate, and that is the side effects of this farm strike upon the workers in packing-house plants. I do not think any honourable senator referred to that.

[Senator Buckwold.]

It is, in a sense, a minor feature, but it is not one without importance, and if this movement spreads, it could be a matter of very considerable importance.

The other thing that I should like to say is that I think we had tonight a remarkable demonstration of the fact that party lines do not govern the debates of the Senate because, to the best of my recollection, every member who has spoken in support of this motion has been a Liberal. I do not think there has been a single intervention on the part of the opposition, apart from the original intervention by Senator Flynn more or less on procedural points. I gather my honourable friend, Senator Phillips, is about to let fly on the subject. I should be delighted to listen to him as always, but so far we have had a remarkable demonstration of the defiance of party lines by eminent members of the Liberal Party. In fact, at some moments I almost felt I was listening to a debate on a motion of censure of the present government, moved and supported by Liberal senators in the Senate.

I merely want to emphasize that because so often we are told that the Liberal members of this Senate are merely a collection of trained seals or tame sheep or "yes men" or noddies, and I think we have had a demonstration tonight that that is clearly not so.

Those are the only two points I wanted to make. I think we have listened to a most interesting and informative debate and one that I hope will produce some effect in the proper quarters.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, first of all I should like to congratulate Senator Molgat for bringing this subject up.

Senator Flynn: He certainly deserves congratulations.

Senator Riley: I also wish to congratulate Senator Argue for the wonderful work he has done on the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, and on the report that was made by that committee.

I understand the problems, at least I think I do, but I do not understand all the problems of the west because I have not spent much time out there.

One of the things that impressed me tonight was Senator Olson's remarks about the public manifestation of the grievances of the farmers. Call it a public manifestation of a grievance if you like, but to me it is a strike. As an easterner, I think that if the westerners in Manitoba and Saskatchewan are, as Senator Forsey says, putting people out of work in the packing houses and on the farms, then it is a strike, and it is not a legitimate strike. When Senator Argue was laughing—

Senator Argue: On a question of privilege, I was not laughing.

Senator Riley: You were smirking.

Senator Argue: No, I was not.

Senator Flynn: He never laughs, he is always too serious.

Senator Riley: When you laugh, it is hard to find your laugh behind your beard, but when your beard moves we know you are at least smirking.

An Hon. Senator: He would make a good Santa Claus.

Senator Riley: We don't know if Santa Claus sleeps with his beard inside or outside the comforter, and we don't know where Senator Argue's beard is when he sleeps. In any event, Senator Argue was one of the loudest screamers when the Americans came up to the border and tried to stop the flow of Canadian beef, livestock, into the United States. Now he is condoning the strike of the Manitobans and Saskatchewan in keeping the beef away from, as far as I am concerned, eastern Canada. You might laugh at that. You might say that is a perfectly legitimate "beef," but I repeat, I admire Senator Molgat for bringing this up because I appreciate the plight of the beef producers in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. Can the problem be solved by screaming against the Minister of Agriculture and the marketing boards? I have always said that the best way to solve a problem was to negotiate it. We found that out in the other place recently—you do not jeopardize the security of the country just to get publicity, and publicity does not end these problems, and it does not solve them. You solve these problems by putting both your hands on top of the table and negotiating.

Senator Asselin: There is nothing against that.

Senator Riley: It is the answer, is it not? This can be done with the beef industry in Canada. It has to be done with our agricultural and resource industries in eastern Canada. I think that all of us down there believe in that method. We do not go shouting and screaming. We used to do that right after we got sucked into Confederation. We used to say, "Look what we have got now."

Senator Steuart: Do you want out?

Senator Riley: No, not a bit. Right now we have the attitude in eastern Canada that you put your hands on the table and negotiate. You do not negotiate by screaming in a public forum like this, by trying to get publicity and by trying to throw shafts into the minister. He may be right about marketing, I don't know, because marketing has worked out in some areas of resources. I sometimes pray that he is right. I don't know anything about beef raising, and as far as grain is concerned Senator Argue knows that the only thing I ever learned about grain in the House of Commons was from John Sinnott. Do you remember him, Senator Argue?

Senator Argue: Yes, I remember John Sinnott.

Senator Riley: I didn't learn very much, did I? In any event, we have brought this to the attention of the government through Senator Molgat's motion, so let's not get all worked up over it but let's see what can be done by negotiation, even possibly through the use of marketing boards.

If more money is needed to help the beef producers, well and good, but they should not shout against the government. Here you have a classic example tonight. The opposition, if there is an opposition in the Senate, and I do not believe there should be—

Senator Flynn: You agree with Senator Langlois that there should never be?

Senator Riley: I say that we should all act as individuals, and there has been proof of that tonight because I am talking against fellow Liberals in the Senate. Some of them, I know, are a little conservative.

Senator Flynn: Thank God.

Senator Riley: This has been a good debate, and it is a great way to bring something to the attention of the government. As the Conservatives say, let them fight among themselves, none of us will say a word.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, Senator Forsey was somewhat disturbed that members of the opposition had not participated in the debate.

Senator Forsey: No, not at all.

Senator Phillips: I should like to point out to him that we in the Conservative Party are quite accustomed to waiting for a motion to be placed before we speak on a subject, and, as Senator Grosart stated, it is not too certain that a motion has been put.

Senator Forsey: Oh, yes.

● (2140)

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, as a representative of the Atlantic provinces I can heartily support the idea of the government paying more attention to beef producers. Our basic producers, in the potato industry, are in a very much worse situation. This time last year potato farmers were receiving five cents a pound. This year they are receiving one and a half cents per pound, less than the cost of production.

I very much appreciate the excellent work the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture has done for the beef producers, but where have you mentioned agriculture in the Maritimes? The deputy chairman of that committee represents a potato producing area, but we have not heard one single word about this aspect of agriculture.

Senator Argue: We have made several reports.

Senator Flynn: Not on potatoes.

Senator Phillips: Not on potatoes.

Senator Molgat stated that he did not think the Leader of the Opposition read the newspapers. I don't know whether he has time to waste reading every news report, but I should like to advise Senator Molgat that we on this side read the House of Commons Hansard, and I wish he did. I would point out to him that on Monday of this week the honourable member for Yorkton-Melville asked a question on the basis of the spread in beef prices and the boycott, and the answer of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is very interesting:

—we are concerned about the situation of the beef boycott in western Canada and are watching it carefully.

There are a number of things in that statement that are intriguing. First of all there is the use of the word "we." I know the minister has a very regal opinion of himself, but I do not think he was using the royal "we." We can safely assume that he was referring to the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and, of course, himself as the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Who knows, honourable senators, perhaps he was even including the Right Honourable the Prime Minister as being interested in the boycott.

The use of rule 46(g) to bring this matter to the attention of both the Senate and the government is a very novel idea, but I think we should be careful about how we use this rule, because if someone were to move the adjournment under rule 46(g) to discuss every single, solitary failure of this government we would not get to the Orders of the Day for another two years.

Senator Molgat said he was concerned about the huge amount of money beef producers had to borrow. I, too, can share that concern. The potato producers in the Atlantic provinces have the same problem. Certainly, the milk producers in the province of Quebec faced that problem when the federal government urged them to borrow every cent they could to increase their production in one year, and then the next year established a quota. At least the beef producers in western Canada have not so far met the problem of quotas.

Senator Steuart seemed to think there was a certain amount of urgency about this debate and about advising the government of the situation before they go to Regina. I cannot recall exactly when Senator Steuart joined us in this chamber, but I would presume he has been here long enough to advise the government about this situation before, and I have a high enough regard for the honourable senator to feel that he did advise them, but that he was ignored, as were the members of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture. I do not know why it is so important to advise the government tonight before they leave for Regina. One would assume that the Liberal caucus made some representation on not only beef producers but on what Senator Buckwold described as the malaise of the agricultural situation. Have they listened to the Liberal caucus? No, because we still have that malaise.

About ten days ago, in Ottawa, there was a great convention with extensive TV coverage. I wonder if any honourable senator can tell me how many resolutions were introduced and debated at that convention?

Senator Steuart: There were 821.

Senator Flynn: Concerning beef?

Senator Phillips: How many of the 821 dealt with the problem of the beef producers? Surely out of the 821, if you were really interested, one resolution would have dealt with the subject of beef producers.

Senator Steuart also suggested that we should be discussing the problem of quotas of offshore beef. Not too long ago I had the pleasure of listening to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce give a news conference in Calgary. The minister, in that very modest way that he has assumed since he joined the cabinet, was reminding the people of Canada that he had negotiated new reduced quotas with Australia and New Zealand, and thereby had corrected the situation with regard to the importation of offshore beef. There is also an increased tariff on beef being imported into this country. Obviously the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce did not have his facts right, because tonight we heard an entirely different story. I suggest to Senator Steuart that he take on the task of belling the cat and advise the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that he has been entirely wrong up to this date.

I suggest, honourable senators, that the Senate should be unanimous in this regard. Instead of limiting the recommendation to the cabinet, why not go one step further and make a recommendation to the public? That recommendation should be one to change the government, have a new agricultural policy and correct the malaise that exists in the country.

Senator Flynn: Do you think they would go for it?

Senator Yuzyk: Honourable senators, since I hail from Saskatchewan and represent Manitoba, I think I should participate, at least briefly, in this debate.

I am a member of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, and I have participated throughout its inquiry into the beef industry whenever I could, although there were times when I could not be present.

Senator Flynn: Tonight it is "beefing."

• (2150)

Senator Yuzyk: Well, this is a kind of beef night; this is a real beef night. My contribution to the debate will be this, that as we listened to the various presentations during the committee hearings—we had presentations from all sectors of the beef industry—we soon became sensitive to the fact that beef producers are not getting a fair and square deal which, of course, is generally known to Canadians. However, what is more important is that we sensed that the beef producers are not going to take this situation lying down too long, that they are going to take some kind of action in the near future. I was quite aware of that, and I was hoping that when the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture was presented to this house it would be taken seriously, because we took into account the views and the opinions of the beef producers. We realized that the situation was extremely serious, and to make the beef industry viable it was necessary to have some type of stabilization. The committee brought in some good recommendations, which I regret have not been acted upon by the government.

I believe this is the serious matter that should be brought up today, because the action that the farmers are taking now, this protest, this boycott action, can spread to something even more serious. I was brought up among farmers and I know that they are non-violent. However, if they are exploited too long they can turn radical, and we have had only some incidents in the past during our history. I believe that this matter is being brought to the attention of the Senate at the right time to prevent this type of boycott from developing into a wider and even violent type of strike. This could happen; I am sensing that this could happen if more action is not taken.

I believe that the recommendations that have been presented in the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture are reasonable, and will help meet the needs of the farmers. I do not intend to go into all the aspects of it. The report has received general approval and I think it is time that the Minister of Agriculture and the government took action. Therefore, I support this motion tonight.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, when Senator Forsey commented that none of the Conservatives had participated in the debate, I suggested to my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, by means of a note, that they knew when they had a good thing going, and they did not need to intervene.

Senator Flynn: What could I add?

Senator McElman: After listening to Senator Phillips, I still hold that view. I found it rather a paradox that Senator Buckwold in his remarks spoke very feelingly against any government intervention, yet this is what we have been talking about the whole of this evening—a request for government intervention.

Senator Buckwold: On a point of order. I did not actually say there should be no government intervention. I said that government action was required, but not in the direction of a marketing board.

Senator McElman: As I recall the remarks with respect to a marketing board, it was that the farmers apparently admire very greatly the free market system and they do not want intervention by government; they do not want things imposed on them by government. Yet there has been a great deal of discussion of enforcing quotas, of government putting in a floor price, of government subsidies, and that is not the free market system. His reference to supply-management programs, I think, could be misleading on the record. Those are not imposed by government. Supply-management programs, as we know them in Canada, come up from the producers through the provincial governments, and that is the only way they can come up. They cannot be imposed from above by the federal government.

Legislation can be, and is, in effect which provides the machinery for producers to look after their own supply-management. We have currently in Canada two major elements of that program that have come into effect in recent years. We have egg marketing and turkey marketing, and we are now proceeding toward chicken marketing. I believe the Minister of Agriculture has very properly asked the beef producers of Canada, who are principally in the prairie provinces, to look seriously at the matter of supply-management. It is very obvious that when prices go down, there must be over-supply. So there is a great deal of suggestion here tonight that we need long-term policy. Well, that is like short-term pregnancy.

When dealing with such a volatile product, talking in general terms does not help it; there must be something pretty specific. We are a member-nation of the GATT, and I believe the chairman and members of the Agriculture Committee and others who were in attendance on that occasion will remember very clearly some of the excellent advice given to that committee by one of Canada's outstanding public servants of many years standing, Mr. Jake Warren, who is now the general co-ordinator of our participation in the GATT in Geneva.

Canada and the United States could make some bilateral agreements, but those have not been achieved.

It has been stated here tonight that there are many bills before the Congress of the United States, in both houses of Congress, with respect to agricultural products. That is very true, but just remember that at Geneva there is a United States representation and a Canadian representation, which can carry on bilateral negotiations on matters that affect only their two countries. However, if other countries are involved, then those deals do not work. The application of quotas or other tariff barriers under the GATT, unless they are by a general agreement rather than carried out in isolation, bring upon the countries that put them into force very heavy penalties unless they can prove dumping. So let us not talk lightly about quotas in this situation.

Senator Phillips, quite properly, raised the point that there are other products in the nation. For example, he spoke of potatoes as being the most important agricultural product in the maritimes. Great efforts are being made currently to have the potato producers of New Brunswick put together a marketing agency. Farmers are a very independent lot. I need not tell that to any westerner. They are just as independent in the maritimes as they are in the prairies. I feel rather strongly that the time has come for the potato producers of our area to get into a supply-management situation, and I hope they do.

The Prince Edward Islanders have moved quite effectively in that direction and are making excellent progress. The efficacy of it can be seen by the fact that they are selling more of their product this year than are the New Brunswickers, and at a much better price at that.

If we are to remain as members of GATT, if we are to be proposing, as we are, a freer trade situation in the world—and the United States is doing the same—then I, for one, am beginning to worry very much about the many indications of the United States becoming an inward-turning protectionist nation. I worry whenever I see those signs developing within Canada. I worry when I look at what has happened to agriculture among the member nations of the European community, where they have absolute chaos and where 40 per cent of government revenue is being applied to subsidizing a controlled agricultural situation. I worry when I see the world developing towards parochial protectionism, and more and more as each month passes. I am not one of those who say, "Open the floodgates; have free trade completely." There have to be protections. Those protections have to be taken intelligently, and not in isolation in a world that should be broadening its horizons rather than closing them in.

I suggest that the beef producers in Canada should examine a little more carefully the propositions which have been put to them for their own salvation. One of those which should be considered carefully, in my view, is that of supply-management development in beef producing in Canada so that we do not have all of these peaks and valleys continuing. There is no long-term government policy of which I am aware that can cover that situation without the producers themselves looking to the cure, rather than looking to the government to cure the ills that they have today within rather free trade situations under the GATT.

I did not mention the Australian situation in beef production as it affects the North American market. I heard some honourable senators propose that we should cure our problems as a North American proposition, as between Canada and the United States; understandings by negotiations. That is all fine and good, but there are other beef producers in the world, and we cannot isolate ourselves from those either.

I have every sympathy for the beef producers. I know they have problems. I think, perhaps, that the solutions lie, long-term and medium-term, in their own hands more than in the hands of the government.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, my decision to rise was not inspired by Senator McElman. I say that only to make sure that no one thinks I took the bait which he threw out, because he will have noticed, as I am sure other honourable senators did, that I endeavoured to stand at the same time he did. While I succeeded in doing that, I did not succeed in catching the Speaker's attention soon enough. I make no complaint about that, but simply make it clear that I do not rise because I nibbled at the bait Senator McElman threw out. I want to say only a word or two in the debate, then, with your permission, mention the question of rules.

With regard to Senator Forsey's comment that no member of the opposition had intervened up to the time he spoke, I can explain to him very quickly why this member of the opposition did not. It was because I was delighted to see that so many senators had been converted to a recognition of the things that we have been preaching for a very long time. I enjoyed immensely the result of their conversion, and saw no reason to interfere with it at all.

The main reason for my rising, honourable senators, is to mention the question of the rules relating to this particular motion, if you will permit me. Quite properly, Senator Molgat proceeded according to rule 46(g) which states:

No notice is required of the following motions:

- (g) for the adjournment of the Senate for the purposes of raising a matter of urgent public importance (which the mover shall state on rising to speak) before the House proceeds to the orders of the day;

No doubt Senator Molgat did precisely that. However, we seemed to slide into the debate almost instantaneously and without recognition of any formality whatever.

It has been said that after Senator Molgat made the motion a number of senators called out that leave was granted. It must have been apparent that not all honourable senators were of that mind. That, I think, put us in a position where the motion was of very doubtful validity once that situation arose.

I do not object to the debate taking place. It has been a very interesting debate, and one which I have enjoyed, but I do draw attention to how easily we can get into a rather chaotic situation if we do not adopt some sort of formality for this kind of motion. If, indeed, leave is required to make it—

[Senator McElman.]

Senator Grosart: No, no.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Just a moment. Don't start saying no until I have finished. If, indeed, leave is required as seemed to be the thought of some honourable senators at the time, then, of course, there must be no dissenting voice. The definition of "leave of the Senate" is found in rule 5(g) which states:

"leave of the Senate" means leave granted without a dissenting voice;

If any honourable senator is labouring under the impression that this motion can be proceeded with after it is properly put, simply by the leave of the Senate, then that means unanimous leave. If on the other hand leave is not required, then any honourable senator can put that motion at any time, and nobody can rule him out of order.

● (2210)

Senator McIlraith: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit a question with respect to his last remark.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Surely.

Senator McIlraith: You said that no senator could call him out of order. Could he not be called out of order on the ground that it was not a matter of urgent public importance—"urgent" in that context meaning urgency of debate and, of course, "public importance" being clearly understood?

Senator Smith (Colchester): I am coming to that point. That is one of the formalities that I have in mind that we should observe.

There is nothing in this set of rules whatever about this motion except that which Senator Molgat read and to which I just referred, being rule 46(g), and that does not say how the motion shall get before the house, except that it does not require any notice.

Rule 1 states:

In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

And, of course, if one turns to Beauchesne, one can find what the procedure is in the House of Commons, as set out on page 74 of the latest edition, bearing the date 1958. According to Beauchesne, after the motion is presented, someone has to decide—in this case, the Speaker—whether it is in order on the ground that it is really of urgent public importance, which is the matter to which Senator McIlraith just drew our attention.

I am not sure whether rule 1 would indicate that "someone" should be the Speaker of the Senate or whether it should be by decision of the Senate by way of a vote. One would think that perhaps the simplest way would be by way of the decision of the Chair.

In the House of Commons it can only be proceeded with after it is ruled in order, and in order to proceed there must be a certain number—I believe it is 20—of members of the house stand in support of the proposition that it be heard.

All I am suggesting is that if we want to avoid the situation where any one senator does not decide every day to get up and move a motion and then go into a speech, or if we want to avoid the situation where one senator can refuse to grant leave and thus prevent a debate, perhaps we should ask the Rules Committee to give its attention to working out some sort of formality which will ensure that the rights of any honourable senator are not trespassed upon, and yet the will of a substantial number of senators be given effect to.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, let me say at the outset that I agree entirely with what Senator Smith (Colchester) has said regarding the clarification of the use of rule 46(g). I am not at the moment sure at what stage this debate is. Are we debating the motion to adjourn, or are we debating some other motion?

If we are debating the motion to adjourn, a good deal of our debate has been out of order. As has been pointed out, if there is any debate which can, according to convention, be on such a motion, it is restricted to the urgency of debate, immediate debate, not on the national urgency of the matter.

Senator Smith (Colchester) referred to the possibility of a leave situation. I do not think this occurs at all, because rule 46(g) makes it clear that no notice is required of a motion, and that seems clear as read in the context of the other items, such as for the "adjournment of the Senate when a matter is under discussion," the normal adjournment motion that is made all the time, or the referral of a question to a committee, and so forth. So I would suggest that this is clearly a situation where any senator may rise at any time before the Orders of the Day and move the motion, as Senator Molgat did, "for the adjournment of the Senate for the purpose of raising a matter of urgent public importance which the mover shall state on rising to speak."

This was discussed in the Standing Rules and Orders Committee, and my recollection is that what was said at that time is that this means, according to former practice in the Senate, that the mover of that motion states clearly why he believes that a debate now, before the Orders of the Day are called, is urgent, and I think that was the procedure that Senator Molgat was following.

I do not remember the motion being put. Normally, it seems to me that the procedure would have been for Senator Molgat's motion to be put, and the Senate, or the Speaker—because that point is not clarified in our rules so presumably it would be the Senate by consent, by majority vote—would agree to adjourn the Senate. At that point the Senate would be adjourned, and then I suggest the proper procedure would be for Senator Molgat or some other senator to rise and move a motion, because at that point the Senate would be adjourned; there would be no motion before the Senate, except the motion that this matter be debated before we take up the Orders of the Day.

Now, under our rules no senator can speak, except under certain circumstances, the main one being when there is a motion before the chamber. If there is no motion before the chamber, then any debate is out of order, and that is why I rose during the discussion to ask Senator Molgat if he had a motion to put before the chamber. I suggest that such a motion would have been the proper procedure. I am not sure what we have been debating all this length of time. If it was the motion to adjourn it seems clearly opposed to our rules to discuss the whole motion to adjourn for this length of time. I therefore suggest that a motion at this time would be appropriate and that a motion might be put now. For that reason I move that the Senate regrets the failure of the government.

Senator McIlraith: You cannot make a motion at this time.

Senator Grosart: Excuse me, that will be decided. When I have made the motion the decision will be made either by the house or by the Speaker as to whether the motion is in order.

Therefore, I move that the Senate regrets the failure of the government to implement the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, and thereby the government has brought about the urgent situation which is before the Senate, pursuant to this motion.

Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne): You have not given notice of that.

Senator Grosart: It is arising out of the debate, and a motion arising out of a debate does not require notice.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I should like, if I may, to take a few minutes to deal with the point of order raised by Senator Grosart. It would appear, incidentally, that his motion is out of order, if I may approach it in that way. The matter now before the Senate is a motion for the adjournment of the Senate "for the purpose of raising a matter of urgent public importance which the mover shall state on rising to speak." That matter is before the Senate and has been debated all evening. When it appears that that debate is concluded in substance, the practice, well established in all legislatures so far as I know—I am not certain about the Quebec Legislature—and in the House of Commons, is for the mover to put his motion to adjourn. Occasionally, the motion is carried and the chamber adjourns. That is the way the matter is concluded.

● (2220)

To engraft on to that motion a passage of the motion immediately before the subject matter is debated, I just do not understand. That is not the practice at all. The motion is for the purpose of discussing something so important that it should take precedence over the normal course of business in that day's sitting of the chamber. That is the practice and it is a well used and well-established practice.

I do not understand the mystery about it or the confusion about it. It is a perfectly simple procedure, and a reading of rule 46(g) in all its parts makes quite clear what the procedure is.

In the Senate we do not have clearly defined just who decides whether or not it is matter of urgent public importance; whether that is done by a simple majority vote of the Senate or whether it is a ruling of the Speaker I am not clear on, because the authority of the Speaker is slightly different from that in the House of Commons and in the legislative chambers. That point I leave open, therefore. It is not germane tonight at this point in any event.

Apart from that one small point, it seems to me that it is quite clear what is before the Senate and that the subject matter; namely, the question of the beef industry, is properly raised under rule 46(g).

Therefore, the motion of the Honourable Senator Grosart ought not to be received, because it is not in order. The procedure now is for the honourable senator, who moved the motion under rule 46(g), to withdraw his motion, if he wishes, or, if he does not wish to do that, to have the motion to adjourn carried and the Senate adjourn.

It can be either way, but the usual and better practice, I think, is to have the motion withdrawn and the debate on the substance considered as having been concluded.

Senator Forsey: May I take a whack at this point of order? Much has been said, but one thing has been left out, except perhaps incidentally in what the Honourable Senator Smith (Colchester) said.

There is very little explicitly in our rules on this subject. There is, however, a great deal in the rules of the House of Commons on the subject, and under our rule 1 it is provided that where there is nothing explicit in the rules of this house, then "the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof."

As Senator McIlraith has pointed out, in the House of Commons—and I might give the reference to the rule—under rule 26 there is an elaborate procedure for a motion for the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration. The leave must be asked immediately before the calling of the government orders. And so it goes on.

I agree with Senator Smith (Colchester) that the application of this in this house seems to be somewhat difficult, and probably the matter should be referred to the Rules Committee to draft something which will be in accordance, presumably, with the spirit of the present inadequate rule that it seems to me we have on this, and in accordance with the general procedure which is followed in the other place, which Senator McIlraith has just described and which is a very long-standing procedure. As long as I can remember any proceedings in the House of Commons, and I have watched them in the gallery now for something over half a century, this motion to adjourn in order to discuss immediately a matter of urgent public importance has been part of the procedure of that house. The exact form of the rule has varied from time to time, but its substance, I think, has varied very little. It seems to me that what we need in this house is probably an explicit rule adapting the general procedure of the House of Commons to our own purposes.

It is rather odd that we haven't got in our rules, for example, anything on what motions are debatable. You find that in the rules of the House of Commons in, I think, rule 32. But we haven't got it here. It ought to be specifically stated, I should think.

Some of the confusion that has arisen over this matter might have been dissipated if we had had an explicit rule. I think the only point of substance really that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has raised is that, in fact—I think he is correct in saying this—the Speaker did not actually put Senator Molgat's motion. I think the order of procedure would have been, when Senator Molgat said he wanted to make this motion, for the Speaker to have said, "It is moved by Senator Molgat seconded by Senator Steuart..." and then Senator Molgat would have begun his speech. But the procedure in this house on this matter has apparently come up so rarely that no one really is very sure exactly what the position is. I venture to hope that some of the observations I have made may help to support the proposal that Senator Smith (Colchester) made for a reference to the Rules Committee.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, one point of order that was raised by Senator Grosart is the argument that if a motion to adjourn the house is proceeded with under rule 46(g) and during the course of stating the reasons there might then follow a substantive motion—and he has put one—would be allowed without notice.

In my opinion, that would be a rather dangerous precedent to assume, from what is written in the rules at this point. I have no objection to sending the matter to the Rules Committee to provide for that or for some other way of disposing of it.

Honourable senators, I have not been here that long, but I know what happened under standing order 26 in the other place. I also know that they found it necessary to come up with another rule, which they called rule 43. I happened to be a member of the committee which introduced that rule, because there was a need to be more specific in what was required to air a grievance that was urgent at any given time. Of course, everyone's interpretation of what is urgent can be different. Rule 43 as been used in the other place for some time and provides for unanimous consent. If there is one dissenting member in that chamber, the matter cannot be proceeded with. I know there has been discussion recently to the effect that one single member was not sufficient, that there should be at least 10 members, or a larger number, in order that very real grievances can be aired. I take it that rule 46(g) provides an opportunity for a senator to raise, as an adjournment motion, a matter of urgency. I believe that Senator Molgat did that very properly, and in my view every speaker who followed addressed himself to the matter of urgency in debating this matter.

It seems to me that following the conclusion of the debate, the motion will be withdrawn—otherwise we shall have two options: one is to accept the motion, and then we would adjourn before we got to any other business; the other is to defeat the motion, but only the motion to adjourn. We could then go on to other business.

It seems to me that the proper way to do it is to withdraw the motion after each member has had an opportunity to state his interpretation of the urgency of the problem. I believe it would be wrong indeed to assume, from what is written about rule 46 in general but rule 46(g) in particular, that it gives a member the right to move a substantive motion, following from this debate, without notice.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, on a point of order, may I make a further comment in explanation of the position I have taken. First, I will reply to the suggestion made by the previous speaker that we would run into a problem of notice on the second substantive motion. That, of course, would not be so, because once the Senate had agreed, under this motion for the adjournment of the Senate, to the raising of a matter of urgent public importance before the house proceeds to the Orders of the Day, permission would immediately be given once the motion carried.

● (2240)

Senator Hayden: Has it been given?

Senator Grosart: I do not think it has in this case, and that is the second point I am going to raise, but only because it has been suggested that this matter should go to the Rules Committee. I think some observations on that should be on the record.

We have debated the substance of the matter that was to be raised on the adjournment motion. Now I say to honourable senators on the other side, and particularly to the deputy leader who sometimes has problems in this field, that if we were to carry on with the procedure we have followed tonight it would mean that any senator, and possibly a senator on this side, could raise such a question every single day, and a debate would be permitted to go on interminably on such an adjournment motion, because that is all it is. It would, therefore, be possible for any senator or group of senators to keep on talking on such a motion, and prevent us from getting to the Orders of the Day. That is why I agree with Senator Smith (Colchester) that this matter should be clarified.

Senator McIlraith: On a point of clarification, how could that possibly happen when there is a requirement in the rules that the matter raised be of urgent public importance?

Senator Flynn: Who is going to decide?

Senator McIlraith: There has been any number of attempts made to use rule 26 in the other place over the last number of years, and only a very small proportion of them were allowed. The reason for disallowance is that there was no urgency. It is only the urgent ones that go ahead. This cannot happen very often, because there are no matters of urgent public importance within the meaning of that rule coming up that often in the country. There will be two or three perhaps in a short time, and perhaps none in a whole session, so it cannot be a procedure that is used every day.

Senator Grosart: I would suggest to the honourable senator that that is exactly what has happened. There has been no decision up to this point of any kind by the Speaker or by this chamber as to whether this matter is urgent. We have carried on a debate on a motion to adjourn, and I am suggesting that what has happened here tonight can happen at any time.

Senator Bourget: The motion has been accepted.

Senator Grosart: It has not been accepted.

Senator Bourget: I am not too sure about that, but Senator Grosart cannot say that this can happen every day.

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

Senator Bourget: Just a minute, please. If the motion is turned down by a majority of the Senate, we cannot carry on with the motion.

Senator Grosart: May I make it clear again? We have been debating whether it is urgent. Nothing has been turned down. I am saying that exactly what has happened tonight can happen at any time, which is that a motion can be made that the Senate adjourn under rule 46(g), and we can follow the procedure we have followed tonight and debate it for hours, because nobody has made a decision, as far as I know, as to the disposition of the motion.

Senator Bourget: Surely my honourable friend will realize that if the majority of the senators here do not agree to the urgency, they can turn it down.

Senator Flynn: After a debate.

Senator Grosart: After a debate lasting all night.

Senator Flynn: Who is going to decide whether the matter is urgent enough to adjourn, and not proceed with the Orders of the Day?

Senator Bourget: It is up to the senators to decide.

Senator Flynn: It has been mentioned that we could debate for an hour or so whether the matter is urgent or not, and then take a vote on it. If it is urgent, we can then go on with the debate. But this is a stupid procedure, and, as I say, it is an abuse of the rules.

Senator Argue: Personally, I think it is pretty far-fetched to suggest that this kind of procedure should be followed every day.

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Argue: Just let me go on. It would stifle the Senate. I sat in the House of Commons for many years, and Standing Order 26, as Senator Flynn well knows, was for the purpose of moving the adjournment of the house to discuss a question of urgent public importance. I think it is fair to say that there was an effort made by some members of the other house to abuse that rule. But how did the rule, in fact, operate in the other place? A member would stand up and move a certain motion to adjourn the house under Standing Order 26 to discuss a matter of urgent public importance. Then he would state quickly why it was of urgent public importance. The Speaker would then consider the proposition that the member had made, and say, "I consider this a question of urgency because of the situation in two provinces, and a debate should proceed."

Senator Grosart: Of course; there is no question about that.

Senator Flynn: The Speaker decided that.

Senator Argue: I realize that. I am trying to be helpful. The Speaker, on the other hand, could say that for certain reasons the matter is not urgent, and that it can be debated next week or next month. What happened in the other place, when the Speaker ruled that a particular motion was not urgent, was that the members appealed the Speaker's ruling. It became a habit in the other place of moving your motion, having the Speaker turn it down, and then delaying the proceedings by having a vote on an appeal from the Speaker's ruling. That was a method of getting publicity, and drawing a matter to the attention of the house.

Senator Flynn: Do you want us to do that here?

Senator Argue: No, of course not. After long experience they said you would have to convince the Speaker, and it was not an appealable motion. I suggest that in the other place they are taking that particular rule now to the point of making a farce of it. Every day there are six or eight such motions on television. They know there will not be unanimous consent. In my judgment, they are wasting the country's time.

I do not suppose it is a secret that I discussed the procedure with people around here, as one would expect, and they informed me that it has been seldom used; it is many, many years since it has been used. I suggest that for a senator, knowing the history of the Senate, to suggest that another senator is going to abuse this rule is just nonsense. Should a senator be silly enough to try to do it every day, then I expect the Speaker would make short work of that particular senator and rule him or her out of order.

Senator McElman: Not the Speaker; surely the Senate.

Senator Grosart: You are way out in left field.

Senator Argue: I think that is just a matter of opinion. I think we would be making a mistake if we prevented ourselves from using the kind of rule which allows us to have that kind of debate.

Senator Grosart: No one is suggesting that.

Senator Argue: Personally, I do not think it need go to the Rules Committee. I may be simple-minded, but to me it is quite clear that rule 46(g) spells it out. It comes before the Senate, and we have a debate. You do not deal with that motion and then bring in a substantive motion. We have the debate on the motion to adjourn as we have had today, and I do not think we need get too excited and take ourselves too seriously and think someone is going to undermine the Senate and wreck the whole thing under rule 46(g). I hope I do not have to stay here another 11 years waiting for this rule to be used, but perhaps it could be used from time to time to enable us to carry on a useful debate, such as we have had tonight.

[Senator Argue.]

Senator Flynn: I would suggest, if that is the way Senator Argue reads the rules and he wants something effective, that Senator Molgat should have accepted my suggestion and asked leave to put it on the Orders of the Day. He could have started the debate and we could have continued tomorrow, especially as Senator Buckwold said he had not prepared himself because he did not know about it; he would have been better prepared tomorrow, as would some other honourable senators.

● (2250)

What has been the usefulness of having a debate tonight, under the cloud of whether it was in order or not, and under the obligation to terminate it tonight? If it is urgent you cannot adjourn it until tomorrow, and we would have to spend the whole night here in order to clear the urgency. Again I say it was an abuse of the rule. It was imaginative, but it was not creative.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, several neat points of order and practice have been raised this evening. Rule 15 says that the Speaker shall decide points of order and explain points of order and practice, and shall state the rule or authority applicable. That is a clear and unambiguous rule. I would suggest that we have given the Speaker adequate guidance up to this time, and that we might adjourn our debate on this point and await the Speaker's review of the points of order that have been under discussion this evening.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I wonder if I might crave your indulgence, honourable senators, to rise again? I think I could argue that it was on a different point of order, but I will not try that.

First, however, I make the comment that it really was not my intention to provoke any lengthy discussion or to cast any aspersions on the motion itself, put forward quite properly, in the first place, by Senator Molgat.

I must agree completely with Senator McIlraith. I was a little hesitant about putting forward the explanation that this is a commonly accepted practice in almost every legislative chamber in this country. I have used it literally scores of times in another chamber in exactly the way the rules prescribe, in exactly the way the House of Commons rules prescribe, under a rule to the same effect in the house in which I used it as our rule 1, which says, in effect, when the rules do not cover a particular situation the usages and practices of the rules of the House of Commons shall be resorted to. I think Senator McIlraith put the situation very clearly, as I think it should be, and very simply.

My point is that he omitted one thing so far as it refers to the rules of this house. There has to be some decision that the matter is one sufficiently urgent to come within the rule, and I was pointing out that, as far as I could tell, our rule book does not provide for that decision to be made or who shall make it. I think it would be helpful if the rules were changed to that extent and in that way.

As to Senator Argue's feeling that there should not be any rule of this kind, because nobody would ever get up and use it unless there was real urgency, I know he made the point in good faith, but the history of legislatures everywhere, even senates, the House of Lords, and goodness knows what, prove the necessity of having a rule, not because people act in bad faith but because they will have very different views about what is or what is not urgent, and there has to be a mechanism for a decision on it.

I would make another comment. Everyone knows that an ordinary motion to adjourn is not debatable, and that is why there has to be a special provision for allowing debate on a motion to adjourn for the purpose of dealing with an urgent question. If we did not have that special rule, the motion to adjourn could not be debated but would simply be the subject of an immediate vote.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: Are you speaking on the point of order?

Senator Molgat: No, I am closing the debate. I believe that the motion was properly put by Madam Speaker. I know there has been considerable discussion on the subject. She certainly did ask if all honourable senators agreed that I should proceed, and there was agreement.

Senator Flynn: There was no agreement on this side.

Senator McElman: It is my understanding that the point of order has not been disposed of, and I should like to speak to it before the debate is closed. Everyone else is offering opinions, so I may as well throw one in too. I believe that Senator Molgat met absolutely the provisions of rule 46(g), which reads:

No notice is required for the following motions:

(g) for the adjournment of the Senate for the purposes of raising a matter of urgent public importance (which the mover shall state on rising to speak)—

Which he did. He established the urgency.

Senator Flynn: That is what you say.

Senator McElman: Just a moment.

Senator Grosart: The Senate has not yet decided.

Senator McElman: Just a moment. Both of you have had rather a free hand tonight and I have not interrupted you at all.

Senator Grosart: May I ask to what you are speaking?

Senator McElman: I am speaking to the point of order.

Senator Grosart: What point of order?

Senator McElman: The one before the house, that Senator Molgat did not properly—

Senator Grosart: Who raised this point of order? I am not aware of that point of order being before the house.

Senator McElman: I understand that there is a point of order before the house.

Senator Grosart: What is the point of order? I do not know of one.

Senator McElman: If there were not a point of order before the house, how was it that you were on your feet six times? You were just not participating in a debate.

Senator Grosart: Because I moved a motion.

Senator McElman: Oh, did you?

Senator Grosart: Yes, I moved a motion.

Senator McElman: Which time was that when you were on your feet—the fourth, the sixth or the eighth time? I give every opportunity to the honourable gentleman to make his points, spurious or otherwise. With my respect for the Honourable Leader of the Opposition, I interrupt him only with a jocular remark.

Senator Grosart: What is the point of order, because the honourable senator is perfectly entitled to speak?

Senator McElman: I speak to the point of order before the house.

Senator Grosart: What is the point of order? That is what I am trying to find out.

Senator McElman: Well, you have been dragging it around so long it would be hard to tell.

Senator Grosart: That is not an answer; let us decide if there is a point of order before the house.

Senator McElman: What was all the battling about, if there was not a point of order? The point of order, as I understand it, is that Senator Molgat did not have a proper motion to put before the house the way he did.

Senator Flynn: It was a point of debate, not a point of order.

Senator Grosart: There was no point of order.

Senator McElman: Very well, let me in on the debate.

Senator Flynn: You have spoken in the debate; what is the use?

Senator McElman: Just be seated for a moment. I have the floor. Now, if there is no point of order, both of you gentlemen have been given the niceties of the house to speak at least half a dozen times each. Do you deny me comment as you have been allowed to comment?

Senator Grosart: No, I have no such intention. It is a point of information. I will listen to the honourable senator with great interest, but I would like to ask him what he will be talking about. What is the point of order to which he rises to speak? I would like to know what it is before I listen to him.

Senator Phillips: Senator McElman would also like to know.

Senator McElman: The point of order has been raised that under rule 46(g) Senator Molgat did not properly have a matter before the house.

Senator Grosart: No, it is not.

Senator McElman: Oh yes, yes; that has been raised.

Senator Flynn: It was not raised as a point of order. The Speaker has not been asked to rule whether the motion was in order. Comments were made. The Speaker does not have to make a decision on that point. The only point of order raised was that by Senator McIlraith on the motion moved by Senator Grosart and not on the propriety of the motion moved by Senator Molgat. Comments were made. You had an opportunity to discuss that matter if you wished to.

● (2300)

The Speaker has not been asked to rule whether the motion was properly put. What is the point in trying to have the Speaker make a decision after the debate has been nearly completed? If you wish to have a decision on that, that is your own business, but no one has asked the Speaker for a decision.

Senator Riley: Senator McElman raised the point.

Senator Flynn: I know that, but the point is that he is now saying there was a point of order. There was no point of order. There were comments, and that is different. When the Speaker is not asked to rule, there is no point of order. A point of order has been raised by Senator McIlraith on the motion of Senator Grosart. The point of order is there, and no decision has been made. But whether the motion was properly put by Senator Molgat or not is another question. There were only comments made, and there was no formal objection and no request for the Speaker to rule on whether it was proper or not. If you wish to debate the point, that is up to you. But, of course, it will serve no purpose at all.

Senator McElman: I cannot understand why it is so important to you that I not be allowed to make a short intervention at this point.

Senator Flynn: If you wish to make it, go ahead. It will show how silly it is to proceed this way.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps I can help Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: A point of order was raised by Senator Smith (Colchester). I recall very clearly Senator Smith referring to a point of order.

Let me make one point, if you will, with respect to rule 46(g).

Senator Flynn: Go ahead.

Senator McElman: Senator Molgat met all the requirements of rule 46(g).

Senator Flynn: Very good. Agreed.

Senator McElman: The rules of this body are rather broad, and for a marvellous purpose. This is not supposed to be a combative house, although one might rather question that this evening. But the fact remains that it is not, and the rules are applied in a very different fashion than they are in the other place. That is one of the reasons why we are not bound by the rules of the other house. We have rules and precedents of our own which are to be followed, quite aside from what the rules are in the other house.

I suggest that rather than have a situation where this house could be blocked day after day with long debate—and this has been a long and interesting debate, during which I have enjoyed immensely the participation of others—

Senator Flynn: Speak for yourself.

Senator McElman: In any event, the Senate is always in control of what it will do in such a case.

At any point within seconds after Senator Molgat was on his feet, it was within the competence of any member of the Senate to immediately call for order and say that this was not a matter of public urgency. We could have had a ruling on that. That would have been one way to clear the matter up very quickly, but that was not done. Senator Molgat was permitted to proceed, and that is one of the good features of the looseness of our rules.

The second easy way of bringing it under control is to have "the previous question" put. That is always open for any senator to move, and then a vote of the house is taken. So there is no way this could get out of control unless the Senate itself wanted it to get out of control, and unless the Senate wanted a debate.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I see the danger of the rules being too loose, because I have to reply to Senator McElman's belief that I raised a point of order. I said that it was too late to rise on a point of order but that I did want to make a few comments. All honourable senators will have noted that I waited until I thought the debate arising out of Senator Molgat's motion had been completed and for what he was going to say in closing. Presumably, he will either withdraw the motion or ask that the question be put.

I was not raising a point of order in the sense that I wanted to interfere in the discussion then going on. I merely wanted to draw the attention of the Senate to what I thought might be done to improve the rules to ensure future certainty.

Senator McElman: If I misrepresented what Senator Smith said, I apologize. I would certainly not do so intentionally.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, this started out as a very good debate. Senator Molgat received the unanimous consent of the house to put his motion, and now it seems he wants to withdraw it. Why should we stay up half the night debating a technicality? Why not let Senator Molgat proceed?

MOTION WITHDRAWN

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, let me, at the outset, thank all honourable senators for allowing this debate to proceed. I think it has been a useful debate, and I much appreciate the courtesy of the Senate in allowing it to proceed.

I thank all of those who participated in the debate. It seems to me that very often we have set speeches, as opposed to debates. This evening there were no set speeches. Everyone spoke off-the-cuff.

There are a number of matters which I could reply to but, in view of the hour, it is not my intention to do so now. I would refer Senator Austin and Senator McElman to the report of the Agriculture Committee, which will answer some of the questions regarding consumption of beef and import patterns in Canada, both of which are very important.

There has been a very serious shift in the import situation. In a period of less than 10 years we have moved from being a net exporter of beef to being a net importer.

I now ask leave of the Senate to withdraw, not the subject matter, which I think is important, but the motion to adjourn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

THIRD READING

Senator Langlois moved the third reading of Bill S-9, to implement an agreement between Canada and Malaysia and conventions between Canada and Spain, Canada and Liberia, Canada and Austria and Canada and Italy for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BANK ACT QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton moved the second reading of Bill C-16, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

He said: Honourable senators, at this time of the night it is not my intention to keep you very long. In simple terms, the explanatory note states the purpose of this bill, which is simply to extend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act to April 1, 1979.

The proposed section 6(b) provides:

(b) if Parliament does not sit on at least twenty days during the month of March, 1979, the bank may carry on the business of banking until the sixtieth sitting day of Parliament next thereafter, and no longer.

● (2310)

That would anticipate, perhaps, an election in 1979. There would remain 60 extra days during which the banks could carry on.

Honourable senators, I have further explanations and if you wish to hear them I am prepared to give them. I am in the hands of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, March 8, 1978

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Senator Inman: Honourable senators, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this is International Women's Day. I am reminded of the month of November, 1929, when the Privy Council of Great Britain decided that women were persons, and as such were entitled to sit in the Senate of Canada. Then, in the month of February, 1930, the late Honourable Senator Cairine Wilson was appointed to the Senate by the then Prime Minister, Mr. Mackenzie King. There was great rejoicing in all the provinces by all those of us who had worked so hard to accomplish this. Since then we have come a very long way. We have had two women presiding as Speakers of the Senate, with great dignity and distinction to themselves and the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Inman: May I say that we look forward to the day when, perhaps, a woman will be the Prime Minister of Canada.

[Later]

Senator Quart: Honourable senators, may I congratulate Senator Inman on her remarks regarding International Women's Day. I, too, should like to add a few words.

Throughout Canada, as in many other countries, special events are being held to mark this occasion. A demonstration was held on Parliament Hill a short while ago, and in Montreal and Toronto they are staging marches. So, men, beware!

Basically, it has been the women of the trade and labour unions who have carried on the celebration of International Women's Day for over 60 years, commemorating a violent strike of female textile workers in New York City in 1857. That was long before women's lib became the vogue. Neither can International Women's Year of 1975 claim any credit for today's celebration.

The theme for today's celebration is: "Are Working Women Still Being Exploited?" Well, even the cold-hearted male chauvinists must agree.

The results of a weekend poll found that working men and women do not receive equal treatment. The weekend poll indicated that 62 per cent of females saw women as not being treated equally with regard to wages, and 56 per cent of males agreed with them. Now, ladies, you know that is not bad for the gentlemen. They are improving.

I shall not bore you further by quoting the statistics which resulted from the many questions in the poll which appeared in Weekend Magazine on Saturday, March 4, 1978.

I am sure all honourable senators have received a copy of a letter from David MacDonald, Member of Parliament, to the Honourable Marc Lalonde, the minister responsible for the status of women, regarding a concerned group of public servants. I should simply like to read the following paragraphs:

I am sure you will be interested in the enclosed report which I am releasing this afternoon on behalf of a concerned group of public servants who are seriously disturbed at the increasing signs of discrimination against women workers generally and the very obvious lack of commitment or progress with respect to the equal opportunities for women in the Public Service of Canada.

Since I regard this report very seriously, as I am sure you will, I would look forward to your considered response.

I have not received a copy of any answer to this letter, so I presume it has probably been ignored.

● (1410)

In retrospect, was all of the hoopla and money spent on meetings, conferences, and so forth, for International Women's Year worthwhile? Perhaps in some countries, but certainly not in Canada.

In conclusion, the Indian Act as it exists now is deplorable in that it denies to Indian women their full rights as citizens of Canada. It is contrary to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, to the United Nations Convention on the Nationality of Married Women, to the United Nations Declaration on Discrimination against Women, and to the spirit of the Citizenship Act of Canada.

The Status of Women Councils across Canada supported a recommendation that the Quebec Status of Women Council send a letter to the Indian Association of Quebec urging that non-status Indian women be appointed to the Indian Association as a means of ensuring consultation between Indian men and women.

Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and Senator Williams, will pressure the minister responsible for Indian Affairs, and perhaps the Prime Minister, to act in this matter as quickly as possible.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

AGRICULTURE

SASKATCHEWAN AND MANITOBA BEEF PRODUCERS—QUESTION

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. In view of the emergency debate in this chamber last evening, and the fact that a cabinet meeting was scheduled for this morning, has the government reached a decision to assist the beef producers in Manitoba and Saskatchewan?

Senator Perrault: The difficulties of the agricultural community in this country and the challenges facing that community are constantly under review by the government, and appropriate measures will be taken when deemed to be necessary.

Senator Grosart: That is what was said before.

Senator Phillips: A supplementary question. Do I take it that the aid does not extend beyond the customary review?

Senator Olson: May I ask a supplementary question? I wonder if the Leader of the Government will draw the debate held here last evening to the attention of the government, particularly so that they could take some action with respect to our recommendations in connection with import quotas, in addition to all the other good and appropriate measures that have been taken to date to help this industry?

Senator Flynn: Is it useful or necessary?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the Honourable the Minister of Agriculture is very much aware of the important debate which occurred last evening in this place.

Senator Flynn: Did he tell you that?

Senator Perrault: I intend to meet with the Minister of Agriculture later this day.

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: And I intend to provide him with a full transcript of last evening's proceedings.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I wonder if at this point I may be allowed to give some information to the Senate? The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture has called a meeting for 5 o'clock this afternoon in room 356-S to meet with the Minister of Agriculture to discuss the recommendations of the committee with regard to beef import policy and other beef matters, including the current beef strike. I would like, as chairman of the committee, to extend to all senators a special invitation to attend this meeting because of the special debate that took place in the Senate last evening.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I should like to add that the Minister of Agriculture has demonstrated an acute interest in the comments made by various senators last evening, and I hope to see him at approximately 3.30 this afternoon prior to his meeting later with the members of the committee.

Senator Flynn: You are going to brief him.

Senator Grosart: It is opposition day in the Senate.

BANK ACT QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Macnaughton for the second reading of Bill

C-16, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, on May 5, 1977, Senator Macnaughton introduced Bill C-39 to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act by extending those acts until March 1, 1978. Here we are with another bill to extend those statutes until April 1, 1979, or, if Parliament does not sit on at least 20 days during the month of March 1979, until the 60th sitting day of Parliament next thereafter, and no longer.

The revision of the Bank Act, as honourable senators know, has been a point of concern to us and, of course, the government for quite some time. The Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce released in August 1976 a report on the white paper dealing with the reform of the banking legislation. Last year, in June, after the passage of the act extending the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act until March 31, the same committee released a very detailed, substantial and well prepared report. Indeed, I think, as I recall, that a committee of the House of Commons had also released its comments and recommendations.

So it seems the government during all that time was unable to make up its mind or reach a decision. I understand that the matter is in many respects a complex one. I am sure of it. Furthermore, it is proper to take one's time in reviewing the Bank Act. The problem is certainly more difficult today than it was five years ago, because our society, our economy and our finance system were not changing as rapidly as they have in the last few years. In any case, I do think that we have other things to do than supporting this legislation which will give the government at least one more year to make up its mind. There are chances, if we have a new government at that time, that a decision will be more readily made.

I would like to ask the sponsor of the bill what is meant exactly by clause 6(b) of this bill to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Bank Act which reads:

If Parliament does not sit on at least twenty days during the month of March, 1979, the bank may carry on the business of banking until the sixtieth sitting day of Parliament next thereafter—

Sixty days means what? It means 12 weeks. On the one hand, it says: If you sit on 20 days, you have enough. But if you sit on only 19 days, you will have after that 60 additional days of sitting, which is about the equivalent of at least three months. I find that a bit strange, a bit fanciful. If 20 days would be enough in March, I do not see why it should take 60 days in May, June or July. I would like the sponsor to explain to us the subtlety behind this verbosity.

[English]

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Senator Deschatelets): Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Macnaughton speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading.

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators, in reply to the honourable senator, I did make inquiries about the "peculiar wording," which I think is the expression he used, and I am told that this means 60 sitting days after the end of March, 1979.

Senator Flynn: Or after the end of the last sitting?

Senator Macnaughton: After the end of March, 1979. The reason was not communicated to me, but I would suspect that if an election were called and the house was not sitting, this would be to give us a little surplus time so that the banks might continue to operate.

Senator Flynn: It would be one hell of a way to do it.

Senator Macnaughton: I agree with the honourable senator, but this is the explanation given to me. Honourable members of the Senate know very well, after our detailed study of the white paper—and my honourable friend was certainly one of the ardent members of that committee—that this is not an easy revision; it covers a great many things. For example, in the white paper and in our report we dealt with near banks, foreign banks, the Canada Payments Association, leasing, factoring, residential mortgages, data processing and a host of other things, so that the remodelled Bank Act, if, as and when we get it, will have to include amendments to the Quebec Savings Banks Act, the Bank of Canada Act, the Bills of Exchange Act, and the creation by statute of the Canadian Payments Association.

These are all new trends in Canadian banking, and I think they are very progressive and forward looking. I am sure it will in due course be quite beneficial to the country. I can understand why there have been considerable delays, when one considers all the other legislation which seems to be flowing through. I am prepared to answer any questions that honourable senators may wish to put to me, but this is a short bill and the purpose is clear. I do not know whether the honourable senator wishes it to be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Senator Flynn: I am not entirely satisfied with the reply of the sponsor of the bill to my question relating to the delay. It is rather a complicated process, and I would think that in committee we could at least try to establish exactly what it means. If we adopt this legislation and then are caught next year because we are unable to prolong the present legislation, we will have some responsibility in the matter.

In my opinion, it would be worthwhile to send the bill to committee simply to deal with this point, and this point only.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Senator Deschatelets): Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Macnaughton moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

COMPENSATION FOR FORMER PRISONERS OF WAR ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Charles McElman moved the second reading of Bill C-27, to amend the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to have this opportunity to move second reading of Bill C-27, which is designed to improve the lot of a group of very special Canadians; namely, those members of our armed forces who were prisoners of war during World War I and others who were evaders in enemy or enemy-occupied territory.

The bill is a further improvement of our Veterans Charter, which is already one of the best in the world.

This bill received third reading in the House of Commons last Wednesday. It was approved there with an unusual degree of alacrity, with all parties, at one sitting, giving unanimous consent to second reading and third reading.

The provisions of the bill will affect compensation paid to approximately 200 veterans who were prisoners of war during World War I, and to about 100 evaders, persons who were in enemy or enemy-occupied territory but who evaded capture. These evaders were generally members of the Royal Canadian Air Force who were shot down and found themselves in enemy territory during World War II but who evaded capture.

Also to be affected by the bill are some 75 veterans who became prisoners of war of the enemy but managed to escape from their captors.

The provisions of Bill C-27 are proposed to be retroactive to April 1, 1976. They will amend the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act to provide compensation for former prisoners of World War I, and evaders and escapees, under the same basic terms and conditions as for World War II prisoners of war of a power other than Japan.

As honourable senators are aware, legislation was enacted in 1971 to provide pensions for those of our veterans who suffered as prisoners of war in Japan, and again in 1976 with respect to POWs of other enemy nations involved in World War II other than Japan.

The proposed legislation provides that time spent as an evader, and the length of time spent as a prisoner of war, may be added together in the computation of benefits. The total of the two, however, would not exceed the maximum benefit available under current compensation for former prisoners of war.

Under existing legislation, only the time actually spent as a prisoner of war may be counted in the computation of POW compensation. However, some prisoners escaped and were recaptured, and others managed to evade capture, as I have said, and eventually reached Allied lines or the United Kingdom.

Under the amended legislation, rates of compensation now paid to those veterans who managed to escape from the enemy may be increased if the time between escape and recapture or escape and eventual reporting to their own or Allied Forces is counted as prisoner of war time.

About 200 former members of the armed forces evaded capture by the enemy, and it is estimated that half that number eluded their captors for more than three months.

It is further provided in the bill that if a World War I prisoner of war or evader died between April 1, 1976, and the date that the act takes effect, the compensation he would have received would be payable to his survivor.

Some 3,850 Canadians were taken prisoner of war during World War I, and of that number 3,478 were liberated at the end of the war. Some 200 of those now surviving will be affected by the amended legislation. Their average age is 82.

A limited but as yet undetermined number of widows of former POWs will also become eligible for pension under the proposed amendment.

To summarize, in 1971 the Pension Act was amended to provide special benefits equivalent to a 50 per cent pension granted to former POWs of the Japanese. In 1976 the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act was passed to provide benefits for former POWs of World War II and later—and “later” in this context means the Korean War—other than POWs of the Japanese.

The bill will similarly provide for those of our surviving ex-servicemen who were POWs in World War I, with an additional calculation for time spent as evader or escapee. The latter provision will apply to former POWs and evaders of both World War I and World War II.

The bill, if enacted, will overcome an element of unfairness or inequity that resulted from the earlier broadening of our Veterans Charter in 1971 and 1976.

Honourable senators, as I mentioned at the outset, Bill C-27 passed all stages of consideration in one sitting in the other place. Its provisions are quite clear and are beneficial to those of our fellow citizens whom they are designed to assist.

I am confident that honourable senators will wish to consider the bill with reasonable dispatch, in view of the advanced age of so many of those who will benefit from its provisions.

● (1430)

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I should first like to thank the Honourable Senator McElman for his introduction of Bill C-27. At this time of year a great many people are watching the birds return and they see them as harbingers of spring. We on this side of the Senate are watching for harbingers of an election, and when I see a piece of veterans legislation I feel we are getting closer to such an event.

Senator Perrault: You have a suspicious mind.

Senator Phillips: I don't know how I developed that, Senator Perrault. I wasn't that way when I came here.

Senator Perrault: Yes. As I recall, at one time you possessed a simple, childlike faith.

Senator Langlois: You're on the wrong side of the house.

Senator Flynn: That may soon change.

Senator Phillips: Many of the veterans affected by this legislation will probably feel that 60 years too late is better than never, and I hope they appreciate the efforts made at many times by many different governments to bring this matter forward. Today, in some small way, their position is being recognized.

The total number of veterans is not large. As Senator McElman pointed out, we have an estimated 200 survivors left of those who were prisoners of war in World War I. The sponsor stated that there are approximately 100 evaders in Canada. I think possibly the number is somewhat higher than 100, but in any event I am disturbed by the use of the word “evaders.” To me an evader is someone who dodges combat, and I do not think it is fair to apply that terminology to someone who was shot down over enemy territory. It is interesting to note that the members of the society refer to themselves as “escapees,” not “evaders”.

Some of the World War I prisoners of war, because of their age, will now be drawing a war veterans allowance. This means that in addition to the old age security and the guaranteed income supplement, a single recipient will receive $47.90 per month, and a married recipient $34.00 per month. Here is the sting in this bill as far as this group of former prisoners of war is concerned. When it comes into effect they are going to lose their war veterans' allowance, and it seems ridiculous to give them the prisoners of war compensation on the one hand, and take away the war veterans allowance on the other. I would hope that the War Veterans Allowance Board, in dealing with retroactive pay, will use a little discretion or, even better, common sense, and not go back and attempt to recover payments for the past year.

As honourable senators know, war veterans allowance is based on a means test, but in this case we are using a negative means test. Those who do not need the assistance and are not receiving war veterans allowance will receive the full amount of the disability pension, but those who have the greatest need are the ones who will be penalized.

Clause 4 amends section 7 of the act, and it again brings up that figure of 48 per cent. When the last amendment was before the Senate, I mentioned the absurdity of the pension ceasing on the death of a recipient who had 47 per cent disability or less. I was quite pleased at the response and the interest the Senate showed in this matter.

It was raised again at committee, and I was rather surprised to learn that no one was quite sure where the figure of 48 per cent originated. It seems to have originated in the late 1920s, but no one knows why the figure of 48 was selected. We do not know the origin, yet it has become almost a dogma with the Department of Veterans Affairs, and I think we should examine that clause further.

The chairman of the Canadian Pension Commission was asked at that committee meeting what it would cost to continue survivors benefits for those with 48 per cent disability or less. He estimated it would cost approximately $30 million per year. Honourable senators, in our budget $30 million is not a large item, and I find it rather strange that we continue on with the 48 per cent figure. I hope that that will be the next amendment to veterans legislation.

The case of a former prisoner of war who was wounded and is now receiving 90 per cent disability merits special mention. Under the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act he could be entitled to 20 or 30 per cent compensation; yet he can receive only 10 per cent. It seems to me we are saying to that veteran that he should not have been wounded. We are not treating him fairly. I believe he should receive both his disability pension and his pension for being a prisoner of war.

The legislation contains a number of rather serious anomalies. In the case of a prisoner of war who escaped, he has in effect reduced his compensation by successfully escaping. Many people did try to escape. Honourable senators will recall the escape of air crew members from Stalagluft 3 when 90 of them tunneled out of this camp. Out of the 90, only one escaped to Sweden. The remainder were captured, and 50 were shot for attempting to escape. When we consider that 50 lives were lost in an effort to return one airman, I think we should be rather generous in our treatment of those who escaped from POW camps.

Senator McElman mentioned that many aircrew avoided capture by being picked up by the underground, particularly the Dutch and French underground movements. They went through a rather hazardous experience, as they were hidden in difficult circumstances, and moved across Europe, usually to Spain and out through Gibraltar. The anomaly in recognizing this achievement is the fact that if an individual required three months to complete that journey he is compensated, but if he did it in two months and twenty days he is not compensated. Surely we are compensating for the fact that they escaped, and I should very much like to see this anomaly removed from the bill.

I would be prepared to move an amendment, but we on this side are very well versed in the rules, and I know that if I moved an amendment I would be informed that it was out of order because it involved an expenditure of public money. However, the Royal Air Forces Escaping Society would like to appear before the Senate committee, when this legislation goes to a committee, to present their case. I hope the committee will give them a sympathetic and considered hearing. I should also like to see the Minister of Veterans Affairs present when this group appears before the committee, when perhaps the minister would give a commitment to correct this situation at the earliest possible date. I believe this situation occurred because the Royal Air Forces Escaping Society was unaware that the bill was going to be introduced so quickly in the other place and passed without reference to a committee. I would hope that the Senate committee could also support this by making a recommendation to this effect in its report.

One further aspect I should like to mention is that of the Polish veterans. They are not covered by this legislation, and I hope the sponsor of the bill will be able to tell us that the matter is under—I forget the term used by Senator Perrault earlier in the day—I will say, very active consideration, not review. These people were in allied services, and I hope they will receive the same consideration as our own people have received.

Hon. Frederick William Rowe: Honourable senators, I had not planned to speak in this debate, but I feel that I should add my objection to that made by Senator Phillips. I believe it is an objection that is concurred in by a goodly number of members of the Senate because of the use of that word "evaders." It seems to me that in the richness of the English language—in some respects the richest, and certainly from the standpoint of vocabulary the most extensive, in the world—it ought to be possible for us to find some phraseology that does not convey, as Senator Phillips pointed out, a connotation that none of us likes. When I saw this word "evaders" on reading the bill the word "dodgers" came into my mind right away.

Perhaps I am a little emotional about this. I come from a province where, as I am sure the Senate knows, we suffered the highest casualty rate in World War I in the entire British Empire and Commonwealth, and our people react emotionally on these matters, as one would expect. I cannot speak for the rest of Canada, but I am quite sure that there will be many veterans and their families—and this includes almost every family in Newfoundland—who will not like the use of that word "evader." I assume this bill will be referred to a committee, although I do not know which one, but I urge that an amendment be made in committee to remove this word. I know the intentions are good, but it is a word that may be objected to by a great many people right across Canada.

Senator Croll: Have you got any idea on what should replace it? I have been thinking about this too. What do you suggest?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, may I attempt to provide some degree of clarification? I was involved in the cabinet discussion of this measure before it was introduced. I raised this matter at one of the meetings and was assured by officials at the meeting that the word "evader," repugnant as it is to many Canadians, in certain usages, is, in the context of the bill, part of the lexicon of terminology used by those members of the armed forces who managed to evade capture by enemy forces. I understand that the word is held in great respect by what may be described as the "escapee" community. This may or may not be confirmed at subsequent committee meetings. Certainly a number of honourable senators and members of the other place have commented on the use of the word "evader." Fearing that it may cause some misapprehension in the community, I suggest that the matter be raised as part of the questioning in committee. The government is aware of the concern.

[Senator Phillips.]

Senator Rowe: I thank the government leader for that explanation, but I do hope that this matter will be looked at very carefully. Finally, may I say that I support this bill with all my heart.

Hon. John Morrow Godfrey: Honourable senators, I intended to raise this very point before Senator Rowe spoke because, frankly, I was absolutely astonished when Senator Phillips drew attention to the word "evaders." I spent five and a half years in the air force, two and a half years of which was overseas, and I can assure honourable senators that this was a very honourable and well understood term. An evader was somebody who had been shot down and was never captured, was never incarcerated. He was a very proud individual; he said, "They never did get me."

I would point out that they were not only people who got into the hands of the underground and got back through Spain. One pilot in my wing was shot down; he evaded and joined the underground; he spent a year in France helping the underground merrily blowing up railway bridges. He turned up over a year later, having been actively engaged against the enemy behind enemy lines. I have never once heard any criticism of the word "evader," which is certainly well understood by people in the air force.

Senator Phillips: I should like to inform honourable senators that I spent an equal amount of time in the air force, but when I was with No. 6 Group, Bomber Command, never once did I hear the word "evader." We used to say that he was an "escapee" or, more commonly, that he "walked home," but we never called him an evader.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I do not propose to delay you for more than a few minutes. We are all very much indebted to the sponsor of this bill, to Senator Phillips, and to the other senators who have spoken from their experience in our armed forces. When they speak feelingly about the plight of prisoners of war and what is proposed to be done for them, I think they can be assured of the support of all of us in this chamber. It is warming for us to know that people such as they did survive the ordeal of the Second World War and return to grace this chamber and this Parliament and help in solving our national problems. They started out by fighting for the country they loved, a country they wanted to see free, and now they are working in another sphere to the same end. I suppose that if we were in the House of Lords today all of us sitting there would be referring to them not only as "my honourable friends" but also as "my gallant friends."

This legislation, as I understand it, is restricted to members of the Canadian forces—those who were citizens of Canada or Newfoundland and those who were members of the forces but not necessarily citizens—and to members of other Commonwealth forces domiciled in Canada at the time of their enlistment. I use the word "Commonwealth" because it is more readily understood, the connotation being one that we use most often now. I made reference to those who were domiciled in Canada at the time of their enlistment in one of the Commonwealth forces. Senator Phillips has referred to the Polish group in Canada. I am sure that other senators have had representations through the years from members of this group who are now Canadian citizens.

Senator McIlraith: Polish and other allied forces.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, other allied forces, in addition to the Polish group. Indeed, they were members of the allied armed forces. In many cases they fought with Canadian forces, enduring the same hardships and assuming the same risks. Now they are at least 33 years older than they were at that time. They belong to a group which is certainly diminishing in number, and I think it can be said that few of them are well to do and most of them could use some help.

I wish to ask some questions which I hope may be answered in committee. I am not suggesting that Senator McElman, the sponsor, is able to supply the answers now. However, before I ask the questions, may I refer to the views which have been communicated to members of the Senate, as Senator Phillips has indicated, by the Royal Air Forces Escaping Society. I have received a letter from Mr. D. W. McLarty, the past president of the Canadian Branch of this organization—a gentleman whom I do not know—in which he neatly summarizes the point they wish to make in respect of this legislation.

One paragraph of his letter reads as follows:

We have fought very hard on two matters of basic principle:

The first is that a man who escaped from a Prisoner of War camp, as was his duty, should receive no less compensation than had he not escaped, and secondly, the man who evaded capture altogether should be treated as if he had been captured and the period of purposes of entitlement should count from the day he landed in enemy territory until the day he would have been liberated.

I think that that would satisfy the point made by Senator Phillips if it were to be found in the legislation. However, as he says, our problem is that by making amendments on either of these two counts we are, of course, increasing the number of beneficiaries, thereby increasing the tax upon the Treasury and thereby going beyond the power that we in this Senate have. However, while we may not be able to change this legislation in that respect, I believe it is appropriate to obtain further information so that we will know what might be done if either of these two proposals is to be envisaged. That is why I should like to put a few questions to the sponsor, to be answered in the committee, and those questions are:

How many people, now Canadian citizens, were members of such allied forces and might be able to benefit under a provision of this type? Perhaps the department has this kind of information.

What is the distribution by membership in Commonwealth forces, in other allied forces?

What is the estimate of the cost of providing these benefits?

What, if any, are the implications for other pension benefits that might occur if the class were extended in the way Senator Phillips has suggested?

Finally, what would be the estimate of the costs by groups of actually extending the benefits to these other groups?

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I welcome this debate, and would like to offer a few brief observations. I appreciate and support nearly all of Senator Phillips' remarks. As far as nomenclature is concerned, I think he will admit that in private conversation last evening, while referring to this bill and not having told me so beforehand, he mentioned the word "escapees". I had to do a double-take, and even a triple-take, to use modern language, to realize what he was aiming at. We must remember that the Second World War, in which so many of us participated in blue uniforms—this is true for three of the senators who preceded me—is receding further and further back in history. As Senator Godfrey said, our friends of those days glory in the appellations "evaders" and "escapees". But at least one-third—this is an arbitrary proportion—of the population of this country were not born when that war ended. The words "escapees" and "evaders" are beyond their comprehension. We should use such terms as "war escapees" and "war evaders". That term should be clarified. Another suggestion might be to use the word "enemy" as an adjective.

The number of those who had to undergo tremendous difficulties in answering their country's call to duty is dwindling rapidly. They are becoming fewer and fewer. Members of the Senate are at an age where this may not be as apparent, but many of us can appreciate it. In the other house, for instance, those who know the perils of war are few in number. Among the 25 or 30 ministers in the cabinet—and it does not matter whether it is a Liberal cabinet or a Conservative cabinet—few know what war is.

In 1972 I had the privilege of representing this chamber at the 30th anniversary of Dieppe. Dieppe is an historical event in which Senator Godfrey personally participated. In 1982 we will mark the 40th anniversary of Dieppe, and one wonders how many of those who were there will be left. They are becoming fewer and fewer. We should not be stingy with dollars for these people, whatever the value of the dollar may be today.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator McElman speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I wish to thank those who have participated in this debate. They have shown clearly the depth of feeling and respect the Senate has for those of our fellow citizens who, through war service, have become pensionable, and the dependants of those who have passed on and who are now recipients of pensions under the various pieces of legislation respecting war veterans.

Many of the suggestions and questions raised have to do with amendments that cannot be initiated in this chamber.

Senator Flynn: They could.

Senator McElman: It is important, however, that those views respecting further improvement in our veterans legislation be brought to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs by way of referring this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

If this bill receives second reading, it is my intention to move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, and that the Minister of Veterans Affairs be invited to appear before that committee so that he may answer questions that have been raised. It was also suggested by Senator Phillips that spokesmen from the Royal Air Forces Escaping Society appear before the committee. At that time we can impress upon the minister our views with respect to further improvement in the Veterans Charter.

I should like to comment briefly on the reference to "evaders" and "escapees," and the suggestion by Senator Phillips that evaders should be referred to as "escapees." There has to be a clear delineation between "escapees" and "evaders" in terms of the drafting of the bill, because their situations are entirely different. Many of those who evaded capture were not, in any sense, prisoners of war, and they cannot come under the definition of "escapees." I draw to the attention of the Senate the fact that the bill is to amend the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act, and that under that umbrella the technical definitions apply.

I do think it is a mistake to take the terminology out of the context in which it is written, because the context in which it is written makes the meaning very clear. "Escapee" can be given a similar connotation to that which is now being given to "evaders." We have escapees from many places, including prisons and penitentiaries. Surely no one would think they come under this bill. I agree with the comments made by Senator Godfrey. There were a great many who were evaders and they saw no deleterious connotation in the use of that word. They were proud of it.

With respect to the Polish veterans and, as has been added, veterans of other nations who served with the Canadian Armed Forces, I am not totally familiar with the circumstances, but it is my understanding that such persons, after being residents of Canada for 10 years, can come under many of the aspects of our Veterans Charter. However, I am not in a position to give the absolute detail of the situation, and I hope this can be referred to the Minister of Veterans Affairs when he appears before the committee.

Senator Phillips also made reference to the 48 per cent situation as it applies under this act, and no one knowing the origin of it. I certainly do not know the origin of it, and I would expect him to raise that matter at the committee meeting.

Dealing with the three-month cut-off provision, we have to bear in mind that there has to be a cut-off at some point. Should it be one week, three weeks, or what should it be? Rather than relating the cut-off to those who are eligible after three months, I think perhaps we should relate it, in fairness, to those who were comrades in arms, those who have had honourable service and are now drawing a pension. These people went through as much as any person who was a prisoner of war for two days, or two weeks.

It would seem rather unfair to give a bonus, if you will, to a person who suffered relatively little by reason of a short term of imprisonment. It has been made clear in this debate, and others, that while much can be suffered by a person in a short period of time, the mental anguish, the indignity, and the maltreatment, both psychological and physical, over a period of more than three months, have a continuing and great impact on an individual.

I realize there has to be a cut-off at some point, and I hope the minister can respond much more fully in this respect during the committee's consideration of this bill. I think all the other matters raised during debate can be discussed in committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McElman moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Motion agreed to.

SPORTS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON INTERNATIONAL HOCKEY—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, February 28, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Buckwold calling the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Committee on International Hockey to the Minister of State, Fitness and Amateur Sport.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, on first reading this report I was surprised to see the photograph of Senator Buckwold and learn that he had chaired this very important committee. I did not realize he had been such an excellent athlete in his youth. In response to my question as to why he had been chosen by the minister to preside over this committee, he said that during his term as Mayor of Saskatoon he had been a good skater, but he was quick to add that he was not a good skater on ice. I must say that when Senator Buckwold speaks in the Senate to defend the policies of the government or of his party, he still exhibits excellent skating ability.

In all seriousness, honourable senators, I congratulate Senator Buckwold on his chairing of this important committee, and on the excellent speech he made in presenting this report to the Senate.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, on looking over the work accomplished by that committee, questions inevitably come to one's mind. First, one wonders why that work was not performed jointly with the provinces since, as we know, both sports and education fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. I shall come back to this later as I develop my subject.

First of all, it was obviously not a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. One then wondered why a senator of the official opposition was not invited to sit on the committee, although we know that the Conservative Party was very ably represented on the committee by Mr. Roch La Salle and Dr. Bruce Halliday. We would have liked, I think, to have seen our party, in the Senate, represented or participating in that committee, and taking part in its deliberations. In any event—

[English]

Senator Buckwold: Would the honourable senator allow a clarification? He used the term "joint committee," and I would point out that it was not a joint committee as such; it was an ad hoc committee appointed by the minister.

Senator Asselin: I realize it was not a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. However, I regret that there was not greater Senate participation and collaboration in the efforts of the committee in respect of this important matter of sport in Canada.

[Translation]

Of course, the minister has already tabled a green paper. I do not wish to stop here and talk only about international hockey because I think there is a problem which is being examined by many Canadians; I am referring to the question of violence in hockey. Therefore, I will not limit myself to the question of international hockey. Of course, I will come back to it in the course of my remarks. However, I have said that the green paper tabled by the minister is nothing but a pile of pious wishes which all federal ministers responsible for amateur sport have been repeating for several years and which have never come true.

The Fitness and Amateur Sport Branch, which establishes the physical fitness program, is not really a ministry in itself. It has no authority. It has no general policy and practically no budget.

Canada should have a real national policy in this field. In other words, the government should consider amateur sport and physical training as a priority to which it is prepared to devote concerted efforts and large sums of money.

Starting from the principle that sport and physical fitness are the basics of a well understood national health, the government would formulate a policy aimed at making sport and physical fitness an ever present concept in the process of our national life. The more Canadians would practice sport and undergo physical training, the healthier they would be; the healthier they would be, the less the government would spend in medical services and all kinds of prevention practices.

For sport and physical fitness to become a daily reality, the federal government must assume most responsibilities for making it a part of our way of life. Every Canadian must be provided with the motivation and the means to practise the discipline of his choice and become proficient in it according to his capacities or talents.

That supposes the creation of a genuine concern so that young Canadians become interested in sport and physical fitness at the elementary level and not wait until they are forty years old, when they have grown fat and have flabby muscles before advising them that they should start jogging.

It has been only two or three years that we have started to dwell on that subject on radio and television and to publicize physical fitness. However, the government should have started long ago saying to Canadians that if they want to remain in good health, they should keep physically fit. They should start walking or practising some sports to remain in good shape.

It also means that schools and educational institutions should have the necessary facilities to enable young people to practice sports and physical conditioning.

It would also mean that teachers and coaches should be trained to teach various disciplines whether in schools or in various sport associations.

Well, we are aware that education and leisure planning fall under provincial jurisdiction. The federal government, therefore, must not interfere directly, but must operate in close consultation with the provinces and through their own organizations and mechanisms. It must be satisfied with playing the part of a catalyst of the policies, energies and funds made available to the provinces for sports as a tool of education.

As the foregoing requires rather large amounts of money, and as health is a federal responsibility, it is logical and necessary that the federal government should assume the greater part of the costs. The rest could be assumed by the provincial and municipal governments. The cost-sharing could be made on a 50-25-25 basis. The federal government could pay a lump sum to the provinces and supervise the spending, while the provinces in turn could do the same for municipalities. These would set their priorities in co-operation with the provincial authorities, which would do the same with the central government.

All provinces, Quebec included, would be delighted to benefit from federal grants to fitness and amateur sports, provided they are allowed to spend these grants according to their own priorities, needs and criteria, without any interference from the federal government.

I now come to the question of professional sport and international hockey. It is of course a different thing to speak of professional hockey and international hockey. In designing a policy, the government is up against the powerful giant of commercialized sport which is always seeking to make and amass more money rather than to promote fitness and maintain Canada's prestige abroad.

Here again, there is a serious lack of the authority necessary to control this entire field, and to prevent abuses and exploitation. There should be legislation to force professional leagues and associations to pay, some way or other, the cost of training young athletes who advance from junior to professional or from minor to major leagues. At present, professional clubs and associations in all forms of sport go and get the young stars and take full advantage of their talent, without having to reimburse a single penny of what it cost to train them.

Strict if not drastic rules should also be established regarding violence in sports, and especially in hockey, our national sport, which is becoming a form of spectacular bloodshed. To be effective, these rules would have to be supported by national legislation, otherwise fines and suspensions will always be written off by the interests of the financiers.

Furthermore, the attorneys general of the provinces have been concerned with violence in hockey for a few years. They ordered arrests. They followed up with prosecutions which, in most cases, led to few sentences. Of course, when these accused were tried before a jury it is obvious that the members of the jury did not have the education and the preparation which are necessary to judge these kinds of cases submitted to them by the attorneys general.

I also think that the federal government should inform people on control of violence in hockey. Many things were written on the subject. I refer all senators who are interested in amateur sport and also in this problem of violence in hockey to the studies made on this subject in New Brunswick. There is one study entitled "New Brunswick Hockey Study Report" which was submitted at the request of the Honourable Jean-Pierre Ouellet, the Minister of Youth. There is also another study entitled "The Violent Game", written by a Gary Ron Berg, which is available in the library. I also read other studies such as the one ordered by Ontario in 1974, which is entitled "Investigation and Enquiry into Violence in Amateur Hockey". I think those who are interested in this kind of sport, and who also want to control violence in hockey, should read these studies which demonstrate how far we have gone now to exploit violence in hockey in order to give a show. Then, I think it should be noted that in most cases young hockey players who are members of minor leagues have never received any education concerning their physical behaviour in the practice of this sport. We know that this education must start in school when the child is still very young and when he is still able to understand fully the meaning of his behaviour while practising this sport.

However, nothing has been done yet to teach children that if they want to be successful in this sport and become stars, it is essential that they forego violence and concentrate completely on developing their talents for both minor league and major league hockey. In my opinion, the federal government should play a leading role in this area. It could instruct the National Film Board to prepare a documentary which would show that talent, energy and courage have always had a place in the success of an athlete. In my opinion, the NFB could film examples of the behaviour of certain hockey players, like Béliveau, Lafleur and Perreault, to name a few, to show clearly to young boys that these players became successful while foregoing violence and developing their athletic qualities.

In my opinion, honourable senators, this is a very positive aspect of amateur sports and the minister should consider it in establishing in Canada a true national policy in a very large sense for amateur sports.

In closing, I would like to say that I am fully in agreement with the three recommendations contained in the report submitted to the Senate by the committee. The federal government has a limited but important role to play to support Canadian participation in world competition. Senator Buckwold said that a great majority of respondents in the survey made among Canadians thought that it was much more important to take part in international tournaments than to win. As for me, I would agree with Senator Steuart who, as I understand it, replied: "For my part, I want to win." We must win when we play in international competitions. I am not saying that we must win at any price. But I believe that Canada must make a good showing since hockey is the national sport of Canada. Of course, we can always say that there will be close games with countries like the U.S.S.R. which have excellent teams, but in my opinion it is a shame for a country like Canada, whose national sport is hockey, to suffer such a fiasco as in our participation in Vienna.

As recommended in the report of the committee, we should reorganize this association so that it will be made up of people who set up international competitions abroad. I would say that we must be very well prepared. The federal government must provide the necessary financing to accommodate the athletes who want to participate, especially on an international level. In this way, I believe we shall serve the interests not only of the players who participate in these tournaments, but Canada itself by giving back to all Canadians the pride that they must feel.

Honourable senators, those are the few comments I wanted to make following the tabling of this report. In closing, I want to say that the committee presided over by our colleague, Senator Buckwold, has prepared an excellent report.

NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF SELECTION PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Senator Petten, Chairman of the Committee of Selection, presented the following report:

Wednesday, March 8, 1978.

The Committee of Selection appointed to nominate senators to serve on the several select committees during the present session makes its fourth report as follows:

Your committee has the honour to submit herewith the list of senators nominated by it to serve on the Special Committee of the Senate on a Northern Gas Pipeline, namely, the Honourable Senators Austin, Bonnell, Flynn, Lang, Langlois, Lucier, Manning, McIlraith, Olson, Riley, Rowe, Smith (Colchester), Steuart, van Roggen, Williams and Yuzyk.

Respectfully submitted,

William J. Petten,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne), that this report be now adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I will agree to having this report adopted today in order to dissipate any clouds that might be casting a shadow on the attitude of the opposition with regard to this pipeline bill.

[Translation]

I am quite satisfied with the membership of this committee, especially since both Senator Langlois and I will sit on it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Senator Smith (Colchester) as well, so its members and all those who have commended Senator Smith for the manner—

Senator Bourget: He deserved it.

Senator Flynn:—in which he chaired the Committee on Transport and Communications will have the opportunity to prove their confidence in him by electing him chairman. That would be the best way of showing that their praise and appreciation were sincere.

I said I wanted to clear up some misunderstandings because, last Thursday, after Senator John M. Macdonald spoke on the motion for referral of the bill, or its subject, to a special committee, the motion was passed. That was obvious. We had, on this side, expressed reservations about setting up a special committee when one was already clearly indicated by our rules. That was not a fundamental objection but rather one of principle.

After having expressed our opposition, and our regrets that the members of the party in power should have no confidence in that committee, which could anyway be modified to include almost all honourable senators who are members of the special committee, after that we agreed that, if the Senate so wished, well then, let it set up a special committee to that end.

However, Senator Langlois, as he usually does, wanted to pursue the debate though it was already over and, again as he usually does, he insisted on building himself some strawmen which he then proceeded to knock down vigorously to the ground.

Senator Langlois: It hurt them.

Senator Flynn: I do not know about that, but it certainly made the committee waste a couple of days; it could otherwise have been set up then and there. It might even now be operating.

Senator Langlois: You had adjourned the debate.

Senator Flynn: Yes, we did, the day before but, because of your speech on that day, we wasted at least one full half hour.

Senator Langlois: A full half hour is not a few days.

Senator Flynn: No, but we had to resume the debate on Thursday and the committee could not be set up right away, precisely because it was Thursday.

Among the strawmen set up by Senator Langlois, once again to better knock them down, there was the fact that he claimed we were opposed to the bill. He told me I had given only one reason for opposing the creation of that committee, namely, the election intentions of the government and the Liberal Party. That is false, absolutely false. I said at the start that I was not opposed to the principle of referring the subject of the bill to a committee—I said that, and I quote—all I have here is the English version, which I will not translate into French again—

[English]

I recognize the urgency of this legislation. It is twofold: First because the project itself must start as soon as possible—

Surely that was clear enough.

—second, if we are to have an election campaign, it is necessary that this legislation be adopted and for the government, the party in power, to make it part of its election platform and benefit from it as much as it possibly can. I am aware of that and I do not object.

• (1410)

Therefore it was clear that I was not objecting to the pipeline bill nor at that time was I objecting to its being referred to a special committee or, as we would have preferred, to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

[Translation]

Finally, the second strawman Senator Langlois set up was when he told me that I was certainly aware, as he said earlier, that there had been absolutely no criticism in the other place about the urgency to pass this legislation and start construction. That is what I had said. He implied that I was not aware of my party's position and that I intended to take another position than that. There is no question about it. I fully agreed with that position. I was very glad to, and I have agreed once again today that the report be adopted forthwith in order that the committee meet immediately, if it can, after the adjournment to choose its chairman and get to work as early as next week, as early as Monday if it so wishes. I have no objection to that.

Of course, to oppose our claim that this issue should have been referred to the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, Senator Langlois quoted a lot of precedents. I did not take the trouble to check whether they were really valid precedents or not. We, on the opposition side, have the duty of keeping the government majority on the alert. I do not see why each time we raise an objection it creates a real scandal, a sort of resistance, of panic on the part of the government leader. We can very well have objections to raise and then accept the proposition of the majority, as we have very often done.

I would only say this: It is time that the Leader of the Government stop panicking at the slightest thing. He goes as far as evoking private conversations and giving false interpretations of them. That is why I tell him in friendly terms—and he knows I consider him as a friend—that when we are sitting in this house there is another point to take into consideration—his responsibility, my responsibility and the responsibility of those who are sitting on this side of the house. If we cannot have conversations outside the house without him trying to interpret them in his own way afterwards, I can tell him that we will have no more of these conversations. I am prepared to co-operate, as I did in the past, but I do not want to be told at every turn: "Remember, you said that to me on the plane, on the phone or elsewhere."

Senator Langlois: I did not say that.

Senator Flynn: You mentioned the plane in connection with Senator Smith's appointment. You referred to Senator Grosart's comment on the phone about the adoption of this motion. Well, if we are going to discuss the meaning and significance of our private conversations, co-operation will be very difficult. The opposition in the Senate is eager to co-operate. It must, however, do its duty and indicate its disagreement once in a while. In this respect, I merely say to Senator Langlois that, if he wants to, he is welcome to make a speech of half an hour in reply to what I have just said. That is his business.

Senator Langlois: I shall do as I please.

Senator Flynn: I simply want to tell him this: a wise government knows when to accept criticism without fighting back.

Senator Langlois: Without replying?

Senator Flynn: Without replying, because this is the only way you can secure the full co-operation you are seeking. Allow us to say once in a while what we really think, without always trying to run over us for no reason at all.

I am merely saying this: we had agreed on the principle of starting consideration of this bill immediately. We have given today the permission which we could have given last week. I hope that the committee will do a good job and sit as soon as possible. Moreover, I hope that the committee will appoint Senator Smith as its chairman, and that it will make it possible for this bill to get royal assent before the Easter adjournment.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the distinguished Leader of the Opposition seems to be in uncommonly vigorous form this afternoon, although it seems to me that he must have had a bad oyster for lunch, he seems so dyspeptic.

The important thing surely is the fact that we now have a broad-based special committee, including senators of undoubted integrity, ability and expertise, and there is no doubt that this important matter of the natural gas pipeline will be given the careful attention it deserves. I really wonder whether we achieve very much in this process of going over past debates and old ground. Nobody on this side has ever suggested that the opposition had anything but the most fundamental right to disagree with anything they wished to on government policy.

Senator Flynn: Bravo!

[Translation]

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I ask the forbearance of the house to reply to a political speech, entirely out of order, which has just been made by my excellent friend, Senator Flynn.

In the first place, Senator Flynn—

Senator Flynn: No, no!

Senator Langlois: Let me speak. I did not interrupt you when you spoke, so now please do the same for me.

In the first place, Senator Flynn referred to the speech I made in this house on March 2. According to him, I said that he objected to the passage of the bill. I have never said that, and I challenge him to prove that I did. This is what I said and about which Senator Asselin raised an objection. I am quoting it in English because I do not want it to be translated again.

[English]

Honourable senators, yesterday, the Honourable Senator Flynn referred to the urgency of getting the pipeline legislation through but what he apparently meant—

I emphasize the words “apparently meant”.

—was to emphasize the urgency for the government to get the project going for electoral purposes, given the likelihood of forthcoming general elections.

[Translation]

It does not mean that I was suggesting that you were against the urgent passage of the bill. I objected only to the reason given to explain that urgency, which was a purely political reason.

[English]

Senator Flynn: Only one, you said.

Senator Langlois: This is not what I said. “Only one” was left out.

Senator Flynn: But you did say that.

Senator Langlois: My main statement was the one I have just quoted, to which Senator Asselin objected at the time.

● (1420)

[Translation]

I am surprised the honourable senator should suddenly become so touchy. As my leader said a moment ago, I wonder what he had for lunch today. He has become quite touchy regarding his attitude on Wednesday, and he has been trying ever since to find a way to answer what I said during his absence. It is not my fault if he was absent on Wednesday. I did not even know we were supposed to proceed with this motion on that day. But when he says that my speech had the effect of delaying by a few days the passing of the motion to refer the bill to a special committee, he is wrong. After the statement I made a moment ago, he partly rectified his mistake by admitting it was only half an hour. It was he anyway who adjourned the debate on the motion the day after, immediately after Senator Macdonald had spoken. I answered him within twenty minutes and then the motion was passed.

But is the honourable senator asking us, on this side of the house, to listen to his representations, interjections and interpellations without answering? If what he wants is a dialogue of the deaf he should say so. If he thinks he is always right in his remarks and has this pretension, I would not want to contradict him.

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Langlois: I would not want to deprive him of this pretension, but if he wants his remarks to remain unanswered, he had better not talk. This house has the duty of debating issues of public interest. I think members on both sides should be allowed to answer as long as we are not out of order. My opinion is that the honourable senator was out of order this afternoon, but he wished so much to give that reply that I did not want to rise on a point of order.

Senator Flynn: You could not have—

Senator Langlois: Yes, I could have if I had wanted to.

Senator Flynn: What I say is that you could not have kept silent.

Senator Langlois: The same for you, and then some. He is now saying that we have been friends for many years. He is right. We have been friends for quite a while, but I know because of my experience in politics and the law that it is possible for friends to have different opinions and argue points fiercely while remaining on the best of terms as friends. This is something I shall never disregard.

Senator Flynn: Certainly not.

Senator Langlois: I am amazed that my honourable friend should object to this approach.

Senator Flynn: That is what I said.

Senator Langlois: Do you want to make a couple of speeches? You are interrupting me all the time.

Senator Flynn: I was saying that that is what I said.

Senator Langlois: I think it is about time we put an end to this flood of interruptions. My honourable friend cannot stand controversy. He spends his time making all sorts of remarks to make whoever is speaking lose the thread of his ideas, but he will fail this time with me. He knows that this tactic which he has been trying on me for the past six years will fail again today.

Now, I think I clearly indicated to this house on Thursday the reasons for setting up this special committee. I am glad to see that my honourable colleague and friend is now in agreement with the setting up of this committee. I am sure it will do a good job. As I said last Thursday, however, I am against any suggestion aimed at changing the composition of a committee which is operating as well as that on transport and communications, thereby accepting Senator Asselin's idea to entrust the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications with this bill and disbanding the committee and appointing senators who have both expertise and knowledge of the needs of the areas most directly affected by the building of this pipeline.

Senator Flynn: Like you and me.

Senator Langlois: We are not the majority, for that matter. Because there are only four senators from western Canada on this committee of 22 members, it is completely off balance and lacks anyway the necessary expertise to study such a bill, expertise in the areas of environment, sociology, natural resources of regions which are entirely foreign to us, as representatives from eastern Canada. I feel therefore that this fully warrants the setting up of a special committee, as it fully warrants also the remarks Senator Asselin made when he suggested we submit this matter to the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, but only after changing its composition. What I said on this subject was fully appropriate.

I do not want to continue this debate, which I feel is out of order, but I want to tell my honourable colleague that our differences of opinion will be limited to this house and that they will have no repercussions outside. I hope we shall remain good friends for many years to come.

Senator Asselin: Would the honourable senator allow me a question? Is there any chance that my colleague Senator Smith will be appointed chairman of that committee, since we have praised so much his talents as chairman of the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications?

Senator Langlois: First of all, it is not I but the committee itself which is going to appoint the chairman. I accept in advance the choice that the committee will make.

Senator Flynn: Could I ask a question of the honourable senator? Would he prefer I agree or disagree with him?

Senator Langlois: That you disagree, because if you agree it would mean I would be wrong myself.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Petten, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne), that the report of the Selection Committee be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, before the question is put, I wonder if the Selection Committee would consider the addition of one further name? I refer to Senator Adams of the Northwest Territories.

It seems to me that the voice of another group of native people who are involved in this problem of pipelines would be useful. I am delighted to see that Senator Williams is a member, but I should like to suggest that the name of Senator Adams be added to the list.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I understand from the report of the Selection Committee that I have been named to the Special Committee on the Northern Gas Pipeline. We in the east have little knowledge of this subject, although we do have the Tenneco pipeline concern down there. I would prefer that my name be withdrawn from the committee and that my place be taken by Senator Cameron, who is well versed in the problems of pipelines in the northwest. He is familiar with the area and the ecological problems connected with the tundra, and he could contribute much more to the deliberations of the committee than I could. When it was suggested that the subject matter concerning a northern gas pipeline should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, as a member of that committee I agreed with that suggestion. In any event, I would recommend that someone with the knowledge and experience of Senator Cameron should be named to the committee, and I am willing to yield my place to him.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the list of names for the proposed committee was evolved in co-operation with a number of honourable senators, including members of the opposition. Without question there is the possibility of adding further names at a later stage. Some senators may be absent from some of the meetings. It is very much a procedural matter. I am sure that the suggestions put forward will receive serious consideration by the committee.

Senator Flynn: That could be done later.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, March 14, 1978, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

● (1430)

Honourable senators, as is customary, before the question is put I should like to provide the Senate with the information I have regarding our program for the next week.

Again, the committee schedule is a very heavy one. On Tuesday the National Finance Committee has a meeting scheduled for 2.30 p.m. to consider both the main estimates for 1978-79 and supplementary estimates (B) for 1977-78. Also on Tuesday there will be a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science Subcommittee on Childhood Experiences at 4 p.m. and, at 8.30 p.m., a meeting of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

We are now in the process of trying to arrange for Tuesday evening a meeting of the Transport and Communications Committee on Bill C-2, respecting the administration and development of certain fishing and recreational harbours in Canada, or the Health, Welfare and Science Committee on Bill C-27, to amend the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act. Whether or not one of those committees will meet on Tuesday evening will depend upon the availability of witnesses.

On Wednesday, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. to consider both Bill C-16, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act, and the subject matter of Bill C-13, the combines investigation legislation. At 3.30 p.m. the National Finance Committee will again meet to consider supplementary estimates (B) for 1977-78. In the event that the Health, Welfare and Science Committee does not meet on Tuesday evening on Bill C-27, it will meet on Wednesday when the Senate rises.

On Thursday the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at its usual time, 9.30 a.m., on Bill S-3, respecting Canadian non-profit corporations. Also at 9.30 a.m. on Thursday the National Finance Committee will meet to consider the main estimates for 1978-79, and the Foreign Affairs Committee will hold an in camera meeting to consider its draft report on Canada-U.S. relations. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments is scheduled to meet at 11 a.m.

[Senator Perrault.]

It is expected that there will be additions to this list as the week progresses. It may be that we will have to reserve all day Wednesday for committee meetings, but that is not something to be decided before Tuesday evening at the earliest.

Dealing now with the workload in the Senate for next week, on Tuesday evening Senator Desruisseaux will call the attention of the Senate to the right of public access to government documents and information. The supply bill covering supplementary estimates is expected to pass the other place on Wednesday next and should come to us on Thursday. In addition to any bills which may come to us from the other place during the course of next week, it is our hope to have a bill for introduction in the Senate in the first instance.

We may find it advisable as the week progresses to sit on Friday of next week, or to come back on Monday of the following week. In any event, before any decision is reached in that respect, the Leader of the Opposition will be consulted.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Tuesday next, March 14, 1978, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Grosart: Explain.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, as I said in my statement outlining the work program for next week, it is possible that this committee will not be meeting. I am making the motion today in order to allow notices to be sent out. Depending on the availability of witnesses, either this committee or the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will be meeting on Tuesday evening. We will have to cancel one of the meetings, depending on what witnesses are available.

Senator Grosart: Is there a pressing reason why these two committees cannot meet at times other than when the Senate is sitting?

Senator Langlois: I have only to refer the honourable senator to the long list of committee meetings for next week. The week is very full, and unless we decide to sit on Friday we will have to allow some of these committees to sit while the Senate is sitting. In order to avoid this situation—which is particularly embarrassing to the opposition because of their small number—I will be suggesting on Tuesday evening that we reserve the whole of Wednesday afternoon, or most of it, for committee work.

Senator Grosart: If the decision is for the Senate not to sit on Wednesday, is it then suggested that that will avoid the Tuesday night meetings?

Senator Langlois: That might be possible, but there again we are bound by the availability of witnesses. As honourable senators know, at the meeting of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications this morning the minister was invited to reappear before the committee. If that is the only evening he can give us, we shall have to meet at that time, since we could not postpone it then to the next day. However, if the situation changes between now and Tuesday I will advise the house as soon as I know about it.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Tuesday next, March 14, 1978, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a):

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday next, March 15, 1978, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Langlois: This is subject to the remarks I made earlier.

Senator Grosart: We will soon need a motion to allow the Senate to sit while the committees are meeting.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

FARM CREDIT BILL—FURTHER QUESTION

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, on February 28 last I asked the Leader of the Government whether or not amendments to the Farm Credit Act might be expected soon. I suggested at that time some of the things I thought should be included in such an amending bill. I wonder whether the Leader of the Government has any reply to make to that question.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I draw your attention to the fact that this bill is shown on the Order Paper of the other place for today. It is hoped it will be introduced tomorrow, or at the earliest opportunity thereafter.

● (1440)

THE ECONOMY

MEETING BETWEEN AMERICAN AND CANADIAN TREASURY OFFICIALS—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government a question about the meetings that have taken place or are still in progress between United States treasury officials and Canadian treasury officials? I wonder if he would give a report to this house about those meetings, particularly in view of Item No. 2 on the Order Paper which concerns the relative values of the Canadian dollar and the United States dollar.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am not in a position to present a report on this subject to the Senate today. However, an endeavour will be made to provide a statement at the earliest possible opportunity.

Senator Olson: If I may add a supplementary question, could the Leader of the Government inform us if the discussions taking place between Canada and the United States today might lead to an agreement respecting an additional announcement that any speculative attack on Canadian currency would be known in the international financial community, so that such contemplated actions would be non-profitable?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must take that question as notice, together with the first question asked by the honourable senator.

AGRICULTURE

GRAIN ELEVATOR FACILITIES AT PRINCE RUPERT—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have an answer to the question asked by Senator Austin on February 22 last about the Prince Rupert grain facilities, but no answer as yet to the supplementary question posed by Senator Argue.

The essence of Senator Austin's question is: Can the government leader tell us whether an early announcement of the construction of a new large grain facility at Prince Rupert is in the offing?

In replying to the honourable senator, I would refer to two press releases, the first by the Minister of Agriculture dated March 7, 1978, and the second by the Minister of Transport under the same date.

Briefly, the Department of Agriculture's press release refers to the upgrading of the Prince Rupert terminal at a cost of $11.5 million. The Department of Transport's press release details the development and servicing of the Ridley Island site at a cost of approximately $16.3 million.

I am informed that these projects will be financed by the federal government, with assistance, possibly, from the Province of Alberta in respect of the Ridley Island site. Operating control will remain with the Canada Government Elevators,—which is a government system.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

BICENTENNIAL OF VISIT OF CAPTAIN JAMES COOK

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, and with your leave, I rise to draw attention to an event being celebrated in British Columbia this year, namely, the 200th anniversary of the visit of Captain James Cook to the shores of that province. Probably the first European to see the British Columbian coastline, Captain Cook, according to his log, landed at Nootka Sound on the west coast of Vancouver Island on March 29, 1778.

There are many versions of how Captain Cook ventured into Nootka Sound, but I believe the most authentic one is that he was discovered adrift and helpless at sea, having encountered severe North Pacific winter storms, by the efficient and helpful British Columbia search and rescue service of the time. A patrolling 20-man long-boat sighted the unhappy vessel, and assisted her to a safe landing at what is now known as Friendly Cove. After 4 or 5 weeks of reprovisioning and repairs to the ship, Captain Cook was able to sail on in search of the Northwest Passage via the Bering Strait, and ultimately to the Hawaiian Islands where, regrettably, he was not as well received, dying there in an accident.

May I simply add, honourable senators, that British Columbians have maintained their reputation for hospitality and friendship, and would invite all of you to visit British Columbia in this bicentennial year, which recollects the meeting of Captain Cook and the friendly native people of British Columbia.

Senator Williams: Honourable senators, I rise to support my colleague's invitation to visit British Columbia in this bicentennial year, and in doing so I cannot help relating one or two incidents. Not only in British Columbia but from the east coast to the west coast every explorer had help from the Indian people of what is now Canada. There were also incidents that may not have been pleasant, but they were mostly incidents of misunderstanding.

The first ship that sailed to my reservation was known as a man-o'-war. The crew anchored six miles away and from a sense of curiosity went to see the people—the Indian people, my people. They went there in six huge rowboats, all in uniform, and landed on the beach in formation and with muskets on their shoulders. The chief had one musket—I don't know where he got it—and he told his nephew to be the one-man guard of honour to meet them. He was misunderstood. They took him and bound him, and it was two years before he got back home. And to show that the Indians were friendly, the musket was not even loaded.

I fully support what my colleague has said and concur in his invitation to all of you to visit British Columbia in this bicentennial year.

Senator Bell: Honourable senators, I would like to add my concurrence in the remarks of my colleagues from British Columbia, and also to point out, as Senator Williams has done, that there is a western and eastern component to all this, because Captain Cook's first voyage to Canada was in 1759—19 years before he got to Friendly Cove in British Columbia—when he was navigating for Wolfe on the St. Lawrence.

Furthermore, in 1778 when he came to Friendly Cove and Nootka Sound—I am getting all this, by the way, from that fine book by Bob Bowman entitled Dateline Canada; and should I add that he is my brother?—and was greeted by the friendly search and rescue crew, he had the infamous Captain Bligh of the Bounty as his navigator, and one of his young officers was George Vancouver who later came back and, of course, went on to further discoveries on the west coast.

So come and discover our province for yourselves in this Captain Cook bicentennial year.

SCIENCE POLICY

VOLUME 4 OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, December 1, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Lamontagne, calling the attention of the Senate to the report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy, appointed in the last session of Parliament and authorized in that session to consider and report on Canadian government and other expenditures on scientific activities and matters related thereto, entitled: A Science Policy for Canada, Volume 4, Progress and Unfinished Business, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, October 25, 1977.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, this item has been standing in my name for several weeks now, the reason being, as I explained on an earlier occasion, that this was pending the finalization of certain arrangements in connection with the phasing out of the work of this committee. This may well be the last occasion when the Senate will be considering a report of a special committee of the Senate on a national science policy, and for that reason I intend to make a few quite brief remarks on the work of that committee.

The document before us is the fourth and final volume of the report of the committee, and it is entitled Progress and Unfinished Business. As far as I am concerned that is an appropriate title for the entire work of the committee over a period of almost ten years. It is hard for me, as one who was an original member of the committee at the invitation of Senator Lamontagne, to believe it is almost ten years ago that this task was initiated. Ten years is a long time for any special committee to take to complete its work—and, of course, in one sense the work of this committee is not yet completed. However, the work was done in response to a mandate from this house that the committee inquire into and report upon the multitude of decisions which were being made, and are still being made, in respect of scientific and technological matters which affect the standard of life and the way of living of every Canadian today and in the future.

I am sure that all members of the committee—and by now, I think, all members of the Senate—would agree with me that the committee has been a success, and its success is due largely to Senator Lamontagne, the chairman. I am delighted to see that he is in the chamber on this occasion. It was his brilliant conception of the necessity of having an examination of Canadian science policy, that resulted in the mandate from the Senate. It was his dogged and determined leadership over these years that brought about the accomplishments which stand, and will continue to stand for a long time, to the credit of the committee.

Honourable senators are entitled to know what the committee accomplished in that period of almost ten years. In a general way, I can pass on three short comments which have been made by close observers of the work of the committee over that time. The first comment is from Dr. Alexander King, who was at the time the head of the Science Secretariat of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, representing the views of 24 nations of the world. Dr. Alexander King said:

In no country has the legislative branch undertaken such a thorough and detailed job.

As the committee continued its work, the then Minister of Science and Technology, the Honourable Charles M. Drury, said:

I have been most impressed by the record of performance of your committee . . . No one can doubt the thoroughness with which you approached your task. I think it is fair to say that no other investigation of science policy anywhere in the world has equalled that carried out by your committee. Your report has constituted a significant background to all discussions of science policy matters, and its influence will continue to be felt not only in Canada but, I suspect, also internationally.

Mr. Drury's successor as Minister of Science and Technology, the Honourable Hugh Faulkner, said:

This is my first meeting with the committee which, if I may say so, has been one of the outstanding success stories of parliamentary committees. I do not say that gratuitously. I happen to believe that not only has the committee made a profound impact on the development of science policy with government . . . but outside . . . I think it has been viewed . . . as a landmark of political awareness, if you like, of the role of science and technology in Canada.

I say again, honourable senators, that while those comments were directed to the committee, all members of the committee would agree that if a bow has to be taken it should be taken by the chairman of the committee, Senator Lamontagne.

Those are merely general comments on the work of the committee. In more specific terms, perhaps I can indicate just a few highlights—merely the tip of the iceberg—of achievement. This is not the time to go into detail, some of which is to be found in the fourth report. I indicate these highlights merely as symbols of the kinds of things that were achieved, because I am sure all honourable senators are concerned that when they set up a committee that committee justify its existence in terms of the public interest.

When the committee began its hearings, Canada was one of the few western industrial market economies which did not have a minister or a department dealing specifically with science, and scientific and technological decisions. One of the earliest recommendations of the committee was that such a ministry be established in Canada, and the government responded quite quickly by establishing what we now call MOSST.

At that time Canada was also in the unique position of having no general association, no overall association, of the various societies in the science community. Again, as a direct result not only of a recommendation but of the actual work of the committee, there was set up for the first time in Canada such an overall society generally known as SCITEC, its full name being the Association of the Scientific Engineering and Technological Communities of Canada. That association established, in effect, as I say, for the first time by Senator Lamontagne's committee, is still carrying on its work and is making a valuable contribution to national science policy decision-making in Canada today.

It is hard to believe that when the committee began its work there was no such thing as a science budget in Canada. There were no reliable figures on what was being spent overall—that is, the general expenditure on science activities and research and development in Canada. Even more strange, there were no reliable figures on what the Canadian government was spending. Again, as a result of our recommendations—and, more than recommendations, our prodding and continuous prodding for quite a while—it was decided to expose to the Canadian public a kind of budget. Many of us—Senator Cameron, Senator Lamontagne, myself and others—were being asked to speak at universities and to learned societies, and I well remember making the statement that we did not know the level of Canadian government funding of science activities and research and development. That statement got into the press. I received two letters in response to it, one from the Science Council and one from the Treasury Board. Both were very polite. They said, "No doubt you are misreported, senator, but here are the figures." And certain figures were then given to me by the Science Council and by the Treasury Board, but they were $300 million apart. That was the state of the art at that time.

Today, on a continuing basis and as a result of progressive recommendations by the committee, we have what can be called a visible science budget. There are recommendations in our final report as to the way that visible budget can be made more visible and brought more under the operation of the Ministry of State for Science and Technology. It is not a perfect instrument at the moment, but in general it matches the best in other countries. Perhaps it is not quite as good as the French system, but it is still a great improvement on the situation that we faced when this committee commenced its work. In the opinion of the committee this was most important because now each department is required to aggregate its own science spending intentions before the Treasury Board makes its decision to approve the departmental estimates. It goes to the experts in MOSST, and that ministry now, at least, has an input on the overall validity of total science spending in Canada before the Treasury Board makes its decision. MOSST has complained to us at times that it did not always have enough time, but I believe that situation is improving.

When the committee started its work, Canada was in the most extraordinary position of having a National Science Council with very wide responsibilities but no mandate to include the social sciences either in its membership or within the scope of its activities. There was a recommendation of the committee pointing out this absurd situation, and that has been remedied.

The committee also dealt with the problem of the existing organization of the various science "agencies" of government, if I may use that word in the broad sense. The committee recommended a very extensive re-organization of these bodies, and this has taken place, not exactly as the committee recommended, but certainly in keeping with the spirit and general intention of the recommendation.

When the committee first addressed itself to the problem of national science policy, it found the most unbelievable imbalances in the spending of government funds in this area. In charts and statistics that we prepared, we found Canada very often at the bottom of the ladder. Unfortunately, in some areas it is still at the bottom of the ladder. The fourth report of the committee contains some suggestions as to how these continuing deficiencies may be remedied. It is fair to say that some part of the slowness in implementing the recommendations of the committee is due to the economic circumstances of the last two or three years—circumstances which were not predicted.

The committee also addressed itself very seriously to what is probably the single most important problem of science policy in Canada, and that is the support, financial and otherwise, of research and development in industry. It was a long, hard battle in the committee and in its external relations with the various departments of government in trying to persuade them of the importance of developing a much higher level of innovation in Canadian industry than has previously existed.

Progress has been made. At one time we had what was called the "alphabet soup" approach. We had something like 12 or 14 "schemes"—and that is probably the appropriate word—for the support of research in industry. Almost without exception they failed. The committee made certain recommendations as to how research in industry might be supported in a more useful way in order to achieve some returns to the Canadian economy, and the result has been a major change in government approach to this problem. Some of the changes are indicated in the report. This is not the time to go into them in detail, but I think it is fair to say that as a result of the work of Senator Lamontagne's committee, there is a new awareness at all levels in government—departmental, cabinet and otherwise—of the fantastic urgency of government support in this area.

The committee has now concluded its work, and this raises the problem of who will carry it on. A vacuum has been created so that once again Canada today is almost certainly the only western industrialized market country which has no science and technology committee in its elected house or at all in its Parliament. The committee has recommended that this vacuum be filled. It has made more or less alternative suggestions: first, that the elected house, the House of Commons, should have such a committee; failing that, or implementing that, there should be a joint committee of both houses; and, in any event, the Senate itself, as long as that vacuum lasts, should move to fill it by establishing a standing committee on science. I am aware that we have a committee known as the Health, Welfare and Science Committee, but this work has never been regarded as its responsibility. Indeed, that committee does not have a mandate to carry on a continuing survey and examination of national science policy as it is developed.

The preface to the report concludes:

Our last message is another call for quick, vigorous action.

I am sure Senator Lamontagne would be the first to emphasize this, because that has been the position he has taken all along—that the job of this committee was not just to make reports and recommendations or hear witnesses; it was to get action. It is true that the committee did not get all the action it wished, and it has not achieved all that it had set out to achieve. However, it has been a success. I have indicated some external opinions and there are many more that could be quoted. It has, I am sure, been a credit to the Senate. As Mr. Faulkner said, it has been "one of the outstanding success stories of parliamentary committees."

In conclusion, honourable senators, I repeat what I said at the beginning of my remarks, that most of the credit for these accomplishments—and they have been very real accomplishments—is due to Senator Lamontagne. He has given almost ten years of his life to making this committee and its work a success in the public interest. He has discharged a burden of responsibility that few of us would willingly undertake if we knew it was a ten-year task. He has earned the thanks not only of his colleagues but of all Canadians everywhere, now and for some generations to come.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

● (1510)

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, my remarks will be very brief. First of all, I thank Senator Grosart for the kind words and the compliments he paid me. My second and final point is to share with him all he said about me, because he was an active, imaginative and creative member of the committee. I also wish to thank all other members of our committee, especially, of course, our Vice-Chairman, Senator Cameron.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 14, 1978, at 8 p.m.

HONOURABLE JEAN MARCHAND, P.C.

NEWSPAPER REPORT—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, I do not intend to annoy or embarrass you with a matter which does not come under the authority of this house and which is now the subject matter of a prosecution in Toronto. I note, according to the newspaper reports, that the witness has testified in what is now known as "the dredging affair" under the protection of the court. For the moment, my comments are necessarily restricted.

I take the liberty of taking a few minutes of your time because I believe you are entitled to know some aspects of the problem so that the reputation of this speaker may not be further unfairly tarnished.

First, I can solemnly state that I have never intervened in the awarding of the Cap-à-la-Roche dredging contract nor have I ever exercised any pressure on anyone in that case.

Second, I have never directly or indirectly received for myself, my constituency or the Quebec area the $25,000 mentioned in Mr. Horace Rindress testimony. I knew nothing about that gift.

Third, when the contract was awarded in August 1972, I was not Minister of Transport, but Minister of Regional Development.

According to all the newspaper reports and the statement of the witness, I was then supposed to be the Minister of Transport who had awarded the contract to the company involved. Well that is not true.

It was only in November 1972 that I was entrusted with the transport portfolio. I suggest that this is a very significant fact, because it was the Minister of Transport who had to give the final approval. May I remind my honourable colleagues that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has examined the minutest particulars of all my files since my appointment as minister. Moreover, it has even investigated the $25,000 which Mr. Rindress seems to be obsessed with. Nobody can suspect the RCMP of any weakness in my favour.

I suggest that Mr. Rindress was well advised to seek the protection of the court.

There is quite a variety of thieves in this world. One of the most dangerous is probably the kind that seeks to destroy his neighbour's reputation.

However, I want to conclude on a somewhat happier note. I once asked the Prime Minister whether he knew anybody who could claim that he had me in the palm of his hand. He said: "No, unfortunately".

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

FIRST READINGS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that messages had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-267, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Prince George-Peace River); Bill C-358, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle); Bill C-412, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Humber-Port-au-Port-St. Barbe); Bill C-414, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Prince Edward-Hastings); Bill C-415, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Saint-Henri-Westmount); Bill C-417, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Sainte-Marie); Bill C-418, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Hochelaga-Maisonneuve); and Bill C-423, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Mégantic-Compton-Stanstead).

Bills read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the second time?

An Hon. Senator: Never.

Senator McElman moved that the bills be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report on certain aspects of the Public Service Employee Pension Program to the President of the Treasury Board prepared by Tomenson-Alexander Associates Ltd.

Report respecting operations under the Health Resources Fund Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1977, pursuant to section 13 of the said Act, Chapter H-4, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of Minister's Permits issued under the authority of the Immigration Act for the year ended December 31, 1977, pursuant to section 8(5) of the said Act, Chapter I-2, R.S.C., 1970.

Capital Budget of the Northern Transportation Company Limited for the year ending December 31, 1978, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copies of Order in Council P.C. 1978-627, dated March 2, 1978, approving same.

NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Flynn, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Asselin be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Yuzyk on the list of senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on a Northern Gas Pipeline.

Motion agreed to.

THE ECONOMY

EXCHANGE RATE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 23, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Austin calling the attention of the Senate to the situation with respect to the Canadian dollar, the floating exchange rate and its relevance to the Canadian economy.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, you need not worry, I do not intend to keep you long. I was never sure that I should enter this debate anyway, and I am even less sure that I should as I enter it tonight. It is a vast and complex subject. Since Senator Austin spoke some two weeks ago, I have been trying to gather my thoughts by reading and listening. And the more I read and listen, the more confused I become. There appears not to be any consensus as to the causes or effects of this newly devalued dollar. Nor is there any consensus among those who do not accept the situation regarding the devaluation of the Canadian dollar concerning the validity of the remedies being suggested.

On one matter there is agreement. The devaluation of the Canadian dollar reflects a sick economy. I do not suggest that all the blame for that should be placed exclusively on the action or inactions of the government. But I do suggest that a substantial part of that blame rests properly with the government.

I am aware, of course, that the Canadian dollar is tied to the U.S. dollar, which has not been doing very well. I am also aware that the election of a separatist government in Quebec has had a detrimental effect. But inflation is not a recent problem; it is one that we have had for some years. And so is unemployment. And it is getting worse. Only today it reached a record of 1,007,000—

Senator Croll: The figure is 1,000,070.

Senator Flynn: You can add 63,000 if you like. I was just speaking of the official figures, but others calculate that we are not very far from one and a quarter million. I do not say they are right. But the official figure of today, if I heard correctly, was 1,007,000, and that is a record. We have never had it so bad.

Why is it that only about 16 months ago the dollar was, in comparison to the U.S. dollar—since that is the only valid or practical comparison—worth $1.03 U.S. and it is now worth just a little more than 88 cents? That is a difference of 15 cents, and a 13 to 14 per cent decline. It is not easy to say this is due to any specific fact. Some people think that five cents is due to the Quebec election and the rest to those various other causes.

In any event, when we cannot agree exactly on the causes, the question is: is this a good thing? Some people say it is. Senator Argue for one—I am sorry to distract him from his conversation—

Senator Argue: I was learning more about wheat from Senator McNamara.

Senator Flynn: Senator Argue said it was a marvellous thing for the grain growers. I know that the pulp and paper industry in Quebec is very happy with this situation. However, if you look at it on a long-term basis, it would not be sufficient to help because we would have to keep our productivity in line with that devaluation. And one of our big problems has been that our productivity has not kept pace with that of the United States. So sometimes I ask myself what this government wants—a Canadian dollar worth 90 cents, 85 cents, 95 cents? What does it want? We saw the dollar pegged at 92½ cents in 1962. Senator van Rогgen the other day was very critical of some remarks I had made with respect to questions by Senator Argue and answers by Senator Perrault about the Canadian dollar devaluating. He said that I did not know the difference between pegging the dollar and allowing it to float. But, I ask you, do we really have a floating dollar? I would say we have a sinking dollar. I would also say that we are trying our best to keep it afloat, and whether we do that by pegging it, buying it, raising interest rates, or doing one thing and another, it all amounts to the same thing. There is no substantial difference between what the government is doing now and what was done in 1962. I was interested to read in a report of the National Finance Committee of 1971 the conclusions they reached in this connection. They said a floating dollar is the ideal, but do not be so foolish as to say that you will let it float even as it sinks. Much as the devalued dollar may be good for exports on the short-term basis, though that is not a proven fact, what of the long-term basis? And on a short-term basis again, the devalued dollar is very bad for our imports. It is a source of inflation and continued increasing unemployment.

In 1962, people scorned the “Diefenbuck,” a 92½-cent dollar. What must their opinion be of this “Trudough,” this “trou d’eau,” dollar? It certainly isn’t a true dollar. There is no doubt in my mind that the government wants to keep the dollar at 90 cents at least. It is doing its best, but has not succeeded very well. Whether the remedies that the government has applied are the only ones that should be applied at this time, I have some doubt. There is certainly a consensus that the government should adopt a policy of encouraging the private sector to generate more employment. There is also agreement that the government should restrict its expenses and its entry into the private sector. However, I suggest to you that the government has not done much in this regard.

Having said that, I do not intend to go on very long, except to question the suggestion of Senator Austin that this matter be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I have no special objection to the matter being referred to that committee, or even to a special committee, since this is truly a question for experts, even more so than is the pipeline. This is the perfect example of a subject that should be referred to a committee of experts. And, of course, I would expect that the Leader of the Government, with his profound knowledge of monetary problems, would sit on such a committee. Such a participation would be essential. I have no objection to a special committee, but on the other hand it seems to me that under our rules the ideal committee to deal with this matter would be the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. This committee made an excellent report in 1971, indicating what its views were as far as monetary policy was concerned; and those recommendations were completely ignored. I should like to know from Senator Everett if he thinks that the recommendations made by the committee are still valid, and if they should be listened to even more closely today than they were when the report was published. What would a new special committee, or Senator Everett's committee, be able to do that was not done by the National Finance Committee in 1971?

There is no doubt in my mind that as far as Senator Austin is concerned, what he would like the committee to conclude is what he said in his speech, and I quote:

There are therefore grounds for optimism in the longer term, and I believe in general the federal government's economic policy for Canada deserves to be considered a success.

That, evidently, is the conclusion Senator Austin would like the committee to reach, and I have an idea that perhaps Senator van Roggen would like to concur in that. In any event, there is a practical difficulty as regards having this matter referred to a committee, and that is that we are going to have an election soon and the committee will not have time to study it. So let's just forget about it.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other senator wishes to participate in this debate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS AND INFORMATION

RIGHT OF PUBLIC ACCESS

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, March 2, 1978:

[Senator Flynn.]

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the right of public access to government documents and information.

He said: Honourable senators, I hesitated for a while about speaking to you on this subject tonight.

Senator Flynn: You are like me.

Senator Desruisseaux: Well, possibly in certain aspects, if not all.

I hesitated because I saw that the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments was to examine tonight, after the sitting, the Green Paper on Public Access to Public Documents. I took some advice, therefore, and was told that there was time for me to speak tonight if I wanted to, so I will proceed. I hope it will not embarrass Senator Forsey's committee, or any member of it, in view of the fact it touches on the subject that it is now studying. I might say that it is not normally my habit to deal with a subject that is being studied by a committee.

During the first session of the Thirtieth Parliament it was stated before the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments that the Right Honourable the Prime Minister had said that democracy —requires the ready availability of true and complete information. In this way people can objectively evaluate the government's policies. To act otherwise is to give way to despotic secrecy.

● (2030)

In the study of the Right to Know by the Canadian Bar Association, we find both this quotation and that which James Madison made in 1822:

A popular government without popular information or the means of acquiring it is but a prologue to a farce or a tragedy or perhaps both. Knowledge will forever govern ignorance and the people who mean to be their own governors must arm themselves with the power which knowledge gives.

These views are shared by most Canadians. Somehow they are prerequisites to democracy itself. The purpose of legislation respecting freedom of information is to give citizens the right "to acquire information to which they had no right before." Of the five review option possibilities outlined in the green paper, four have been severely criticized.

Some legislation respecting freedom of access to information was introduced in Canada as early as Confederation. As Canada developed, these laws proved to be too limited and inadequate. Attempts up to now to improve them have been unsatisfactory and unsuccessful. Since Confederation, seven bills have been introduced in the House of Commons to establish or to expand some of the public's rights of access to public documents and information. Six of the seven were introduced in the last ten or eleven years; five were private bills, but none were enacted into law.

Some administrative disclosure regulations were first acted upon in the First Parliament in 1867 to delimit some of the public's rights of access to public documents and information. On administrative disclosure, there was Bill C-39, introduced on April 15, 1969, which received only first reading. Bill C-98, Bill C-118, respecting the right to information concerning public business, and Bill C-128 were introduced on February 25, 1972, and received only first reading. Bill C-185 and Bill C-258 were both presented on March 12, 1974, and likewise received only first reading. Bill C-225, respecting the right of the public to information concerning public business, introduced on October 14, 1974, did not reach the stage of third reading. None of those bills became law. The latest was Bill C-25, respecting public access to government documents.

Some months ago, I believe the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments considered some of the projected legislation respecting the right to know and freedom of access to information, the 1969 report of the Royal Commission on Security, and the report of the Task Force on Government Information "To know and be known". The committee is still considering the Green Paper on Public Access to Public Documents.

The Canadian Bar Association criticized the green paper in their major study which was released on August 4, 1977, and entitled "Freedom of information in Canada—Will the doors stay shut?" It was prepared by Murray Rankin, Professor of Law at the University of Victoria. It presents a review of the present barriers to citizens' access to government documents, the practical and legal lessons to be learned from experience in the United States with freedom-of-information legislation, and the applicability of judicial review of document disclosure in the Canadian parliamentary constitutional setting.

The conclusions of the report of the Canadian Bar Association contained severe criticisms. The green paper was said to masquerade as a list of possible alternatives but:

By the paucity of its analysis, the blurring of its stated options and the misrepresentation of the goals and practices of freedom of information legislation, the green paper leaves little doubt that meaningful legislation will not be forthcoming.

Touching on the spectre of disclosure of cabinet policy deliberations, Professor Rankin concludes the green paper "sets up a convenient straw man which permits the paper to avoid the real issues." He criticizes the categories of exemption from disclosure suggested in the green paper. He singles out the exemption of information obtained in the course of investigations, saying it is wide enough to embrace every piece of information in the government's hand. He criticizes the government's green paper for seeking "to perpetuate the inadequacies of the Federal Court Act" in regard to the privilege accorded crown documents. His most stringent criticism is for the green paper's contention that the judicial branch would be inappropriate to review decisions on the disclosure of government documents because this would contravene the principle of ministerial responsibility. Professor Rankin concludes:

No constitutional, legal or practical impediment stands in the way of judicial involvement in the adjudication of such questions. The defence of ministerial responsibility is a time-worn dogma that collapses upon the examination of English or Canadian constitutional precedents.

The Canadian Bar Association disagrees that there is no way a judicial officer can properly be made aware of all the factors that may have led to a decision to withhold a document. Based on experience in Great Britain and Canada, the study disapproves of leaving the final decision on documents to the non-reviewable discretion of a minister "who is hardly a disinterested party," which would make a sham of any system of access to government information.

The green paper takes the position that open government is indeed the basis of democracy. Democracy implies government acceptable to the collectivity of citizens. To ensure that it is acceptable, there must be a political system to establish that government is accountable, and effective accountability depends on knowing the information and options available to the decision-makers.

Canadians are concerned because public access to government documents is presently limited to a greater extent than is compatible with the public interest. The Canadian Human Rights Act, which was passed in the last session, provides that individual citizens and permanent residents have rights of access to information held about them by departments and agencies. The green paper focuses on access to government documents in what appears to be a limited way.

Professor Rankin criticized the inadequacies of the Federal Court Act in respect of the privilege accorded crown documents, and considers it "a mockery of a serious desire for more open government." A great many Canadians agree with the criticisms expressed by the Canadian Bar Association. Many feel that what the green paper actually advocates is a great amount of protective secrecy, which is hardly admissible in a true democracy.

Private members' bills respecting freedom of information have been introduced in the legislatures of nine provinces. Nova Scotia recently enacted its own freedom-of-information law. This provincial act, which allows freedom of information on government documents, outlines 10 categories of information to which the public has a right, and there are 16 sections which give the government the right to withhold information. It appears to be working quite well, and it is now for us to assess its value.

I believe there are many reasons for a broadening of our views on access to government information, and for giving more recognition to the public's right to know. Public servants have been rapidly emerging from behind their cloak of traditional anonymity. This has been heightened by changes in political institutions and practices, and by the media's response to demands for more public information.

These changes, with the federal public servant's widening scope of ability to participate in partisan politics, have led many to believe that the traditional doctrine of administrative responsibility and secrecy should not be enlarged and broadened. Professor Allan Cahoon of the University of Calgary has said:

Civil servants have become so integral a part of policy making and management that they should be subject to public scrutiny and would now have to be held to a much greater degree accountable to the people at large.

The public does not want to know only what the department wants to have known, but all the facts necessary so that they can pass moral and political judgment on what is taking place and can decide who is responsible for what.

I believe that everything relating to political mandates should be accounted for and opened fully to public scrutiny, criticism and knowledge. A realistic approach, supported by a good freedom-of-information and freedom-of-access statute, would mean the elimination of most of public service secrecy, and would conform to the "security of tenure" of the employment system in the public service. The tradition that only cabinet ministers "can be attacked when things go wrong," in our present concept of politics, is unrealistic and misleading to the public, and has proven to be wrong and harmful to innocent individuals.

Administrators in the public service should no longer remain faceless and be protected the way they have been, and their blunders should in no way be covered up. Potential bureaucratic abuses and irresponsible unilateral actions should somehow be eliminated from the present system by opening it as unreservedly as possible to public scrutiny and criticism.

A great many remain displeased at the shallow and somewhat evasive explanations of the Lockheed contracts, the commission secretly paid to persons who still remain unknown by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, and the fees paid directly to former officers of certain crown agencies. We have been unable to learn the reasons for building a certain fishing boat at a cost of $1 million, for instance, and then the order for its scrapping by someone in government administration as soon as it was completed. It is high time that we eliminated the actual tenure-based employment system and responded at last to the public right to know by facilitating through public scrutiny and putting public servants and public administrators in the same position regarding employment and job security as employees in the private sector.

New right-to-know and freedom-of-access-to-information legislation would not, in my opinion, increase public service power, but would make public servants and public administrators more accountable for the use of that power which they now possess. This accountability would place the responsibility where it should be. As it is, governments are increasingly coming under attack for things that cannot be seen, things for which they are always blamed.

There is a potentially limitless volume of information hidden from public scrutiny by our long-established government tradition. The right-to-know syndrome, which without reservation cut its teeth in the private sector, is shifting its focus quite rightly to the public sector, which it should have done long ago. There is now strong public pressure for legislation which will force the disclosure of all but the most sensitive information, and remove the traditional parliamentary privilege which so far has enabled the Canadian government and public administrators to withhold whatever they want, whenever they want, from the general public. This, of course, is contrary to the practice in the United States and Sweden where there has for years been freedom-of-information legislation which, although not perfect, has been working well and has served a good public purpose.

● (2050)

The whole issue here in Canada goes well beyond the Official Secrets Act, inherited from Britain, which bound public servants to secrecy in government matters and limited the public's right to know. This inherited legislation should indeed be reviewed and amended, or replaced with more functional, updated and practical right-to-know legislation. Secrecy, except in ultra-sensitive cases, has no place in the modern government of this country. As it is, the present Canadian concept is built on broad notions of ministerial responsibility, cabinet solidarity, and supremacy of parliamentary privileges. Such concepts are now under heavy attack and are, it seems, working against the better interests of Canadians. They are also claimed to be archaic, unjust and unfair to the public.

Under the present system, the cabinet has the power, either collectively or through the initiative of an individual minister, to decide what information should be released. In opposition thereto, it is pointed out there is the principle of law that no person should be the judge of his own cause and that our parliamentary system permits the courts, in certain instances, to determine the scope of the cabinet's discretionary power to withhold information.

Sweden and the United States have, in my view, a much better piece of legislation, namely, the Freedom of Information Act, which, if made applicable in Canada, would still assure the secrecy of specific types of information in matters such as national security, trade secrets, personal income tax, and certain commercial information and medical files could reasonably be protected from public scrutiny. Most other information from government departments, agencies or crown corporations could be released voluntarily—as I believe it should—or by court order to satisfy the public right to know and to establish responsibilities publicly where they should be.

It is my assessment that the Canadian parliamentary system of ministerial responsibility could well withstand any potential disturbance that such a flow of information might at first create.

Honourable senators, the national security of ultra-sensitive material must be fully upheld in the best interests of our nation. The reasons are obvious. In my opinion, any public administrative officer—or anyone else for that matter—who passes ultra-sensitive top-secret material to another person, even though that person may be a representative of the people, is guilty of betraying his country, and he should be sought out and punished. Any recipient of such material should, out of moral consideration and patriotic duty, return it immediately to its source without making it public, either inside or outside Parliament, and without retaining in his possession, directly or indirectly, any copy or portion thereof. Otherwise, I believe he becomes as guilty as the person who passes this secret information to him. No such example of moral turpitude should be permitted to be used in the Parliament of such a country as Canada.

In any case, a right-to-know and freedom-of-access-to-information act would be in line with present trends. It would allow for the allocating of responsibility and blame among government departments and government administrators. Ministers or public servants are not always, as it is sometimes implied, responsible for errors or blunders that are made, and the public has a right to know where the blame really lies.

Canada now has some 17 crown corporations and agencies. The government spends billions of the people's dollars per year for their operation. The Auditor General made the following comment in a recent report:

Civil servants, at all levels, believe that public funds are readily available and that they themselves are not personally accountable, that many senior government officials simply do not know what effective management of public funds actually consists of, that senior civil servants, up to and including deputy ministers, do not recognize the need for competent and experienced financial officers—a need recognized by every successful corporation in the world.

I believe that under these conditions all matters, related to manipulation or handling of such funds, should be subject to full public scrutiny, to full investigation, and to the clear establishment of responsibility and blame.

The Canadian Bar Association, in its study of the Canadian administration, concludes its analysis as follows:

Government, in a modern democracy, is largely in the hands of a bureaucracy, using the term in a neutral sense as meaning a body of professionally competent hierarchically organized administrators. The major problem in a modern constitutional government is to retain an effective control, by public opinion and by legal restraints of the apparatus of the state which constantly expands with an increased public demand for more social welfare services and with the growing burden of national defence in a world of increasing peril. Liberty in such a world can be nourished only by the full and effective functioning of the political and legal restraints on abuse of power.

Effective freedom-of-information machinery, which would include as much of the most sensitive items as possible and be subject to in-camera inspection, must be established in Canada. In my opinion, there is no justification for more delays.

The mystery and secrecy surrounding government business must be erased by meaningful right-to-know legislation. The responsibility for reviewing information must be entrusted to the courts in order to avoid further erosion of the trust relationship between the governors and the governed. I believe this has now become one of our higher priorities, and we should do something about it when new right-to-know and freedom-of-access-to-information legislation is introduced after the recommendations of the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments are known.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, March 15, 1978

The Senate met at 2 p.m., Hon. Maurice Bourget, P.C., Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—FIRST READING

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) presented Bill S-10, respecting the Royal Canadian Legion.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a second time?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, this is a short bill. I am reluctant to ask for special concessions for it, because it is a private bill, but in view of the approaching recess it might be agreeable to the house to have the explanation tomorrow. Because this is a private bill, it must, of course, go to committee. It is hoped that if the bill receives second reading it can be dealt with in committee some time next week. Therefore, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Senator Flynn: Certainly. Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BANK ACT QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-16, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Macnaughton moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Wednesday, March 15, 1978

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which was referred Bill S-2, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act" has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, November 15, 1977, examined the said Bill and now reports the same with the following amendments:

(1.1) A corporation shall add to the appropriate stated capital account the full amount of any consideration it receives for any shares it issues.

(1.2) Notwithstanding subsections 25(3) and (1.1), where a corporation issues shares in exchange for property to

(a) a body corporate that was an affiliate of the corporation immediately before the exchange, or

(b) a person who controlled the corporation immediately before the exchange, the corporation may, subject to subsection (1.5), add to the stated capital accounts maintained for the shares of the classes or series issued the amount agreed between the corporation and such body corporate or person to be the consideration for the shares exchanged.

(1.3) Notwithstanding subsections 25(3) and (1.1), where a corporation issues shares in exchange for shares of a body corporate that was an affiliate of the corporation immediately before the exchange, the corporation may, subject to subsection (1.5), add to the stated capital accounts maintained for the shares of the classes or series issued an amount that is not less than the amount set out, in respect of the acquired shares of the body corporate, in the stated capital or equivalent accounts of the body corporate immediately before the exchange.

(1.4) Notwithstanding subsections 25(3) and (1.1), where a corporation issues shares in exchange for shares of a body corporate that becomes, because of the exchange, an affiliate of the corporation, the corporation may, subject to subsection (1.5) and to any recommendations of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants set out in the Handbook of that Institute respecting the pooling of interest method of accounting for a business combination, add to the stated capital accounts maintained for the classes or series issued an amount that is not less than the amount set out, in respect of the acquired shares of the body corporate, in the stated capital or equivalent accounts of the body corporate immediately before the exchange.

(1.5) A corporation shall not add to a stated capital account in respect of a share it issues an amount greater than the amount of the consideration it received for the share.

(1.6) Where a corporation proposes to add any amount to a stated capital account it maintains in respect of a class or series of shares, if

(a) the amount to be added was not received by the corporation as consideration for the issue of shares, and

(b) the corporation has issued any outstanding shares of more than one class or series, the addition to the stated capital account must be approved by special resolution." "

9. Page 6, Subclause 13(1): Strike out lines 34 to 36 and substitute the following:

Before concluding its report, your committee wishes to acknowledge the assistance given by the officials in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who had the responsibility for the preparation of necessary amendments thereto, both in respect of such points as were raised in submissions to your committee and in submissions to the said department.

Respectfully submitted,

Salter A. Hayden,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Hayden moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Yuzyk be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Asselin on the list of senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on a Northern Gas Pipeline.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Macdonald be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Phillips on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON CONCENTRATION OF CORPORATE POWER

DATE OF PUBLICATION OF REPORT—QUESTION

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, if the Leader of the Government has a long enough memory he will recall that almost three years ago, on March 26, 1975, on a morning when we were sitting for a few hours before adjourning for the Easter recess, I placed a notice of inquiry on the order paper. This arose from my having read in a morning newspaper of a possible takeover bid by Power Corporation of Canada Ltd., of Argus Corporation Ltd. The purpose of my inquiry was to call the attention of the Senate to this takeover bid, and the advisability of referring the matter to a standing or special committee of the Senate to ascertain if such a takeover, if successful, would be in the public interest.

During the Easter recess of 1975 the government took action and appointed a Royal Commission under the chairmanship of that distinguished public servant, Robert Bryce. Later he was obliged to withdraw, to my great sorrow, due to ill health.

Can the Leader of the Government now inform us as to when we can expect to have a report from the remaining members of that commission? I believe the report was close to completion when Mr. Bryce withdrew.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I understand that an enormous amount of work has been invested in undertaking the inquiry into corporate concentration. As Senator Benidickson pointed out, his notice of inquiry related to the then announced planned takeover bid by Power Corporation of Canada Ltd., of Argus Corporation Ltd. That specific merger proposal, of course, fell through, and so the inquiry of that date by Senator Benidickson is not entirely relevant today. However, I can report that the Royal Commission on Concentration of Corporate Power has made significant progress, and its mandate included those areas of concern to the honourable senator. I can advise this chamber that the commission is due to submit its report very shortly.

Senator Flynn: Do you mean shortly?

Senator Perrault: Very shortly.

Senator Grosart: Before the election?

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before the motion to adjourn is moved, I should like to remind you that there are two committee meetings this afternoon. The National Finance Committee will meet in room 256-S to examine supplementary estimates "B", and the Health, Welfare and Science Committee will meet in room 356-S to deal with Bill C-27, to amend the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, March 16, 1978

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1977-78

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-30, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1978, to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a second time?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of Reports of the Anti-inflation Board to the Governor in Council, pursuant to section 17(2) of the Anti-Inflation Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada, 1974-75-76, reporting its reference to the Administrator of the said Act of certain proposed changes in compensation plans, as follows:

1. Croven Limited and its Whitby plant employees, represented by the United Automobile Workers, Local 1090, dated March 3, 1978.

2. Mount Sinai Hospital, Toronto, Ontario and the medical doctors group, dated March 6, 1978.

3. Canada Safeway Limited and the retail employees in Edmonton, Alberta, represented by the Retail Clerks Union, Local 401, dated March 10, 1978.

4. Domtar Packaging Limited and its Trenton hourly plant group employees, represented by Local 1470 of The Canadian Paperworkers Union, dated March 10, 1978.

5. Board of School Trustees School District No. 72 (Campbell River) and its teachers aides, clerical staff, janitors, maintenance personnel and bus drivers, represented by the School Operating Staff and the Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 723, dated March 10, 1978.

6. St. Joseph's Villa, Dundas, Ontario and the nurses group, dated March 10, 1978.

Copies of Report of the Administrator under the Anti-Inflation Act, pursuant to section 17(3) of the said Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada, 1974-75-76, respecting compensation plan between The Flin Flon School Division No. 46, Flin Flon, Manitoba and the group of its maintenance supervisors. Order dated March 8, 1978.

Copies of a Report of the Bay of Fundy Tidal Power Review Board entitled "Reassessment of Fundy Tidal Power," dated November 1977.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) PRESENTED

Senator Everett, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report:

Wednesday, March 15, 1978

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which the Supplementary Estimates "B" laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1978, were referred, has in obedience to the order of reference of Thursday, March 2, 1978, examined the said Estimates and reports as follows:

1. The committee made a general examination of the Supplementary Estimates "B" and heard evidence from the Honourable Robert Andras, President of the Treasury Board; Mr. R. L. Richardson, Deputy Secretary, Programs Branch; Mr. L. J. O'Toole, Assistant Secretary, Programs Branch; and Mr. E. A. Radburn, Director, Estimates Division; all of the Treasury Board Secretariat.

2. These Supplementary Estimates total $1,094 million. This figure is composed of $505 million in cash outlays and $589 million for three items which are not composed of cash outlays but which require Parliamentary approval. The total Estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1978, are now $47,587 million.

3. The committee expressed its concern about the year to year comparability of the figures used to measure the growth in government expenditures. The witnesses provided assurances that the figures are comparable.

4. The committee sought and obtained reassurance that the practice of net voting is being altered to prevent the expenditure of funds for purposes not approved by Parliament.

5. The committee questioned the use of grants, which do not require the recipient to provide an accounting to the government. The witnesses pointed out that in many instances it was the intent of the government to not place any restrictions on the use of the funds granted. Where some return was sought in exchange for funds, they were given as contributions. This requires that the recipient account for the use of funds and permits the government to audit the recipient's books. Where the costs to the government of administration of contributions could prove excessive in relation to the amount of funds involved, grants could be and were used.

6. The committee sought and received assurances that monies in revolving funds were subject to increasing Parliamentary control.

Respectfully submitted,

D. D. Everett,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, later this day we will be considering Appropriation Bill No. 4, which deals with the contents of supplementary estimates (B). It would be convenient at that stage to consider both Appropriation Bill No. 4 and the supplementary estimates (B). Therefore, with leave, I move that the report be taken into consideration later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

COMPENSATION FOR FORMER PRISONERS OF WAR ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Bonnell, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-27, to amend the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McElman moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

[Senator Everett.]

NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENTS OF THE SENATE

Senator McElman, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Special Committee of the Senate on a Northern Gas Pipeline have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, do I glean from this motion that it is contemplated the special committee might possibly have to sit during the Easter recess? It is not that I have any objection, but if that is what the chairman has in mind for the committee, I would like to know. Maybe the chairman can reply.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what we do know is that consideration of the bill in the special committee of the other place has nearly finished. It has probably been reported by now. There was only one clause left, I understand, after last night. We do not know whether it will pass the report stage and third reading in the other place on Monday or Tuesday, or when. It was hoped that we could set up a series of meetings so that we could complete hearing from possible witnesses in order to be able to deal with the bill in the house on Wednesday next. The motion calls for power to sit during adjournments, which obviously includes the Easter adjournment. That is not necessarily contemplated. We do not know whether we will have the bill by the Easter recess, and if we do not there would be an opportunity perhaps to hear some of the other witnesses who have asked to come, if there is time.

Senator Flynn: During the week after Easter?

Senator Olson: Unless the bill has passed through all stages in this chamber before Wednesday, we would be able to hear these witnesses then. I do not have any time set now, or even have in contemplation any meetings during the week of recess.

Senator Flynn: I suggest that this motion is not necessary unless it is anticipated that the bill will reach us on, let us say, Wednesday next, and we would need to have some sittings of the special committee during the week after Easter. I was wondering if this is what the chairman had in mind.

● (1410)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there is only a possibility if there is time, because a number of other witnesses indicated that they might wish to be heard. However, we are endeavouring to be in a position to deal with the bill itself on Wednesday next.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is hoped that it might be possible to expedite the passage of the bill.

Senator Flynn: That is one way of expediting it, by having the committee sit during the recess. If that is the case, why not answer yes, and that will be the end of it?

Senator Perrault: We hope to have it completed before the recess.

Senator Flynn: Then you do not need the motion.
Motion agreed to.

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Senator McElman, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Côtteau, Hays and Macnaughton be substituted for those of the Honourable Senators Manning, McIlraith and Rowe on the list of senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on a Northern Gas Pipeline.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, is this motion related to the previous motion? Why are we switching "lines" like this?

Senator Perrault: Because of absences.

Senator Flynn: But are these changes being made because the committee might sit during the Easter recess?

Senator Olson: No.

Senator Perrault: No. A number of senators may not be here next week, and the substitutions relate only to these possible absences.

Senator Flynn: This seems to be a decision by the coach.
Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, March 20, 1978, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Honourable senators, we propose to meet next Monday afternoon in order to deal with the work now before our committees, the legislation now before the Senate and legislation expected to come to us from the other place. It may be necessary to devote all day Tuesday to committee work and have the Senate sit in the evening on that day, but this cannot be decided until Monday. At that time we should have a clearer picture of just what we shall have to do before, hopefully, adjourning on Wednesday for Easter.

As honourable senators are aware, Bill C-30, the supply bill covering the supplementary estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978, is now before us. The interim supply bill for the 1978-79 estimates is scheduled to pass the Commons tonight and we shall have that bill to deal with when we return on Monday. It is expected that Bill C-25, the Northern Pipeline Act, will be reported from committee in the Commons some time today. I believe that we can look forward to that bill's reaching the Senate early next week.

As I have already mentioned, there is also a possibility that other bills could come to us from the other place during the course of next week. This is in addition to the items already on the order paper. I have been advised that Senator Hayden expects to be in a position to present the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee on Bill S-3, respecting Canadian non-profit corporations, on Monday or Tuesday, and if he does not deal with the report on Bill C-2 today he plans to move its adoption on Monday.

I shall now give the committees schedule for next week, as well as I am able to do so at this time. There will, of course, be some additions to the list during the week.

The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will meet on Monday at 10 a.m., and again when the Senate rises, to consider its draft report on Canada-United States relations. Both meetings will be in camera.

On Tuesday the Special Committee of the Senate on a Northern Gas Pipeline will meet at 9.30 a.m., at 2.30 p.m., and again in the evening, probably at 8 o'clock. The committee expects to hear on Tuesday all the government and outside witnesses appearing on this matter.

Also on Tuesday, the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 2.30 p.m. The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will meet at 2.30 p.m. or, if the Senate sits in the afternoon, when the Senate rises. The Subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science on Childhood Experiences as Causes of Criminal Behaviour will meet at 4 p.m. on that day or, if the Senate sits in the afternoon, when the Senate rises.

The Special Committee of the Senate on a Northern Gas Pipeline will meet again on Wednesday morning at 9.30 to commence clause-by-clause study of the bill, and it is expected that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will hold another in camera meeting at 9.30 a.m. to consider its report on Canada-United States relations.

Motion agreed to.

AIR TRANSPORT

CHARTER AIRLINES WITHIN CANADA—QUESTION

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, no doubt the Leader of the Government has observed some of the recent comments which have appeared in the newspapers relating to airline fares. Honourable senators will recall that in an unusual move the cabinet overruled the Canadian Transport Commission in respect of its judgment relating to cheaper air fares in Canada. I should like to read from the Montreal Gazette of March 11, 1978, which quotes one charter organizer as saying:

What the CTC knows is that all they have to do is stall another few weeks and it will be too late for us to put these flights on the market for this summer.

A Toronto newspaper published a similar comment on this matter. My question to the Leader of the Government is based on the prestige of the cabinet which, in this instance, overruled a government agency.

I did not give notice of this question to the leader but before we adjourn for Easter I should like to know whether there is any validity in the statement that a government regulatory agency can, as the headline indicates, stall a reversal of opinion with respect to that agency.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall take that question as notice, and will make an immediate inquiry.

Senator Flynn: The answer is that it is quite possible.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

TERRORIST RAID ON ISRAEL AND RETALIATORY ACTION— QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to the Leader of the Government. Bearing in mind that the Government of Canada recently sent a note to the Prime Minister of Israel expressing its regret and sympathy following the terrorist raid on Israel a few days ago, could the leader inform the house whether the government intends to send a further note now that we have witnessed the recent military action in southern Lebanon?

● (1420)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I cannot answer that question now, but that information will be sought from the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION FUND—FURTHER QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question arising out of one I asked several weeks ago respecting an interim payment out of the Western Grain Stabilization Fund. I realize there has been some report by the minister responsible of an intention to make an interim payment, but I wonder whether we could have a reply spelling out in some detail what that intention is.

Senator Perrault: That information will be made available as soon as it comes to my office.

BANK ACT QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Macnaughton moved third reading of Bill C-16, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

BILL C-267 (PRINCE GEORGE-PEACE RIVER)—SECOND READING

Senator Grosart moved second reading of Bill C-267, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Prince George-Peace River).

Senator Forsey: May I just remark in passing that I should like to endorse what has been said on previous occasions on bills of the kind that we have before us on the order paper what has been said by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition, adding simply that the Honourable Leader of the Opposition has just confided to me that he remains of the same opinion still as he was before, and he has no objection to my saying so.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Grosart moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

● (1425)

BILL C-358 (PONTIAC-GATINEAU-LABELLE)—SECOND READING

Senator Côté moved second reading of Bill C-358, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle).

[Translation]

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-358 amends the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, and through it the paragraph which names and describes the electoral district of Pontiac is amended by substituting for the name "Pontiac" the name "Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle".

[English]

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Côté moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BILL C-412 (HUMBER-PORT-AU-PORT-ST. BARBE)—SECOND READING

Senator Smith (Colchester) moved the second reading of Bill C-412, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Humber-Port-au-Port-St. Barbe).

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators, I think I should draw your attention to the fact that for the first time since Newfoundland became part of Canada, the historic portion of the west coast of the island of Newfoundland, known as the Port-au-Port peninsula, is now incorporated in the official name of the riding. The name before was Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe. The St. George's part of that riding has now been incorporated, I understand, with the riding which is represented by the Honourable Don Jamieson in the House of Commons, and the Port-au-Port peninsula has been retained in the riding formerly known as Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, which is represented in the House of Commons by Mr. Marshall.

An interesting fact worth bringing to the attention of the Senate is that the Port-au-Port peninsula has the largest single concentration of French-speaking people on the island of Newfoundland. It is not generally known in the rest of Canada, perhaps, that we do have an important community of people of French descent, many of whom still speak the French language, living with anglophones on the west coast in this well-known area of Newfoundland—well known in Newfoundland, at any rate—the Port-au-Port peninsula.

● (1430)

While I was not involved in choosing this nomenclature, I think it is fitting that the name of this region of Newfoundland, which does have the largest French-speaking community, is now officially contained in the name of a federal riding.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wish to convey my gratitude to Senator Rowe for having made my speech for me in support of the bill.

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, while I agree with the sentiments expressed by Senator Rowe, I would suggest that the appellation "St. Barbe" is as much French as "Port-au-Port", but, for principles enunciated previously in this chamber, I oppose the adoption of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Smith (Colchester) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BILL C-414 (PRINCE EDWARD-HASTINGS)—SECOND READING

Senator Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill C-414, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Prince Edward-Hastings).

He said: Honourable senators, as a result of the redistribution under the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, the constituency known as Hastings will no longer be made up of just the provincial county of Hastings. The new constituency will be comprised of one-half of the county of Hastings and one half of the county of Prince Edward Island.

The commissioners felt that the new constituency should be known as Prince Edward. However, it is felt that since one-half of the county of Hastings will be in the new riding, the name of Hastings should also be included in the name of the new constituency. Consequently, Bill C-414 would make the name of the new riding Prince Edward-Hastings.

It would seem to me that the people of the constituency, in requesting this change, are making a reasonable and logical request, and I ask your support of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Macdonald moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BILL C-415 (SAINT-HENRI-WESTMOUNT)—SECOND READING

Senator Denis moved the second reading of Bill C-415, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Saint-Henri-Westmount).

[Translation]

He said: Honourable senators, this legislation is simply aimed at adding the words "Saint-Henri" to the name of the current "Westmount" constituency. As has been said by Senator Rowe on a similar bill respecting a bilingual county, there is a French-speaking part, Saint-Henri, and an English-speaking part, Westmount.

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, I have already made my views known on this kind of legislation. It is refuse in the legislative garbage can. We should not be wasting the Senate's time on this. However, I have a duty to put on record on this occasion the comments published yesterday evening by the Canadian Press, and I quote:

● (1435)

[English]

It took the Commons only a few moments to approve changes in the names of nine federal ridings.

But the move has created a headache for Chief Electoral Officer Jean-Marc Hamel and his staff.

The changes mean that electoral maps already prepared for the general election many expect this year will have to be scrapped and new ones prepared and printed.

Several publications put out by Hamel's staff also must be revised. These include street guides to inform voters in large cities such as Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver in what riding they are entitled to vote—required because so many ridings are located in such cities.

Another guide also is prepared to enable Canadian Forces and public service employees to know the riding in which they can vote when they are out of the country.

The extra work for the Hamel staff could not come at a more inopportune time.

I said this was garbage legislation. It still is, in my view, and it stinks more than it ever did.

[Translation]

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, Senator Lafond suggests this is a waste of time. But without his contribution, the waste would have been minimal. Moreover, it must be realized we now have unemployment, and if some work is involved in changing constituency names, this will prevent us from putting our employees on unemployment. I therefore feel this is good. The important thing is to please Canadians. If an important part of a constituency has its name posted, and there is more work involved for Mr. Hamel, the Chief Electoral Officer, so much the better because he can hire extra help, and those people will not receive unemployment insurance.

Senator Lafond: The people look after that.
[English]

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Denis moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to, on division.

BILL C-417 (SAINTE-MARIE)—SECOND READING

Senator Côté moved the second reading of Bill C-417, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Sainte-Marie).

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Côté moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

● (1440)

BILL C-418 (HOCHELAGA-MAISONNEUVE)—SECOND READING

Senator Côté moved the second reading of Bill C-418, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Hochelaga-Maisonneuve).

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Côté moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BILL C-423 (MÉGANTIC-COMPTON-STANSTEAD)—SECOND READING

Senator Denis moved the second reading of Bill C-423, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Mégantic-Compton-Stanstead).

[Translation]

He said: Honourable senators, to please Senator Lafond I shall be brief and I will not give the excellent reasons for which I ask the Senate to pass this bill on second reading.

Senator Lafond: On division, anyway.
[English]

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

[Senator Denis.]

Senator Denis moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—ORDER STANDS UNTIL LATER THIS DAY

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill S-10, intituled: "An Act respecting The Royal Canadian Legion".—(Honourable Senator Connolly, P.C. (Ottawa West)).

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Stand until later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill S-2, to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act, which was presented yesterday.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-2 proposes a considerable number of amendments to the Canada Business Corporations Act which came into force in 1975, and which succeeded the Canada Corporations Act. The committee's report on this complicated and technical bill proposes 100 amendments, and I should tell you that more than half of them have to do with the French version. I should explain that the French version represents a gathering together of the French texts of the Canada Business Corporations Act, which texts were much criticized in that they did not convey in the most diligent way the effect of the English version of the Canada Business Corporations Act. Accordingly, the second part of the report refers to the appendix to this bill, which contains the French version.

In the course of preparation for the committee hearing, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs conferred not only with the Department of Justice, but also with a committee of the Quebec Bar, seeking assistance in checking, verifying and being satisfied that the French version and its text properly agreed with and related to the English version. The concern of your committee was as to whether the French version stated or provided an offence, rulings, regulations or proceedings which differed in some way from the English version.

The committee of the Quebec Bar had a number of meetings during which they examined the bill thoroughly, and expressed their support of it, but indicated that there were a great many amendments which they felt should be made to the text of the French version. These were subsequently considered by your committee, having first been reviewed by the Department of Justice and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

As a result of that review the Department of Justice was prepared to agree to and accept 50 of these amendments. Your committee, when considering this phase of the bill, approved and adopted those amendments, and they appear as part of the report in which you are now asked to concur.

As to the other amendments, I should tell you that they are substantially technical. There are some material amendments that bring the provisions of the Canada Business Corporations Act up to date. There are some further amendments relating to the correlation of the Income Tax Act to the Canada Business Corporations Act, which become very important in light of the substantial changes made in the Income Tax Act last year resulting from the passing of Bill C-11, which received Royal Assent in December 1977.

Perhaps I should illustrate some of the technical amendments. For instance, on page 4 of the bill, clause 5, line 2 is struck out and new words are added. The words struck out are "existing corporation"; the words substituted are "existing body corporate". That may seem a sort of idle, wasteful effort, but in the context which occurs the addition of the word "existing" is important.

● (1450)

By clause 77(2) of the bill subsections 261(4) and 261(5) of the Canada Business Corporations Act are amended by substituting the word "order" for the word "regulation."

That is just to give you some idea of the nature of many of the amendments. They are necessary to the context, but I do not propose to pursue this matter through the various clauses of the bill and the report in order to explain them all. What I do propose to do is concentrate more on what I regard as material amendments.

One material amendment, which may seem to be in the category of technical amendments, and possibly is, deals with the section in the Canada Business Corporations Act which relates to the right of a shareholder or creditor to obtain a shareholders list. In the section dealing with that, the words "transfer agent" were used in providing all of the bases on which one would have to be satisfied in order that there might be entitlement to that list. But that did not cover the situation where companies have both transfer agents and registrars—as many large companies do have—because both of those personalities bear a relationship to the shareholders list. So the words "transfer agent" have been struck out, and the word "agent" has been put in to replace them so as to include a description of the two offices.

As a matter of curiosity, perhaps I should tell you that it is quite unnecessary that this section of the act be used at all, because there is a general provision in the act, in section 247, under which formal service of the necessary notice of application for a shareholders list and the tendering of the necessary affidavit is provided for. So this is a short-cut for whoever may want to follow that course.

The next thing I regard as a material addition is the short form liquidation. There have been actual cases where the problems presented by applications for dissolution of the company have not been taken care of by the "short division", method, and the procedures by "long division" are very considerable and involved. This was the situation where the corporation had properties and liabilities but had arranged to distribute its properties and to discharge its liabilities. The new section 203(2.1) has been added to permit the corporation, in those circumstances, to take advantage of a short form liquidation or dissolution by forwarding its articles of dissolution to the director, who is the officer under the Canada Business Corporations Act. That is a material change. In the dissolution of companies, where the procedure first is to clear up property and liabilities, it certainly represents substantial change and, I would say, cost.

The next material change has to do with the definition of "inspector" under the Canada Business Corporations Act. Where it is believed that a corporation has indulged in some fraud or has acted in prejudice of the rights of the shareholders, and in other cases as well, an application may be made to the court to obtain an order appointing an inspector. Now, in the application of this section the experience of the department administering the act has been that there are difficulties at times with the administration because the scope of the power of the inspector has been challenged. Therefore, there is a new definition of the function, scope and authority of the inspector to extend his capacity to deal in an investigatory situation which is proceeding under the provisions of the Canada Business Corporations Act.

There are several other important provisions. One relates to sections 25 and 26 of the Canada Business Corporations Act. You will find this dealt with in the record of the committee's proceedings at pages 4:12, 4:14 and 4:15. It is clause 11 of the bill. The situation is that the Income Tax Act was substantially amended, and many advantages—or, as I described them at the time, many carrots—were provided in that bill in December of last year in relation to the marshalling of the affairs of a corporation or for purposes that a shareholder might have in mind in connection with, for instance, freezing the value of his estate at a figure which would flow the subsequent increments to the heirs, but the Canada Business Corporations Act had not been correlated by that time to these changes in the Income Tax Act.

This bill proposes to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act so that when you sell shares, or when a company issues shares, the consideration received must be credited or attributed to capital account. Where what is involved is a transfer of property to a company or to a person—which, in this case, would be a subsidiary corporation of the corporation which has the property—the amendments provide for the allocation of the consideration as between capital account and surplus account.

There are a number of procedures open, which are available under what was Bill C-11, which amended the Income Tax Act, by virtue of its enactment last year. One of them is to freeze the value of the assets of the property which is transferred in those circumstances—and then to issue shares from a subsidiary company, which would be redeemable preferred shares, and the company could subsequently redeem those shares. The transfer of the property would not involve any problem of taxation, but, of course, the redemption of the preferred shares would have several effects on the subsequent redemption out of the surplus. Until this amendment becomes law, the corporations, in the special circumstances I have detailed, will not be able to avail themselves of a privilege which is there under the provisions of the Income Tax Act.

In those circumstances, we heard witnesses and we approved this amendment. The result of it, as and when the amendments in this bill become law, will be that the redemption of the preferred shares, which the subsidiary company has issued for the property which it acquired, ends the financial interest of a controlling shareholder in the transferor company, and also terminates his tax liability in connection with the redemption of those shares. If he does it by way of dividends he may, as to part of it, be subject to income tax. If he does not do it in that way he may attract some capital gains tax.

However, the net effect of following that method is that he is then removed from the picture, and if the common shares are given or transferred or sold to the heirs, those common shares are the only shares that can enhance in value. As the property may increase in value, the value of the shares will increase without attracting tax. It is a way that, in other associations, has been followed for the purpose of freezing certain values for estate purposes.

Those are important provisions. There are some other provisions, but the question is how far they should be developed on a motion for concurrence in the report. The report is there. It may in some parts be difficult to read, because you have to go back and dig out the act that is being amended. I am, therefore, giving some further explanation to try to save your having to do that digging.

I should tell you that there is another material amendment, which relates to section 168 of the Canada Business Corporations Act. That provision concerns the powers of a public distributing corporation. Those are high sounding words, but a public distributing corporation is a corporation that issues shares to the public. Under section 168 a public distributing corporation has the authority to constrain—or you can say restrain—the transfer of its shares, in particular to limit foreign control over a corporation or to permit a corporation to qualify for a licence to carry on a regulated business, such as in the transportation or communications industry.

The important words are these. The act presently permits constraint to be imposed “for any purpose”—and those are, for purposes of the amendment, the offending words—subject in such case to obtaining shareholder approval of the constraint after it has been in force for a period of five years. In practice this power has proved to be too broad, because it enables the management of a corporation not only to ensure Canadian control but also to ensure that the corporation and its management is insulated from any threat of takeover bids.

As a result, Bill S-2, as amended by the committee, restricts the purposes for which a public distributing corporation may constrain the transfer of its shares. More specifically, the corporation can no longer restrain the transfer of shares for any purpose. It may do so only to limit foreign control or comply with any restraint of share ownership that is required to comply with federal regulatory laws. As a corollary to that limitation of this restraint or constraint power, it is no longer necessary to have the requirement that there must be shareholder approval of the constraint at the end of each five-year period.

The next substantial amendment concerns the rights of class shareholders to vote separately as a class on any change of the corporation's capital structure that affects that class. In section 116 of the Canada Business Corporations Act the provision is quite rigid in that respect, in conferring a class vote and hence a veto power, in any case where a change of the corporation's corporate structure derogates, either partly or indirectly, from the rights of the class. This rigidity has proved in practice to have an impractical constraint on financial transactions in a series of shares. The committee's report amends this provision to render it less rigid, with a view to facilitating such financial transactions.

The effect is that if there is authority in the charter to proceed with certain changes in the charter for purposes of adapting that for financial purposes, and if the intention is to create a class of shares ahead of a particular class that already exists, the company may go ahead without that veto vote to impede it in carrying out the transaction. The department did undertake, however, to review carefully the application of this provision, as amended, to ensure that it does not in practice detract from the rights of shareholders of a class, or series of classes, in a way that is unfair to these shareholders.

I should point out to you possibly one more provision, and that is the final substantive amendment proposed to Bill S-2. It relates to section 261 of the Canada Business Corporations Act, and concerns the continuance of a federal corporation under the act. As you know, companies that were incorporated under the Canada Corporations Act were permitted, by virtue of the Canada Business Corporations Act, to carry on under their existing charter and under their relationship to the Canada Corporations Act. However, at some time the question arises as to the requirement for them to proceed to continue under the Canada Business Corporations Act. If they do not, they face dissolution.

The Canada Business Corporations Act, of course, provided basic changes to the federal corporation law. It was not practicable, therefore, to apply it to federal corporations all at once. Instead, the corporations which were incorporated before the Canada Business Corporations Act was enacted were given a discretion to continue until 1980, at which time they have to remedy the situation. I should point out that to date there are only approximately 2,000 corporations which are in a position where they will have to face the question of continuing and taking proceedings therefor, as against 25,000 federal corporations which have continued under the new law.

To expedite the process, clause 77 of Bill S-2 amends the continuance provisions to clarify the power of a corporation to amend its charter in the course of continuance. It also empowers the directors of the corporation to authorize continuance where the articles of continuance do not affect any material modifications of the corporation's charter.

These are the substantial amendments. One might be inclined to look at some of those that change only a word, and question the need. Of course, words have a way of piling up and who knows at what stage, as has happened in the past in respect of many different types of legislation, the interpretation or the intent of a section may turn on one word. One word too many included, or one word less than the number which should have been included, will turn the intent and meaning that may be extracted from one direction to another. So all these amendments, if they are necessary to conform to the proper meaning and description in connection with the application, are necessary. While it may seem tedious to have to go through all this, it is a very necessary task, otherwise we will face a difficult and embarrassing situation at some future time when the cumulative effect is felt of so many words excluded which should have been included, and so many words included which should not have been.

There is also a restatement of intent and the adoption of a co-relationship between the Canada Business Corporations Act and, particularly, the Income Tax Act. The Income Tax Act gives certain benefits and certain opportunities in certain circumstances, and if the Canada Business Corporations Act and the corporation's charter have not been adapted to those provisions of the income tax law there is no way in which it can take advantage of them, short of winding up. Whether it would do so, I am not venturing an opinion at this time.

So I say that the bill is very important. It is difficult to read and difficult to understand. However, we heard many witnesses and received much assistance from the departmental officials, and feel that we have done the best we can with it. It is now up to the Senate to consider whether it will or will not concur in the report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Lang moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—SECOND READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill S-10, respecting the Royal Canadian Legion.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a bill to amend an act respecting the Royal Canadian Legion. The previous amendment to the charter of the Legion was made by this chamber in 1975. On July 15 of that year, as reported at page 1194 of Debates of the Senate for the 1974-75-76 session, Senator Carter explained the proposed amendments at great length, and gave a helpful dissertation on the history of the Legion and the work it does. He was followed the next day by Senator Phillips, who also spoke knowledgeably on the work of the Legion.

The amendment before us today is fairly short, the bill containing only one clause. However, I do think that it requires a little explanation, and more than my simply asking the Senate to direct its attention to its bare provisions.

The Legion itself arose out of organizations which existed prior to 1925 and following World War I. Some members of the Senate will remember those organizations with great affection and respect—organizations such as the Great War Veterans Association, the Tubercular Veterans Association, the Great Army of United Veterans Association, the Disabled Canadian Veterans Association, and some 10 or 12 other organizations which were involved in the establishment of the central organization known today as the Legion.

In 1948 the Legion was incorporated by act of Parliament, and the name then given to it was the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League. I believe that name rings in the minds of those whose memories go back to the early days of the organization. By chapter 52 of the statutes of 1959, the name was changed to the Canadian Legion, and by chapter 83 of the statutes of 1960-61, the name was changed to what it is at present—The Royal Canadian Legion. That amendment also provided for the establishment of the Ladies' Auxiliary, which is now recognized in by-laws 801 and 802 of the Legion. Chapter 112 of the statutes of 1974-75-76 contains amendments providing for regulation by provincial commands of the activities of branches within those provincial commands. It also establishes rules respecting the rights of branches over their property, and their relationship to the provincial commands.

Senator Benidickson: And membership?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): No, those amendments did not touch membership at that time, senator.

The present ordinary membership of the Legion, as honourable senators who are members know so well, consists generally of persons who have served in Her Majesty's Canadian forces, the navy, the army or the air force. The Legion's bylaw 206 provides that. The membership also includes members who have served in any of the auxiliary forces, and, in an appendix to the bylaws, there are 58 different categories of people and groups of people entitled to membership.

I draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that in 1972 there were provided four categories of associate members. Category 37 allowed membership to members of the forces who have not served in a theatre of war. Category 47 provided for servicemen who had served in the NATO and NORAD forces, except, but not specifically referring to, servicemen who were in the Canadian or United Kingdom forces. In other words, foreign nationals who had served in NATO and NORAD forces were entitled to join. Category 55 provided for the inclusion, as associate members, of members of the Newfoundland forestry unit; and category 56 provided associate membership for sons and daughters of members of the Legion. None of these associate members have ever been given the right to vote or to hold office.

In 1970 provision was made for the inclusion of affiliate or fraternal groups such as teachers, policemen, firemen and Post Office employees, particularly in the small towns, for the purpose of assisting in the operation of the Legion and the work of the branch. Again, these affiliate groups have no vote and cannot become officers.

I should now like to say something about the present structure and status of the Legion. The present membership is approximately 511,483, made up as follows: ordinary members, 318,789; life members, 9,007; honorary members, 9,376; and associate members—to whom I have just referred—82,302. The group known as fraternal organizations or associations number 92,009.

Senator Benidickson: Do you mean firemen, and so on?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, the group I have just mentioned.

There are various tiers of command within the Legion, the principle three being the Dominion Command, which, except at the time of the Dominion convention, is the supreme authority within the Legion; the Provincial Command, which, as the words indicate, is the organization in charge of the provincial group under the bylaws and charter; and the branches which are within the various provincial commands. There are 1,806 branches in Canada today.

As honourable senators know, the branches have halls or club houses in which they hold their meetings and where they conduct their various activities—the communal, social and other activities that are carried on in the Legion hall within a community.

The Legion has developed extensive community programs in various parts of the country. For example, there is a program dedicated to aged veterans, providing, in particular, services in the home, companionship, meals in some cases, transportation when required to hospitals, to visit doctors or for shopping, and also library services. This is a personal kind of service which is most heartwarming in view of the rather impersonal climate and environment in which people live, particularly in the larger cities. It is good to know that the Legion tries hard to look after aged veterans and their dependants.

[Senator Connolly (Ottawa West).]

The branches of the Legion have been engaged extensively in administering low-cost housing throughout the country. I am told that the Legion owns and administers approximately $25 million worth of low-cost housing in Canada for the benefit of veterans. In some provinces—I believe Manitoba is one—although the Legion owns no low-cost housing, it administers low-cost housing on behalf of the province and at no cost to the province.

The record of youth and sports programs conducted by the branches throughout the country is impressive. The branches sponsor, for example, 438 cadet corps, 363 scout troops, 351 cub packs, 234 guide groups, 817 hockey teams, 870 baseball teams, 517 track and field units, and some 944 scholarships.

Honourable senators, the average age of World War II veterans, 33 years after the end of that war, is 61. The number of people in that age group is diminishing, and, of course—this is happening to us all—they are getting older. In 10 years' time those persons will be 70 or more years of age.

I am told that the Legion estimates its services to veterans and their dependants will be required for another 20 or 30 years, and those in the branches and various commands see a need to maintain and increase the ordinary membership—members who can vote and hold office—in order to support the various services and activities now conducted by the Legion.

Reduced to its bare bones, the bill would open membership in the Legion to "others who support the purposes and objects of the Legion." That looks as though the door will be wide open, but the group now being considered and proposed by the branches for membership are the sons and daughters of ex-service personnel. I understand that the next Dominion convention of the Legion will be held in Edmonton, Alberta, in June of this year. They are biennial meetings, and the last one was held in 1976. The Legion would like to have this authority to extend its membership, and to place the matter before the next Dominion convention. The ultimate choice, I understand, will be for the branches, individually, to make.

Parliament has always been sympathetic to helpful veterans legislation, and I am sure it will be sympathetic to this piece of veterans legislation. Parliament has always been sympathetic to the work of the representative veterans association in Canada, the Royal Canadian Legion. Parliament has always been impressed, and is impressed in this case, with the extent and value of the social and community work which is done by the Royal Canadian Legion.

It is unfortunate that this bill has come to us just before the Easter recess. It certainly cannot be passed by the House of Commons before the Easter recess, and since it is a bill that should be referred to committee, at the appropriate time I will move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. I would hope that the Senate might be disposed to facilitate this bill's getting before that committee before the Easter adjournment next week so that, if possible, the bill might be able to reach the House of Commons shortly after the Easter recess for favourable consideration by that house.

I commend the bill to the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I should like to ask the honourable senator a question, but he may have answered it already. Am I correct in believing that the substance of this amendment has not yet been approved by the Dominion convention?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I do not think it has been approved by the Dominion convention. I should think that the proposal now before Parliament comes from the Dominion Command. That is a technical question and I would rather have the officials from the Royal Canadian Legion answer it during the committee meetings. I should think this specific amendment has not been approved by the Dominion convention.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Does the honourable senator know whether the subject matter of this amendment has, on some previous occasion, been considered by the Dominion convention and rejected?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I am told that at the last Dominion convention many branches submitted resolutions to the convention to achieve the result here proposed. Whether it is precisely the step proposed in the bill or not, I am unable to say. My understanding is that this matter was proposed to the last Dominion convention by many branches.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I suppose it follows, then, that it could not have been accepted at that time or we would not be dealing with it now.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Perhaps the representatives of the Dominion Command who attended the Dominion convention told the branches that they did not have the authority at the time to open the doors for further membership, and would not be able to do so until an amendment to the charter was acquired. Perhaps that is the genesis of the proposal.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL UNITY

MAGAZINE ARTICLE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Forsey calling the attention of the Senate to a most mischievous article by June Callwood in the January number of L'actualité.—(Honourable Senator Langlois)

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I wonder whether it is worthwhile keeping this on the order paper. It has been there a long time now. Nobody appears to have anything further to say about it. I wonder whether the order might not be discharged. Perhaps it is not proper for me to make the suggestion, but I merely throw it before the house in the hope that somebody will see fit to consider it.

Senator Perrault: Senator Langlois is not in the chamber at the present time. I would hesitate to suggest it should be withdrawn in his absence.

I do know that he holds very strong views with respect to the subject of the inquiry.

Senator Forsey: I know that, too, but he is being what we used to call rather "backward in coming forward," and I wondered whether this was just a sort of holding operation that he was performing.

Senator Perrault: It may be a painstakingly prepared speech.

Order stands.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance with respect to the supplementary estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978, which was presented earlier this day.

Senator Everett moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, I hope that you will see fit to adopt this report now without any explanation on my part, because the next item the house will be considering will be my explanation on second reading of Appropriation Bill No. 4, which contains the substance of supplementary estimates (B). Rather than having honourable senators hear me speak twice, I would simply dispense with any explanation now and move that the report be adopted.

Senator Grosart: May I ask the honourable senator whether it is his intention—and I am sure it is—to include in his remarks in moving the second reading of the bill, comments on the report itself?

Senator Everett: Yes, it is, Senator Grosart. I simply wanted to save honourable senators the trouble of having to listen to the same speech on two occasions.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1977-78

SECOND READING

Hon. Douglas D. Everett moved the second reading of Bill C-30, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1978.

He said: Honourable senators, this appropriation bill is designated as Appropriation Bill No. 4 because of a change in the numbering system which previously was based on a calendar year. It became quite confusing because one could be dealing, under the previous numbering system, with two fiscal years, as happened this year.

While it will not go down as one of the major recommendations of Senator Grosart, it nevertheless is one of the many recommendations he has made to simplify the processes of Parliament and, indeed, the processes of dealing with these rather complicated estimates.

So Appropriation Act No. 1 for the calendar year 1977 was supplementary estimates (D) for the fiscal year 1976-77. Appropriation Act No. 2 was interim supply for the 1977-78 estimates. Appropriation Act No. 3 was the balance of the main estimates for the fiscal year 1977-78. Then we had another No. 3, which became Appropriation Act No. 3 for the 1977-78 fiscal year and was for supply in respect of supplementary estimates (A) for the fiscal year 1977-78. So this becomes Appropriation Bill No. 4 for the fiscal year 1977-78, and is for supply to cover supplementary estimates (B) for the fiscal year 1977-78.

The items to be voted by this appropriation bill total $818 million, and the major amounts are: $160 million to write off the accumulated deficit of the Canadian Dairy Commission; $197 million to transfer the Nelson River transmission facility to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources from Atomic Energy of Canada Limited; $232 million to CIDA to convert its loans to the less developed countries to grants; and $107 million to the Department of Agriculture for support payments under the Agricultural Stabilization Act.

In supplementary estimates (B) there are another $275 million of statutory items. The major amounts there are $50 million in additional public debt costs and $234 million to the provinces for revenue guarantee payments less a consequential reduction in equalization payments. These two items total $284 million, which is more than the total of $275 million statutory items, and this is brought about by the fact that there are a number of other items, one of which is a credit of $20 million, which is the net of payments respecting armed forces retirement benefits. Loans, investments and advances in these supplementary estimates (B) total $22 million.

The total of supplementary estimates (B), therefore, is $1,094,000,000, which brings the total estimates for the year ending March 31, 1978, to $47,587,000,000, which is an increase over the previous year of 9.37 per cent.

The government reduces this total amount of $47,587,000,000 by taking out certain items so as to arrive at a cash outlay budget. That means taking out all the items that involve no cash outlays. These include the write-off of debts, contributions to international financial institutions which are made out of the foreign exchange fund, and repayments of previous loans, investments and advances. The second element involves the revision of previous spending plans, and the two largest items there are a reduction in the expenditure by the Export Development Corporation of $369 million, which was made possible by private borrowing, and a reduction of $212 million in the requirements of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which was due to a reduction in their housing commitments. The third element that the government uses to bring the budget to a cash outlay budget is the normal lapsing of parliamentary spending authority. Normal lapsing is provided for when the blue book of main estimates is published, but in this particular year it is expected that the actual lapses will be a good deal higher than the figure that was provided.

As a result of these reductions the spending target came down from the $47,587,000,000 to $44,450,000,000, and we have been informed by the President of the Treasury Board that the government expects to be within that ceiling amount of $44,450,000,000.

Senator Benidickson: When? When the costs are finalized in July or August?

Senator Everett: That is correct. In the public accounts you should see that the cash outlay is below the ceiling of $44,450,000,000.

This would indicate an increase over the previous year of 8.2 per cent. However, in the course of that year the federal government shifted some of its shared cost programs with the provinces from direct payments to tax transfers. If those shifts from direct payments to transfers were taken back in, the target would increase from $44,450,000,000 to $45,268,000,000, which would indicate an increase of 10.2 per cent over the previous year, rather than an 8.2 per cent increase, as had been previously suggested to the committee.

The committee was concerned about this, and asked a number of questions of the minister and his officials on it, but what is interesting is that the final figure of 10.2 per cent is still below the nominal growth in the GNP, which is estimated for the fiscal year to be somewhere in the neighbourhood of 11 per cent.

I think we can say that the government's restraint program, in these terms, has been effective, and I will give you some figures that I think illustrate that. In 1974-75 the increase in government expenditures, on a cash outlay basis, over the previous year was 28.3 per cent. In 1975-76 it was 18.4 per cent; in 1976-77, 10.2 per cent; and in 1977-78, 8.2 per cent, or the 10.2 per cent that I have just explained, is due to the shift in shared cost programs from direct payments to tax transfers.

In our examination of the Treasury Board officials, we were also pleased to note that the process of vote netting that we discussed in respect of the Fishing and Recreational Harbours bill, and which concerned the Senate greatly, has been reduced considerably. There are now only five departments that are permitted by the Treasury Board to net votes, and the Treasury Board assures us that the operations of these five departments are being reviewed to determine whether the vote netting should be allowed to continue because it is valid, or whether it should be discontinued.

Finally, the committee made its usual examination of the $1 items in the supplementary estimates, and is satisfied that there were no amendments, as a result of these $1 items, to acts other than appropriation acts.

Honourable senators, I believe that covers the essence of Appropriation Bill No. 4, 1977-78, which, of course, winds up the fiscal year 1977-78. It arises out of supplementary estimates (B) which total $1,094,000,000, but it asks for an appropriation of $818,335,876.

● (1550)

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise to comment briefly on the report of the National Finance Committee and Senator Everett's remarks thereon, and on his explanation of Appropriation Bill No. 4, 1977-78.

Senator Everett has given us a detailed explanation of some of the complicated numbers that are before us. They are complicated to some extent because the Treasury Board, reflecting, presumably, government policy, has decided in the last year or so to present the figures to us in a rather different way from that in which they were presented in previous years. The main purpose, I believe, is to justify the announced restraints program by the government, in spite of the fact that many of the figures would not indicate very great success in the restraints program. This is why questions are being raised in the press as to whether the government's statements respecting the actual year-over-year increases in expenditures are valid in accounting systems other than the one used by the government. The amount of the increase, instead of being 8.2 per cent or 10 per cent—

Senator Benidickson: Or 9.3 per cent.

Senator Grosart: No, 9.3 per cent is next year's forecast. The amount of the increase, instead of 8.2 per cent or 10 per cent, is being said by financial writers and commentators to be as high as 13.2 per cent.

I admit at once that this is entirely a matter of the accounting approach one takes. Senator Everett has given an explanation of the kind of re-accounting that is being done in the way of placing in the accounts the results of the policy decision of a year or so ago to exchange direct payments to the provinces for tax points. There was an assumption that this would have added roughly 2 percentage points to the expenditures in 1977-78, and this is used to indicate that the proposed increases in next year's budget are not higher but are, in effect, lower.

This is a kind of reasoning which is understandable in the circumstances, but because of the change in the method of presentation of the accounts in advance there are questions as to the validity of this approach. I will say no more on that for the moment, except to comment on the statement made in the report that the witnesses "provided assurance that the figures are comparable". That is a reference to the year-to-year growth figures which were given to us as representing the increase in government expenditures, particularly in relation to the increase in the GNP. Personally, I would not agree completely with the statement that the witnesses provided assurance that the year-to-year figures are comparable. A good case can be made out for that statement, but a good case can also be made out for the statement that they are not comparable. I think anyone putting forward the second case would point out that there are many items from year to year, increases and decreases in the spending intentions and the spending actualities, that are not comparable.

The committee dealt with this at some length, and I for one will not agree that we have really received the kind of answer that satisfies us. I am quite sure that the committee will continue to probe this question and assist Parliament in assessing the claims that are made from time to time in respect of the restraints program.

In saying that, I am not also saying that the restraints program has not been effective. It has. There is no question that Treasury Board has imposed restraints, and that those restraints, in many cases, have been effective. We had clear evidence that it now continues its examination of the spending intentions of departments as the year goes along and, from time to time, mandates cuts in the spending programs as stated in the main estimates. That was very reassuring evidence for all the members of the committee. So, when I cast some doubts on the use of figures to support the restraints program, I am certainly not saying that there has not been restraint. Whether there could have been more restraint is, of course, a matter of opinion.

The committee dealt at considerable length with the question of grants and contributions. Throughout the estimates honourable senators will find hardly a department which does not list in its spending intentions, budgetary or non-budgetary, expenditures on grants and contributions. The committee spent a good deal of time trying to discover the rationale for the decisions made by Treasury Board—decisions presumably made by the government—as to what kind of assistance will be given by way of a grant and what kind of assistance will be given by way of a contribution, the main difference being that a grant is not subject to audit whereas a contribution is. This carried us into another component of this general category, subsidies, which, again, appear to be not clearly defined.

One of the interesting things that came out of the discussion on supplementary estimates (B) is that we were told for the first time that the Treasury Board has now issued a directive on definitions. Senator Everett's committee has been discussing this question for some time, insisting that the present or existing definitions are not adequate for the circumstances. The paper that was given to us only today by the officials of the Treasury Board calls for revised definitions in respect of grants and contributions. This paper is dated November 1977. Here again, Senator Everett's committee can claim some success. It is interesting to note that the document goes beyond this question, and points out that there may be at times conflicts between legislation and these definitions. Well, we, as a committee, established clearly that there are areas where there are very distinct conflicts between the old and new definitions.

According to the new definitions a "grant" now means an "unconditional transfer payment made to a recipient for which the government will not receive any goods or services." It does not, of course, mean that the government will not receive any benefits. A "contribution" will mean a "conditional transfer payment made to a recipient which is subject to audit and for which the government will not receive any goods or services."

I said there are many grants and contributions listed in the estimates. In fact, it may be that in supplementary estimates (B) there is not a single department that has not asked for authorization to spend on grants and/or contributions. It is not merely an academic subject because some of these grants run into millions of dollars, and in one or two instances they run into a hundred million dollars or more. So I suggest that our committee—because it is not being done elsewhere—should continue its scrutiny of the use of these two methods, grants and contributions to authorize the expenditure of public funds.

● (1600)

We did ask, and I believe the answer was not quite clear, for a complete list of all grants and contributions. I think the list, even applied to votes in the supplementary estimates before us, would run to somewhere between 50 and 100—that is votes in which there is provision for grants—and we asked for clarification of the reasoning behind making the grant or contribution.

I suggest this is important, honourable senators, because the use of these methods seems to be increasing. It is the easiest thing for a department to ask for a grant or a contribution, because normally it does not come under the same kind of scrutiny as an authorization for a specific project or a specific expenditure. However, as I say, the committee has already brought about an obvious improvement, and I suggest that we continue to examine this very important element in the estimates. This applies to the supplementaries every bit as much as it does to the main estimates.

It was interesting to me, at least, and I think it is interesting to other honourable senators, that the question of net voting, or vote netting, was raised in committee. It will be recalled that we considered a bill—in fact, we still have the bill before us—in respect of which the subject of vote netting was raised. When it was asked if it was the intention of a branch of a particular department to use or expend certain funds under vote netting, the answer was yes.

Senator Benidickson: What department was that?

Senator Grosart: I am referring to Bill C-2, the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Bill, and to the Small Craft Harbours Branch of the Department of Fisheries and the Environment. Senator Cottreau, the sponsor of the bill, told us that, according to information given him, the department intended to continue that practice. Interestingly enough, when we examined some estimates, we found that Treasury Board itself had announced that this particular department would not be permitted to continue with vote netting.

I only indicate this as another example of the type of scrutiny that the Senate can give to bills. The Treasury Board itself was not aware that one branch of one department intended, and had stated that it intended, to carry on with a procedure which was frowned upon, in spite of a Treasury Board directive to the contrary, a method of spending public funds which was not only not authorized in the estimates, but, if I may use the word, forbidden in the wording of the estimates.

The question of the total amount of spending—in this case actual expenditures or very close to actual expenditures—is one that has always concerned the Senate. If one looks back one finds a situation where government spending appeared to run wild for a few years, but fortunately economic conditions finally brought home to the government a fact which the government had denied over and over again, and that was that one of the major causes of inflation was excessive government spending. Economically speaking, there are very few silver linings in the clouds these days, but one of them, I think, is that the government has finally realized that there are levels of government expenditures which the economy and the country cannot afford, and which, if persisted in—as they were persisted in—will bring about some of the problems the country faces now. I do not think anybody will seriously question me if I say that that is a realization that has come to the government, and that we can be thankful for it.

We did mention in committee the possibility that when conditions begin to improve greatly—perhaps after the next election, depending on what happens at that time—departments and spenders of public money may go back to the old bad habits. I think we in the committee are agreed that this is one thing we will be watching very carefully. The Senate can rely on Senator Everett's committee to be a good watchdog for that important aspect of the public interest.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, under the capable chairmanship of Senator Everett, has worked assiduously this week on supplementary estimates (B). The committee held meetings on Monday, Tuesday, yesterday and today. I left the committee this morning with some pique, and I say it quite frankly. Pique is unusual for me. I commend the use of placards and graphs showing trends and so on, such as were used by representatives of Treasury Board when they were before us. But Senator Everett in his remarks today referred to something that aroused my interest in committee, a 9.3 per cent figure—the increase over the total estimates for 1976-77. I had a particular interest in that item because I had in my hands an editorial from the Toronto Globe and Mail which related federal expenditures and the increases in federal expenditures to the report of the Treasurer of Ontario last week which showed an increase of 7 per cent.

● (1610)

I cannot retain in my mind any more figures from the chart. We have had a busy week. It was my inclination to move the adjournment of the debate on this report. However, I am not going to do that. The informative statement the chairman of the committee gave today will be reproduced in Hansard. We shall have an opportunity to review it, and on Tuesday evening I may have some observations to make.

I feel these things are important. We can become so confused if we are pressed for time when we are dealing with percentages. I do not know if we are dealing with percentages relating to GNP or ball-park figures of last year's expenditures.

I will not carry out my inclination to ask for an opportunity to read the report of the committee as presented today and speak on it next Tuesday, but I will take the opportunity to speak when we have the appropriation bill.

Senator Grosart: You have it.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I should like to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Everett speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I would just like to deal with two points that were raised in the excellent speeches made by Senator Grosart and Senator Benidickson.

The first point relates to the confusion that may arise when we are dealing with a number of figures. I stated that the adjusted figures indicate an increase in 1977-78 over 1976-77 of 8.2 per cent, and that if one took into account the result of shifting the shared-cost programs from direct payments to tax transfers, that would increase the government's target from $44,450,000,000 to $45,268,000,000, which would mean an increase between the two years of 10.2 per cent. This figure is still below the increase projected in the GNP during the fiscal year. However, if you take the raw figures for 1976-77, without any adjustment, they are $43,501,000,000, and for 1977-78 they are $47,587,000,000, and the increase there is only 9.37 per cent.

Whether you take the adjusted figures; whether you take those adjusted figures and then further adjust them for the transfer of shared costs from direct payments to tax transfers; or whether you take the raw figures, the increase in expenditures is less than the projected increase of the gross national product.

The question then arises whether the figures are comparable, as is stated in the report. It is true that the adjusted figures had to be changed for the transfer of tax points which gave rise to the increase of 10.2 per cent. In fact, what happened was that there was an offset. As I understand it, that transfer of tax points totalled about $970 million. There was an offset of some $900 million that had to be paid in revenue-guarantee payments from the federal government to the provincial governments in order to make up the shortfall in the revenue on the transferred tax points due to the shortfall in tax receipts.

Senator Grosart: It was explained in supplementary estimates (A).

Senator Everett: That is correct, it was explained in supplementary estimates (A). I believe it is correct to say in the report that the figures are comparable—and I use the word "comparable" in its widest sense—because for the offsets one way there are offsets back the other way.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if Senator Everett will agree with me that the point I was making was that the official figures issued by the Treasury Board show the increase in 1976-77 over 1975-76 as 10.2 per cent. For the next year the official figure issued by the Treasury Board is 8.2 per cent, and the projected figure in the main estimates for the current fiscal year is 9.8 per cent. My complaint is that instead of taking the figure of 8.2 per cent, which was used to indicate a decrease from the 10.2 per cent of the previous year, the government, now finding itself in a position where the 1978-79 increase is 9.8 per cent, says to us that we are really below last year's figure because we have to add those two points. However, they did not add them in the official statement comparing the former year—the 10.2 per cent with the 8.2 per cent. That is where I say there is confusion. I am reading from the official statement that the Treasury Board issued:

Thus the forecast increase of 9.8 per cent for 1978-79 reflects a continuing downward trend in the growth rate of federal government expenditures.

It only reflects this if you manipulate the 8.2 per cent to make it 10.2 per cent.

Senator Everett: I agree with the honourable senator that figures can be confusing, and I guess the easiest way to answer the point is to say that obviously, from the historical figures, starting at 28.3 per cent and getting down to 9.8 per cent, which I think was his figure, there is considerable restraint. I could add to that the fact that this year employment by the federal government is only increasing by six-tenths of one per cent in man-years. I think there is restraint.

Senator Grosart: I agree.

Senator Everett: I do agree with Senator Grosart that figures can confuse, and that different interpretations can be put on the same figures. I will concede that. I will not concede "manipulation."

Senator Grosart: I said "use".

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

● (1620)

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I have just remembered that Senator Flynn wanted me to adjourn the second reading debate in his name. I am sure he has no intention of delaying the matter.

Senator Benidickson: It is still early in the last month of the fiscal year.

Senator Everett: The only problem I have now, Senator Grosart, is that I have closed the debate. I do not know the way out of that dilemma.

The Hon. the Speaker: I gave the notice that Senator Everett was closing the debate.

Senator Sparrow: There really isn't any problem. Senator Flynn can speak on third reading.

Senator Grosart: Yes, Senator Flynn can speak on third reading.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Everett moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, March 20, 1978, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, March 20, 1978

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1978-79

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-31, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1979, to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a second time?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSFER OF OFFENDERS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-21, to implement treaties on the transfer of persons found guilty of criminal offences.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a second time?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Senator Hayden moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

LETTER FROM PRIME MINISTER—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government could tell me the date of the Prime Minister's letter to the Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada and, if it is relevant in view of that date, whether any reply has been received from the council?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, when I tabled the document I inadvertently did not take specific note of the date of the letter. However, that information is easily obtainable.

Senator Flynn: There is no reply as yet?

Senator Perrault: I have no information with respect to a reply, honourable senators.

[Later:]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I should like to repeat the date given in the document tabled a few moments ago. The date of the copies of the letter from the Prime Minister to the Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, is March 15, 1978. It requested that the council—and I repeat this for the benefit of the Leader of the Opposition—take on certain responsibilities for analysis of inflation and productivity developments in the period after April 14, 1978.

I shall determine whether or not a reply has been received as yet.

Senator Flynn: I am quite sure no reply has been sent to the Prime Minister. The question is too involved for an early reply.

PARTICIPATION OF CANADA IN UNITED NATIONS PEACEKEEPING FORCE IN SOUTHERN LEBANON—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether Canada has been asked by the United Nations to provide troops for the proposed peacekeeping force in Southern Lebanon?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that there has been communication between and among nations of the United Nations and Canada with respect to Canadian participation in and deployment of existent Canadian troops in such a peace force. Honourable senators are aware, of course, that Canada has established an unrivalled reputation in the world for activities of this nature, and it would be most remarkable if Canada were not at some point contacted.

Senator Olson: A supplementary question. Has Canada given a reply to the request?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, while I do not have the specific memorandum to that effect on my desk, it is my understanding—which I shall hopefully check out further this afternoon—that a positive response has been given by Canada. I will seek later this afternoon to provide the chamber with more specific information on this matter.

Senator Flynn: May we infer from this answer that Canada is in agreement with the resolution passed by the Security Council?

Senator Perrault: I would hesitate to comment on a question which has as high a degree of sensitivity as this question. Consequently, I would appreciate an opportunity to contact our officials in the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs for further information and determine whether or not some official statement may be made available at this time.

Senator Olson: While the Leader of the Government is seeking that information, I wonder whether he could determine the number of troops involved in the request and whether or not Canada has given a commitment as to the size of the force.

Senator Perrault: That inquiry will get under way immediately. Hopefully more complete information can be provided later this day.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

USE OF CFB SUMMERSIDE, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 7—By Senator Phillips:

1. In view of the fact the Long Range Patrol Aircraft are to be stationed at CFB Greenwood, N.S., has the government found an alternative use for CFB Summerside, P.E.I.?

2. If so, does this include a facility for the overhaul and repair of helicopters?

(Answered by Senator Perrault on March 14, as follows:)

1. The Department of National Defence is currently examining a number of options for activities at CFB Summerside following introduction of the new Long Range Patrol Aircraft. Regardless of the ultimate configuration of the base resulting from these studies, Search and Rescue activities will be retained there and the base personnel establishment will remain at approximately its present size.

2. A facility for the repair and overhaul of helicopters is not among the options being studied; however, CFB Summerside will be capable of carrying out first and second line maintenance on its aircraft establishment, part of which will be helicopters.

COMPENSATION FOR FORMER PRISONERS OF WAR ACT

THIRD READING

Hon. Charles McElman moved the third reading of Bill C-27, to amend the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I am wondering whether the sponsor of the bill is in a position to tell me whether the committee took into consideration the representations made by the national president of the Polish Combatants Association in Canada and the national president of the Canadian Polish Congress regarding this bill. I was not present at the committee meeting when the bill was being considered, and I am wondering whether these representations were considered in any way.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, very able representatives of both the Royal Air Forces Escaping Society and the Polish veterans groups were present during the committee hearing. The Minister of Veterans Affairs was present at the same time. We heard from all witnesses and then had our question-and-answer session.

The minister and his officials displayed sympathy for the representations made. It, of course, was not possible to adopt any amendments in committee that would meet the wishes of these groups. Those who appeared before the committee seemed quite satisfied that they had had a good hearing and that their representations had reached directly the minister involved.

● (1420)

Senator Flynn: Did the minister undertake to do anything about it?

Senator McElman: The minister did not undertake to make any amendments at this stage, nor in the immediate future, but he did show sympathy and indicated that he and his department would give careful consideration to the representations made.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Will the honourable senator permit a further question?

Was any information given as to the number of groups of servicemen of foreign armies who served with the Allied Forces during World War II, and as to the number of individuals in those groups who would be involved if this legislation were to apply to them?

Senator McElman: The evidence given was to the effect that former nationals of some 30 other countries would be involved, as with the Polish group.

As to the numbers from each of those countries and the number in total, it was not possible for the minister or the Chairman of the Canadian Pension Commission to give those figures to the committee. As a matter of fact, as I recall, it was said that it would be extremely difficult to come up with those figures.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Was it suggested that some attempt might be made to do so by contacting those foreign national groups who are now Canadian citizens?

If I may couple that with a second question: I take it that in those discussions there were ex-servicemen who were in other forces of Her Majesty, namely, from other parts of the Commonwealth, who are not included in the total of 30 foreign groups.

Senator McElman: That does not include other Commonwealth countries, no. As to the numbers, it was indicated that, as in other questions of detail that were put to the witnesses, they would endeavour to determine what the figures were. I must say, in all fairness, that the indication we received was that the detail figures you speak of would be difficult to come by.

Senator Flynn: Was it agreed in committee that, on the whole, this bill is a very modest advance?

Senator McElman: I do not recall the word "modest" being used, Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn: How would you yourself describe it?

Senator McElman: There seemed to be the general opinion that this was—

Senator Flynn: Better than nothing?

Senator McElman:—that this was another admirable step forward in improving our veterans charter, which is in the foremost of all nations of the Western World.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask Senator McElman one further question.

Did the witnesses from the Polish Canadian Congress, or Canadian Polish Congress, or whatever it is called, give any kind of estimate even of the number of people they thought might be involved from their own group?

Senator McElman: I believe there was an estimate. I cannot recall the figures that were used, but I believe there was an estimate. That, of course, would appear in the record of our committee hearing.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Hayden moved third reading of Bill S-2, to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to place on record the fact that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has done excellent work on this bill. The committee received praise from the department, which, in itself, is something. I believe that the chairman of the committee and the members—I am a member but I do not attend as regularly as do others—deserve the thanks of both the Senate and the people of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1977-78

THIRD READING

Senator Molgat moved the third reading of Bill C-30, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1978.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I will take only a few minutes of your time with respect to this bill. It was mentioned last Thursday that I intended to speak on second reading but what I have to say applies as well to the third reading.

I wanted to say about the total amount of government expenditures for the year ending at the end of next week that reaching the objective of $44,450 million—and we will know if it was reached only at the end of August—is something in itself.

Senator Everett said he was very pleased that the increase in government expenditures over the previous year—and I am not talking about the amount authorized in the supply bills, that is that the amount of $44.5 billion—is 10.2 per cent less than the growth of the gross national product. Of course, compared with previous years when in 1974-75, for example, we had an increase of 28.3 per cent, in 1975-76 we had an increase of 8.4 per cent and in 1976-77 it was about the same as this year. So I agree but I do not call that austerity. What they say is that it will not be higher than the comparable increase in the gross national product.

Honourable senators, I do not see why the government's target must always be to spend in about the same proportion as the gross national product increases. Why must government expenditures always increase in that proportion? I see no reason to it. Of course, if the government does not have the courage to cut the expenditures in existing programs, to terminate existing programs or not to enter into new programs that are not absolutely necessary, if only from a purely electoral standpoint we will always have that increase. So it is clear that the government is always trying to be omnipresent and the minimum it set for itself in the last few years is not to increase its expenditures more than the increase in the gross national product. So I do not think the government deserves to pat itself on the back about that. It might rather rap its own knuckles. That is all I wanted to say about the amount of the estimates.

Now, I would like to make a few comments about the bill itself.

I have had an opportunity to discuss this problem. I would like to draw your attention to subclause 3(2), which reads:

The provisions of each item in the Schedules shall be deemed to have been enacted by Parliament on the 1st day of April, 1977.

That is to say almost one year ago, right? The provisions of each item in the schedule are retroactive.

Clause 4(1) reads as follows:

Where an item in the Estimates referred to in section 2 purports to confer authority to enter into commitments up to an amount stated therein or increases the amount up to which commitments may be entered into under any other Act or where a commitment is to be entered into under subsection (2), the commitment may be entered into in accordance with the terms of such item . . .

It means that in fact Parliament abandons to the government any real control it could have over spending. In fact, we are telling the government: what you did until now was all right. So the government spends before it gets parliamentary approval. It is another case where the Auditor General was right to say that the government has lost control over government spendings. It is obvious here that the government can spend in excess of the approved budget and it just has to say to Parliament at the end of March, just before the end of the fiscal year: We need $1 billion or so, like in this case, but tell us that what we have done so far since last April, since the beginning of the fiscal year, was correct.

That is the exact purport of this kind of bill which we get every year. So I suggest that some day the Senate Committee on National Finance should study the wording of such bills. I have asked for this in the past and again I suggest that we establish exactly what are the powers given to the government through that kind of bill. Of course it does not bother Senator Denis but that is another matter. According to him, we can give blank cheques if it is a Liberal government. But I am anxious to see what their attitude will be after the next election when, to restore public confidence, Canadians will have decided to elect another government.

In any event I say that this bill, honourable senators, asks you to forget all irregularities that might have occurred since last April 1; all commitments taken are to be approved retroactively. Is this parliamentary control over spending? I say no. I say it is a situation into which perhaps we should delve deeper at the Senate Committee on National Finance where we might establish the exact scope of those bills.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I took note of the comments made by my honourable colleague, Senator Flynn. Concerning those last comments I have no ready answer to give him for the moment. If he so wishes, I would be prepared to propose the adjournment of the third reading to give him a more precise answer. If not, I think that the Senate Committee on National Finance could well study this proposal and inquire about its scope when it meets again. I think that if this meets with your approval, we could now proceed with the third reading.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Senator Molgat: With regard to government spending—and the comments made at the beginning—I think that the fact that the government has indeed managed to reduce substantially the increase—

Senator Flynn: The increase?

Senator Molgat: —the annual increase in spending, is already a big step.

Senator Flynn: It's better than nothing.

Senator Molgat: To jump to the conclusion that we must now have spendings which increase at the same rate as the gross national product, I do not think that it is quite the case. I do not think that each year the government has said that we are going to increase by such and such amount, but rather that we are not going to spend that amount. And already I think that this is a significant step for one must concede that the population increases and that there are programs which keep increasing quite naturally, and even if no new programs were launched there would still be an increase that cannot be altered.

● (1440)

So I think that what the government has done is certainly quite praiseworthy and indicates on its part a sense of financial responsibility which, short of deserving a pat on the back, as Senator Flynn put it, at least commands some congratulations.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PARTICIPATION OF CANADA IN UNITED NATIONS PEACEKEEPING FORCE IN SOUTHERN LEBANON—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, since I must leave the chamber very shortly, may I have leave to make a statement on UN peacekeeping?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: Canada has not been officially asked to send any new troops. However, we have been asked to deploy some of those who are now in the Middle East, and this request is being studied.

Should we be asked for more troops, the request will be studied sympathetically, keeping in mind the qualifications put forward last Friday by the Honourable Secretary of State for External Affairs, that is, if we have the capability to perform the role we are asked to perform and provided the mandate is one we can accommodate. Consultations are now going on in New York, and the Government of Canada has indicated that it is prepared to assist in any way that may be possible.

I appreciate the indulgence of honourable senators in order to make that statement.

Senator Olson: When the request asks for troops which are already deployed in the Middle East, does that mean only those in the Egypt-Israel area, or does it include those in the Cyprus area?

Senator Perrault: I am simply not able to go beyond that statement at this time.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 16, the debate on the motion of Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) for the second reading of Bill S-10, respecting the Royal Canadian Legion.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, in his speech on second reading of Bill S-10, Senator John J. Connolly, the sponsor, gave a precise and interesting summary of the history of the Royal Canadian Legion. Of course, it would not be possible at this time to relate all of the good work done by that organization.

However, it is well known that the main field of its activity was in relation to war veterans and the dependants of war veterans. In this field alone it has more than justified its existence. It has been active in other fields as well, doing work not only for the benefit of veterans but for the benefit of all Canadians. It has been, and is, actively involved in many works of national, provincial and community importance. Indeed, the purposes and aims of the Legion authorize it to engage in many activities apart from its work on behalf of the veterans of Canada's wars.

● (1450)

Since the bill before us proposes to amend one of these purposes, I should like to have all of them on the record. They are listed in section 4, chapter 84, Statutes of Canada, 1948, with some amendments. Since there are 22 of them, I would ask at this time for leave to have them inserted in my speech at this point.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Are these simply the powers and purposes of the Legion that are to be listed?

Senator Macdonald: These are what are called the purposes and objects of the Legion. As amended up to date, it lists them all.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Section 4, Chapter 84, Statutes of Canada, 1948, as amended—text follows.]

The purposes and objects of the Legion shall be:

- (a) to constitute an association of those who have served in His Majesty's navy, army, air force or any auxiliary force, which association shall be democratic and non-sectarian; and shall not be affiliated to or connected directly or indirectly with any political party or organization;
- (b) to bring about the unity of all who have so served;
- (c) to further among them the spirit of comradeship and mutual help, and the close and kindly ties of active service;
- (d) to pass on to their families and descendants the traditions for which they stand;
- (e) to perpetuate the memory and deeds of the fallen and to those who die in the future;
- (f) to promote and care for memorials to their valour and sacrifice, to provide suitable burial, to keep an annual memorial day, to preserve the records and memories of their service and to see that such service shall not be forgotten by the nation;
- (g) to ensure that proper attention shall be paid to the welfare of all who have served and the welfare of their dependents and to see to the maintenance and comfort of those who require special treatment, particularly the disabled, sick, aged and needy, and to promote the welfare of their dependents;
- (h) to educate public opinion regarding national duties to the dead, the disabled and others who have served, and their dependents;
- (i) to foster loyalty among the public and education in the principles of patriotism, duty and unstinted public service;

[Senator Macdonald.]

(j) to strive for peace, goodwill and friendship among all nations, at the same time advocating the maintenance by Canada of adequate and sufficient forces on land, sea and in the air for the defence of our country and for the discharge of those obligations which rest upon us by virtue of our partnership in the Commonwealth;

(k) to support suitable undertakings for the training, employment and settlement of ex-service men and women, and the education of their children;

(l) to preserve their statutory, acquired and legitimate rights, and those of their dependents and, in so doing, to offer the Legion's co-operation to those officially charged with the responsibility of administering such rights by federal or other governments;

(m) to assist comrades now serving, especially in connection with their return to civil life, and to safeguard the interests of their dependents whilst they are in service;

(n) to assist ex-service men to secure not less than the recognized standard rates of wages;

(o) to secure adequate pensions, allowances, grants and war gratuities for ex-service men and women, their dependents, and the widows, children and dependents of those who are dead, and to labour for honourable provision being made for those who, in declining years, are unable to support themselves;

(p) to co-operate with Commonwealth, Empire and Allied associations of similar aims and objects;

(q) to establish, organize and regulate provincial and local bodies, or commands and branches, in convenient centres throughout Canada and elsewhere;

(r) to establish, organize and regulate provincial and local bodies;

(s) to acquire, hold, sell or lease real and immovable personal and movable property;

(t) to raise and co-ordinate funds for assisting those mentioned in the preceding paragraphs, to provide for the administration of the Legion and its authorized provincial commands, branches and ladies' auxiliaries and to see that these and other funds raised for such purposes are applied to those purposes and no others;

(u) to act generally on behalf of all those who have served in His Majesty's forces;

(v) to encourage, promote, engage in or support all forms of national, provincial, municipal or community service, or any charitable or philanthropic purpose.

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, as time goes on it is natural that less time needs to be devoted to matters concerning the veterans and more time can be devoted to other Legion activities. As veteran membership is growing older and older members are dropping off, some change in membership is necessary, and indeed desirable, if the Legion is to continue to be the vital force for good in the life of Canada that it has been up to now.

Some changes in membership have already taken place over the years. The sponsor of the bill mentioned the various types of associate membership that the Legion now has, which do not carry the right to vote or to hold office. There has been a widely supported proposal that sons and daughters of veterans, who are now admitted to associate membership, be admitted to full membership, and I personally think this is a normal development which deserves support.

When I first noticed that an amendment to the act of incorporation was to be introduced, I thought it was to accomplish that purpose—in other words, that it would give the sons and daughters of veterans full membership, which carries the right to vote and to hold office. Indeed, I got that impression from a statement by the Assistant Dominion Secretary, as reported by a Canadian Press despatch of March 10. The news item does not report the statement itself, but explains it. I will quote part of the report:

The Royal Canadian Legion has been swamped by callers who wrongly think the Legion is opening its ranks to all civilians, Rodney Johnston, the Legion's assistant dominion secretary, said Thursday.

Johnston said in a statement that the Legion now is seeking an amendment to its federal act of incorporation that would make it possible for sons and daughters of Legion members to become full members with the right to vote and hold office.

If Parliament approves the change, it would be up to the Legion's annual convention to decide specifically what new groups of people will be allowed to join.

Further on, the report reads:

Johnston said this change is intended to clear the way for sons and daughters to join. About 80,000 now are associate members without the right to vote or hold office.

I, at least, got the impression, as I expect many others did, that the amendments sought dealt only with associate membership of sons and daughters of veterans. However, Bill S-10 goes a great deal further than that. Section 4 of the original act of incorporation reads:

The purposes and objects of the Legion shall be:

(a) to constitute an association of those who have served in His Majesty's navy, army, air force or any auxiliary force, which association shall be democratic and non-sectarian; and shall not be affiliated to or connected directly or indirectly with any political party or organization.

That is the paragraph which is to be amended. Bill S-10, makes a very important, and indeed far-reaching, change to that paragraph, because it provides:

Paragraph 4(a) of chapter 84 of the Statutes of Canada, 1948 is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

“(a) to constitute an association of those who have served in Her Majesty's navy, army, air force or any auxiliary force—

This is the amendment:

—and of others who support the purposes and objects of the Legion—

I think the passing of this amendment would leave the door wide open for membership in this organization, so that it would be possible to change the very nature of the Legion.

Personally, I think it would have been better practice if this proposed amendment had been considered by the Dominion convention before Parliament was asked to pass it. That convention is to be held around the middle of June this year. It has been said that the convention will decide who of these associate members shall have full membership, and I have no doubt the convention will propose that sons and daughters shall be given full membership and no others. However, the possibility is there, and before this amendment is passed there are a couple of things I should like to know.

First, I should like to know whether the Dominion executive contacted the provincial commands, and, if so, whether the provincial commands contacted local branches so that they know what is being proposed. If they are not informed, delegates might go to the convention believing that the only amendment is one giving the sons and daughters of veterans full membership, not knowing that it is far wider than that. I hope that this bill will be referred to a committee, and that the Legion officers will appear and satisfy those who, like myself, are concerned about it, and who want to know that its passage, either in its present form or some amended form, is desirable.

I should perhaps mention, honourable senators, that in speaking this way I am speaking only for myself. I have not contacted any Legion members, or even my local branch. If I may interject a personal note, I have been a member of a local branch since 1945. While I have never held major office in any branch or done very much in my branch, I was a member of the executive of that branch from 1945 to 1961, when I came to the Senate. Ever since then that branch has honoured me by annually electing me its honorary president, an honour which I greatly appreciate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure that when this bill goes to committee we will have an opportunity to go into it more fully.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Connolly speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators—and Mr. Honorary President—what Senator Macdonald has said is very clear and helpful. I believe the answers to the questions he has posed can be given only in committee. The plain fact of the matter is that what we are considering in this bill is a proposal to enlarge the membership of the Royal Canadian Legion, and the question is: How far should the door be opened; how wide should that enlargement be? Perhaps it might be helpful if I place on the record some information which was given to me this morning.

I am given to understand that at the Dominion convention in 1976 some branches, by resolution or other means, asked the convention to consider enlargement of the membership. I believe that at that time the advice given was that this could not be done without an amendment to the charter within the procedure which is now being followed. Later in 1976 the Dominion Executive Council met—I understand the provincial commands are fully represented on that council—and a motion was adopted unanimously to enlarge the membership in the terms of the amendment proposed in the legislation now before us. I am bound to say that the preamble to that motion seems to restrict the enlargement of membership to sons and daughters of veterans, but the motion itself which was put before the executive council was a broader motion and in the same terms as the amendment before us.

In 1977 another attempt was made to reinforce this position and, as a result, the legal advisers to the Royal Canadian Legion suggested that the amendment we are now asked to legislate be sought. At a meeting of, I believe, the provincial secretaries, there was some discussion with respect to this matter. At that time they considered the question raised by Senator Macdonald, as to whether the proposal should emanate from the Dominion convention or should come from the Dominion Command to Parliament first. I believe the conclusion reached was: "Let us not get into the business of the chicken and the egg, and which came first, but let us take the bull by the horns and go at it." That is a pretty badly mixed metaphor.

Senator Flynn: There is quite a difference.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): There is a slight difference, yes.

The question now is whether eligibility for membership should be as wide as is proposed in this amendment, or whether the widened eligibility should be restricted, as was mentioned by Senator Macdonald, to sons and daughters of veterans. I may say that the provision allowing children of veterans to become auxiliary members is clause 209(2) of the by-laws of the Legion. However, these people, of whom there are a great many, are classified simply as auxiliary members, and they can neither vote nor hold office. While all that was desired at first was that sons and daughters of veterans be allowed to become full-fledged ordinary members, I believe the legal advice was, "It will probably not be long before the eligibility for membership will have to be widened still further, which will mean going back to Parliament again; therefore, why not take advantage of this opportunity to enlarge our present application to Parliament so that we will not have to go back a second time, or even more often."

[Senator Connolly (Ottawa West).]

I believe there is some merit in this, because the Dominion Command and the provincial commands, and even the branches themselves, have the authority to restrict membership to whatever categories they wish. It seems clear, assuming they have the powers proposed here, that if the Legion wishes to restrict it by by-law to sons and daughters of veterans as ordinary members that is their privilege and option. The option is one that may also be enjoyed by the branches. I see some merit in this, and also in the idea that they should not be required to come back to Parliament five or ten years from now saying they need more members still and wish to enlarge the eligibility for membership further.

However, honourable senators, I believe that Senator Macdonald's proposal that this bill be referred to a committee for a full airing of this proposition is a wise one, and I certainly support it.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator Forsey would not dare say this, but he came to me after Senator Connolly's reference to the chicken and the egg, and taking the bull by the horns, and said that the bill should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I'd be afraid they might lay an egg!

Motion agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1978-79

SECOND READING

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved the second reading of Bill C-31, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1979.

He said: Honourable senators, the main estimates for the year 1978-79, on which Bill C-31 is based, were tabled in the Senate and referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on February 23 last. The committee commenced its discussion of those estimates on March 14, and continued it on March 16. Provision has been made for further meetings of the committee.

The 1978-79 estimates total $48,250 million, consisting of budgetary expenditures of $46,476 million and net non-budgetary expenditures of $1,774 million. The bill now before us is the interim supply bill for the 1978-79 fiscal year, and will release a portion of these estimates to provide for all necessary requirements of the Government of Canada to June 30, 1978. The total expenditure proposed by Bill C-31 is $5,657,022,492.

● (1510)

Generally, the bill would release three-twelfths of the amounts contained in the votes of these estimates. However, there are additional proportions provided for the following items which cannot be accommodated within the general provision of three-twelfths. These additional proportions are required due to the seasonal nature of some programs, the need to pay certain grants, contributions and other costs early in the fiscal year, or to finance certain operations pending the receipt of revenue later in the fiscal year.

An additional eight-twelfths of the total of the amounts in the said estimates are required for:

Loans to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited to finance the purchase of the Port Hawkesbury heavy water plant (Energy, Mines and Resources).

Advances to the Passport Office (External Affairs).

Loans to the governments of the Northwest and Yukon Territories for making loans to municipalities for capital projects (Indian Affairs and Northern Development).

Payments to the Great Lakes Pilotage Authority Ltd. (Transport).

Federal Labour Intensive Projects (Treasury Board).

Payments to OPCAN (Treasury Board).

Home Insulation Program (Urban Affairs).

An additional six-twelfths of the total of the amounts in the said estimates are required for:

Payments to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for operating and capital expenditures associated with the 1978 Commonwealth Games (Secretary of State).

Summer student, youth employment and other employment initiatives (Treasury Board).

An additional five-twelfths of the total of the amount in the said estimates are required for:

Government contingencies (Treasury Board).

An additional four-twelfths of the total of the amount in the said estimates are required for:

Grants to municipalities (Finance).

An additional three-twelfths of the total of the amounts in the said estimates are required for:

Operating expenditures associated with the experimental communications satellite (Communications).

Various grants and contributions (Secretary of State).

An additional two-twelfths of the total of the amounts in the said estimates are required for:

Payments to refiners and other importers of crude oil and petroleum products (Energy, Mines and Resources).

Capital expenditures for the purchase of a chancery site in Washington, U.S.A. (External Affairs).

An additional one-twelfth of the total of the amounts in the said estimates is required for:

Operating expenditures of Uranium Canada Limited (Energy, Mines and Resources).

Program expenditures associated with the Inter-American Development Bank meeting to be held in Vancouver in April (Finance).

Operating funds for Social Assistance Programs (Indian Affairs and Northern Development).

Grant to the Institute for Research on Public Policy (Privy Council).

Program expenditures made prior to the collection of associated revenues (Supply and Services, and Transport).

Those provide for all of the proportions to be released under this interim supply bill.

Clause 5 of the bill would grant further borrowing authority of $5 billion for financing, not only the ordinary Canadian dollar operations of the government, but also foreign currency borrowing which may be undertaken from time to time.

Those are the main purposes of Bill C-31, and if honourable senators require any further information, I shall endeavour to provide it.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Before moving that the debate be adjourned, I would like to ask Senator Molgat a question about the terms used in clause 2.

I note that the bill asks for three-twelfths of the budget, or $5.188 billion. When the honourable senator explained the other items, he said "an additional amount representing eight-twelfths of, or six-twelfths of, or five-twelfths of." However, this is not what the bill says, since it says "eight-twelfths", "three-twelfths" and then "eight-twelfths". This would lead us to believe that the bill asks for only eight-twelfths. Otherwise, it should say "additionally, eight-twelfths", which in fact makes eleven-twelfths of schedule A, nine-twelfths of schedule B and eight-twelfths of schedule C. The bill is drafted in a strange way. I wonder if the mover of the bill has considered this matter. There does not seem to be any agreement. When he explains it, it is easy to understand, but when we read the bill, it is not so clear.

Senator Molgat: To reply to Senator Flynn, if I understand the bill, it in fact provides for three-twelfths of the total estimates.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Senator Molgat: This includes everything. In addition to these amounts—

Senator Flynn: No, the bill does not say so. This is what the bill does not say.

Senator Molgat: I think that when we read it, it is easy to understand. If we say three-twelfths of the total, we have a certain amount, which represents, I believe, $5 million and some—

Senator Flynn: Five million.

Senator Molgat: Then, if we add the other amounts, it is very obvious that these are added to the total amount of three-twelfths. However, I shall be happy to examine the text of the bill.

Senator Flynn: No, I do not think it is clear. However, on behalf of Senator Grosart, I move that this debate be adjourned.

[English]

Senator Buckwold: I have a question, the answer to which I do not think would be readily available. I should like to ask Senator Molgat whether he can provide statistics as to the percentage of the gross national product being taken by the federal government and, in addition, the percentages taken by provincial and municipal governments over the past five years?

I ask this question because there has been a great deal of comment on the amount of the gross national product that is spent by government. I should like to have specified the percentages that are spent by each level of government, because normally the figure is given in total. I should like to see an historic development indicating what share is going to what government. I have a feeling that the federal government will not look so bad in comparison to some of the other governments.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, at the moment it is impossible to provide the information in so far as the provincial governments and municipalities are concerned. Information as to the federal government's share of taxation was provided by the minister when he appeared before the National Finance Committee. I also believe it was given in the Senate last week. Certainly it is a figure that is readily available.

It was the subject of a brief discussion earlier by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition, who indicated that the federal government is now maintaining its annual growth at the same rate as the growth of the GNP. That was certainly the objective of the federal government, and it has been achieved. Further information will be sought with respect to the other levels of governments. I presume this information is available within government services, but I do not have it at hand.

Senator Buckwold: Does that mean you can obtain it?

Senator Molgat: Yes, I will endeavour to obtain that information.

On motion of Senator Flynn, for Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

[Senator Molgat.]

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT ELECTION EXPENSES ACT NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Paul Lucier moved the second reading of Bill C-33, to amend the Canada Elections Act, the Election Expenses Act and the Northwest Territories Act in respect of territorial elections.

He said: Honourable senators, I am very happy to be able to rise today to move the second reading of Bill C-33, to amend the Canada Elections Act, the Election Expenses Act, and the Northwest Territories Act in respect of territorial elections.

The intention of the bill is to effectively transfer the legislative and administrative responsibilities for the conduct of council elections in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories to the two councils, the commissioners, and their staffs. Honourable senators are no doubt aware that the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada is currently responsible for the conduct of territorial council elections pursuant to the provisions of the Canada Election Act. The Chief Electoral Officer and his staff have done a fine job over the years in carrying out this responsibility, and I know that he is prepared to continue this function if called upon to do so by the commissioners.

The bill itself consists of three parts. The first three clauses would amend the Canada Elections Act by repealing and replacing section 112 for the Northwest Territories and section 113 for the Yukon, and by repealing section 115, which is spent.

The effect of these revisions is twofold. First, they would remove the overriding provision that territorial council elections must be conducted in accordance with terms and conditions provided by the Canada Elections Act, and would allow future elections to be held under comprehensive territorial elections legislation. Secondly, these changes would authorize the Chief Electoral Officer to enter into agreements with the commissioners to conduct future council elections in accordance with territorial ordinances or, alternatively, they would allow territorial authorities to administer these elections completely without federal direction.

It is intended that these changes will come into force on a date to be set by proclamation and, in consultation with the commissioners, comprehensive territorial elections ordinances will be proclaimed on the same day.

The bill would also amend the Northwest Territories Act to provide the Commissioner in Council of the Northwest Territories with the legislative authority required to enact comprehensive elections legislation. The Yukon Council already has this power pursuant to section 14 of the Yukon Act, but the Northwest Territories Council does not. This change would come into force on royal assent.

The remaining clauses would repeal certain sections of the Election Expenses Act and provide transitional conditions for the coming into force of the amendments to the Canada Elections Act.

The commissioners and the councils of the two territories have been consulted about the proposed elections transfer, and all are in agreement. The Chief Electoral Officer is in full agreement also, and his officials worked closely with those of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to develop the proposal. The Yukon Council recently enacted a comprehensive elections ordinance which will be proclaimed on the same day that the revised section 113 of the Canada Elections Act is brought into effect.

Commissioner Pearson and his Executive Committee would like to be able to conduct the next territorial election, which is due in the fall, in accordance with the new legislation. In the Northwest Territories, similar legislation will be presented to council at its next session in May, if the amendments to the Northwest Territories Act can be enacted prior to then. The next election in the Northwest Territories is expected in the spring of 1979.

Honourable senators, I have drawn your attention to these details to enable you to understand the need for quick passage of this bill. Once the legislation is in place, work will still be required by officials in both territories before the necessary administrative arrangements can be completed for the upcoming elections. I trust I have the support of honourable senators for this proposal.

This bill received the unanimous consent of all parties in the other place and was given first, second and third readings on the same day. I do not believe it requires being sent to committee, and I commend it to honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Flynn, for Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, March 21, 1978

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER TABLED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages, for the calendar year 1977, pursuant to section 34(2) of the Official Languages Act, Chapter O-2, R.S.C., 1970.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Nominal Roll of the Queen's Silver Jubilee Medal recipients (Volumes 1 to 5), dated March 1978.

BANKRUPTCY BILL, 1978

FIRST READING

Senator Perrault presented Bill S-11, respecting bankruptcy and insolvency.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a second time?

Senator Perrault moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday, April 4, 1978.

Motion agreed to.

QUEEN'S PRIVY COUNCIL FOR CANADA

INSTRUMENT OF ADVICE FOR SUMMONING A PERSON— QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government when I might expect an answer to the question I placed on the order paper on March 2?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, an inquiry will go forward this day to ascertain the reason for the delay in providing a reply to the honourable senator's question.

THE ECONOMY

MEETING BETWEEN AMERICAN AND CANADIAN TREASURY OFFICIALS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on March 9 the Honourable Senator Olson asked a question with respect to discussions between United States treasury officials and Canadian treasury officials. At that time he asked for a report to this house about those meetings and other matters relating to the relative values of the Canadian dollar and the United States dollar.

The purpose of the meeting on March 9 between the Minister of Finance and Messrs. Blumenthal, Secretary of the U.S. Treasury, and Schultze, Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, was to exchange views on the current economic situation. It was intended as a follow-up to the visit of Vice-President Mondale here in January.

Both sides offered their assessment of the economic situation in their own countries—including growth, inflation, and the exchange rate, as well as the world economy generally. Under the latter heading the "state of play" in the multilateral trade negotiations in Geneva was reviewed. A few matters of bilateral interest were also touched on, including U.S. policies on steel and tax deductibility of convention expenses.

There is no report as such on the meeting. Its purpose was not to negotiate or reach agreement on specific issues.

As to the specific question on the Canadian dollar, there were no agreements reached on joint actions. Both sides expressed satisfaction with existing channels of co-operation in this area. Mr. Blumenthal also assured Mr. Chrétien that rumours about the possible re-imposition of an interest equalization tax or import surcharges were unfounded.

Honourable senators, under separate cover I am forwarding to Senator Olson further detailed information with respect to his question, which information is too lengthy to be read at this time.

CANADA NON-PROFIT CORPORATIONS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the Bill S-3, intituled: "An Act respecting Canadian non-profit corporations".—(Honourable Senator Hayden).

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and in view of special circumstances, I would ask that Order No. 4 be proceeded with as the first order of the day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, I should indicate to you just what Bill S-3 comprises. Bill S-3, as appears from the title, deals with the basic legislation in respect of non-profit corporations. When the Canada Business Corporations Act was enacted in 1975, it omitted to deal with non-profit corporations. This was intentional inasmuch as it was indicated at that time that the government intended to introduce a separate bill to deal with non-profit corporations. This bill came to us in November of 1977.

I should point out that included within the description of non-profit corporations would be such corporations as boards of trade, chambers of commerce, charitable foundations, and charitable organizations or corporations and others operating in the non-profit field, including those which are membership corporations. In this bill different treatment is given to various groups of these corporations, and I propose to deal with what I regard as the most important.

I should point out that in the report which was presented the other day there were 73 amendments proposed, of which 51 related to the French text. The need for that number arose from the fact that the basic concept of Bill S-3, dealing with non-profit corporations, goes back, so far as procedures and administrative functions are concerned, to the Canada Business Corporations Act, and it was proposed to incorporate many of those provisions into the governing provisions administratively and as to the proceedings in different circumstances under Bill S-3.

Since Bill S-3 had been introduced in the Senate after Bill S-2, which was under consideration, and since many amendments were incorporated in Bill S-2, which this chamber dealt with about a week ago on the report from the committee, it became necessary, in order to parallel the procedures in Bill S-3 with the procedures in the Canada Business Corporations Act, to provide amendments in the French text as against what was in the bill in the translation of the text at the time Bill S-3 was being considered by us. For all these reasons we have as many as 51 amendments to the French text.

There were 22 other amendments made, some of them arising for the same reason, and because of changes in approach to various subject matters, which I will indicate briefly in a moment, it became necessary to change the text of the English version in relation to some items to conform to the views of the committee, and also to conform to acceptance of those views by the departmental officers who were appearing before us. Of those 22, I would say that six, or possibly seven, are of considerable importance, and I now propose to deal briefly with those that I regard as being of material importance.

The first one relates to a submission made to your committee by the Canadian Red Cross Society. Our method of dealing with it was to make a provision for indirect voting by members of the corporation. In this case indirect voting meant to legitimate expressly the indirect voting structures such as exist in the case of the Red Cross Society. Since this is an important organization, I think I should take a moment or two to indicate exactly how the Red Cross Society functions.

The Red Cross Society, with its functions, its purpose, its national scope and the quality of the work which it does as a charitable organization, is well known to you. The society is made up of a large number of local branches varying in size from two to three members to something the size of the Toronto central branch, which has a large membership and 60 to 70 full-time employees. It is the branches which deliver Red Cross services to the public, and it is the branches which raise most of the money outside of government funding.

Branches are divided into divisions, which follow provincial boundaries in the main, and the divisions come together to form the national Red Cross Society. The only corporation is the Canadian Red Cross Society. There are no separately incorporated divisions or branches. It is this fact which constitutes the problem in Bill S-3.

The active volunteers under the various service programs, and contributors and those who serve as volunteers in the administration of branch, divisional and national programs—whether contributing money or services—like to think of themselves as being members of the Red Cross Society.

There was a problem in Bill S-3 with respect to the basic voting structure, which involves indirect voting. It has been estimated that the Red Cross Society has as many as 80,000 of these persons described as members, and the society feels that if it were to be charged with the responsibility of notifying all these persons, providing accommodation and paying all the expenses involved, it might cost them as much as $300,000. They felt that if this voting could be left unchanged they could spend the $300,000 much more usefully in pursuing their objectives.

To understand what is meant by indirect voting and indirect structures for voting purposes, let me explain that the members of each branch elect the members of the branch executive. Then, depending on the provincial divisions, all the branches—or some of them in rotation—are represented on the divisional membership by their executives, and by whoever is delegated from the branch to go to the divisional meetings. Then the divisional members of each division elect representatives to the central council, and these constitute the majority of the central council.

● (1420)

The meeting of the central council, so constituted, is the annual meeting of the Canadian Red Cross Society. The membership of the central council is 75 persons. The branches and divisions know that they have no legal status or entity, but that does not prevent them from meeting and serving the public, nor from electing the central council. The corporation records show only the members of the central council as members of the corporation.

Provision has been made to permit so-called “indirect voting” by adding subclause (3) to clause 109 of the bill, whether or not the members are divided into classes of voting and non-voting members. Bill S-3 did not provide for such a method of voting, and the manner in which the Red Cross Society's branches and divisions act and vote to constitute the central council, plus the fact that the persons making up such branches and divisions describe themselves as members, perhaps loosely, seemed to raise a problem with clause 109. If the persons in these two categories are to be classed as members, the cost of notices and other expenses would be prohibitive, and would serve no useful purpose, as the system of election to the corporate entity—that is, the central council, which is the governing body of the Red Cross Society—is well established and supported, and it functions satisfactorily.

In those circumstances, the amendment made to clause 109 of Bill S-3 provides for this indirect method of voting, and in its term represents the indirect method of voting heretofore practised in the operations of the Canadian Red Cross Society. In view of the importance of this organization it was decided that this method be established, not only as a matter of desirability but of necessity, in order to eliminate expense and make more money available for the objectives of the organization.

The departmental officers who appeared before the committee agreed to accept the request of the Red Cross Society representatives who appeared before the committee. It was quite obvious to those officials from the department that the membership of the committee was going to provide for that kind of indirect voting, in any event.

The next item deals with meetings of members in Canada, and this involved amending clause 117 of the bill. I am referring to amendment number 38, and page 68 of the bill. What spurred action on this point was a feeling that the government of Canada should be consistent in its urging or encouraging foreign non-profit organizations to meet in Canada. As you know, there has been quite a discussion and a great deal of agitation on this subject. The newspapers have appeared to devote some space to criticizing our neighbour to the south because of the non-deductibility of convention expenses. To be consistent in respect of annual meetings, it was felt that there should be a specific provision in connection with meetings outside Canada. The provisions in the bill are not, in any sense, satisfactory in this respect, and would have made for considerable difficulty in respect of providing the necessary authority to hold a meeting outside Canada.

The next item deals with the question of disclosure of financial information. This caused quite a discussion, because there are charitable organizations or corporations, and there are membership corporations. Charitable organizations or corporations are required to file certain information with the income tax department, indicating the source of their funds and the expenditure of those funds, and they are also required to satisfy the income tax department that at least 90 per cent of the income received in this fashion has been expended for charitable purposes, in order to be tax exempt.

The department proposed an amendment requiring charitable organizations which receive grants from the government or government agencies, or which solicit funds for charitable purposes, to observe the financial disclosure requirements so that the public knows about the receipt and disbursement of such money. This amendment appears in clause 142 of the bill, and it proposes that any membership corporation which receives grants from the government or an agency of government, or which solicits funds within certain periods of time, shall disclose the receipt and expenditure of those moneys.

This might, of necessity, include boards of trade and chambers of commerce. Witnesses from these organizations appeared before us, and were very much concerned about clause 171 of the bill, under which provision was made for the right of dissent by a member. Attached to that was the provision that a member who dissented against management would be entitled to have an evaluation of the assets and would be entitled to demand his distributive share.

● (1430)

The boards of trade and chambers of commerce were opposed to this on the basis of what these organizations do. They provide services, and the member pays for those services. He receives the services, and therefore his right of dissent should not extend so far as to enable him to say, as I described it in committee, "I don't like the decision you have made on this point and I want to take my marbles and go back home". The proposed amendment is that the right to dissent in this fashion, with the consequences of such dissension, does not attach to the operations of boards of trade and chambers of commerce. In other words, they are exempt.

Hospitals are charitable organizations. As a matter of fact, I am identified, as president, with a hospital which falls into that category. The hospital can receive donations. It can receive public moneys and give receipts therefor, which entitles the donors to deduct such contribution for tax purposes.

It was felt that such hospitals, as charitable organizations, should have the obligation to make disclosure of the receipt and expenditure of those moneys because of the element of tax exemption, and that element of tax exemption brings into play the public interest. Tax is not being levied in relation to certain payments that are made to certain organizations in those circumstances. Therefore, we have another category of charitable corporation, namely, hospitals. Charitable foundations also come within this category.

It is true that I have considerably shortened my explanation of these charitable foundations, and in summary I will say that the right to dissent is not taken away from a member. A member may dissent from a decision of management. When the bill was presented in the Senate and dealt with in committee it included the right to demand valuation for assets and to take a distributive share of those assets and retire from the organization. That right does not attach to members of boards of trade and chambers of commerce.

The right to dissent which has not been disturbed is the right to dissent or object in the ordinary way to decisions of the management of a board of trade or a chamber of commerce, or the right to dissent in relation to decisions by management in reference to anything that is dealt with in the operations and the functioning of a non-profit organization.

I hope that I have made the distinction clear. The peculiar type of dissent which entitles one to demand one's marbles and go home is not effective with regard to boards of trade and chambers of commerce. That item in the bill therefore disappears. But the basic element of a member's disagreeing with a decision of management still exists, and whatever remedies that a minority member can invoke would be available to him in questioning those decisions.

I should point out also that there is provision in the bill under which, in the event of the liquidation or dissolution of a non-profit corporation—if it is a charitable organization and there is liquidation or dissolution, and there is provision in the charter or articles of incorporation providing for such liquidation or dissolution—the distribution of assets may be made to like charities which heretofore have enjoyed the benefits while such a charitable organization was operating. The bill goes on to provide that if there is no such provision, an application to the courts may be made by a liquidator, if there is one, or otherwise by resolution of the members. In law this is called the application of the cypres doctrine. That is, the court, with the assistance of the liquidator or others who are concerned with the distribution of the assets, will determine what are like charities to those that were served during the operation of the organization, and those are the ones which will benefit from the distribution of assets.

The bill provides in relation to membership companies, where there is liquidation or dissolution, unless there are specific provisions in the articles of association or in the charter provisions in the articles of association or in the charter providing for that situation, and how the distribution shall be made, that the distribution shall be determined pro rata to the membership of the organization existing at that time.

Those are the principal and important purposes that I have selected from the bill and developed today. I should point out that there is the requirement that the government, as stated in committee by the departmental officers, is anxious to tidy or adjust the situation in relation to non-profit corporations, because up to the present time we have non-profit corporations which are incorporated by special act. We have a general purpose act called the Boards of Trade Act, and groups of people can form a board of trade or a chamber of commerce under the provisions of that act.

Under the Canada Business Corporations Act, non-profit corporations are provided for in Part II, and the administrative purposes are in Part I. We were told in committee by the departmental officers that the correlation of Part I and Part II is not clear and that this has always presented confusion and difficulty. Therefore, there is provision in this bill under which existing non-profit organizations have five years within which they may continue under Bill S-2 after it becomes law. If they do not continue within that length of time, then they are dissolved.

That may seem to be a hardship, but we were told that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, when it is sending out notices to non-profit corporations each year, attaches a statement which indicates that the charter is dissolved under the Non-Profit Corporations Act of such and such a date. This procedure is repeated each year. In order to appear to be less harsh, even if a dissolution has taken place by failure of the corporation to act to continue, there is a provision in the bill—and therefore it will be in the Act—under which the charter may be revived. That is the last grasp which is made available, and if that does not work, that is the end of the road for the particular non-profit corporation.

Those are the items I intended to speak to you today about, and I feel that they can be regarded as being of major importance.

The representations made to us by the departmental officers were based on the state of the law which had its foundations many years ago. The first chamber of commerce incorporated in Canada was in Halifax, almost 100 years ago. The origins of the Toronto Board of Trade, which was incorporated by a special act, must go back to about 1870 or 1875. Therefore, in the opinion of the department, it is about time that all these procedures and administrative practices be brought up to date and put into one statute without working any hardship on the people who may be affected.

In committee we felt that the procedures amended at our suggestion were fair and adequate. We also felt that the procedures for continuing a corporation after a dissent interval were proper in the circumstances.

It seems to me that we desire one law of general application, and this will be the legislation which results from the enactment of Bill S-2 into law. This is all I have to tell you today. I can tell you that I have not omitted to deal with anything that seemed to me to be of material consideration.

Senator Beaubien: Honourable senators, Senator Hayden's lucid explanation of a difficult and intricate bill, and his ability to go through the whole bill without one note, emphasizes the fact that we are exceedingly fortunate to have him as Chairman of our Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I listened carefully to Senator Hayden's explanation. However, so that I can be absolutely sure, I will ask him if he might make a further comment or two on this point. Am I correct in my understanding that at the end of five years all non-profit corporations incorporated by other acts of Parliament will be brought under this legislation? I am particularly concerned because some of my colleagues in the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada have raised questions as to how this is going to affect their corporate status.

Senator Hayden: My answer is that it may. The reason I say "it may" is this: a non-profit corporation incorporated by special act may apply to the Governor in Council to be continued under that special act, but the catch in that is the statement made to us in committee that such an effort would not secure the sympathy or support of the department, perhaps not even the government.

It was pointed out in committee, however, that such a corporation seeking the consent of the Governor in Council to carry on under its original act would have to be completely satisfied with the terms of its special act. If it wanted any amendments, it would have to come under this bill when it becomes law. It was indicated pretty clearly to us that the co-operation necessary to assist in really all accounts, dividing some of the force and effect of this bill, might not be generously given.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I wish to ask Senator Hayden a question about his explanation, and I apologize for doing so because he explained the amendments very clearly. While members of boards of trade and chambers of commerce would not be entitled to their distributive share of the assets on dissent, what about the situation in respect of other charitable organizations, for example, a hospital? I imagine a hospital is a case of a corporation that has not got membership. I am not clear in my own mind—and I really forget the discussion in the committee on that point—but I would take it that a member of a hospital organization would not, under this bill, have the right to dissent and to demand his distributive share of the assets.

● (1450)

Senator Hayden: I should point out to my friend that the right to dissent in the bill, under clause 171, is limited to membership non-profit corporations.

Senator Flynn: You could add also that there are no hospitals incorporated under the federal law.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): That was mentioned in committee as well.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Hayden moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1978-79

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Molgat for second reading of Bill C-31, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1979.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, we are dealing with this bill under somewhat unusual circumstances. Normally we expect a report on the main estimates from the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which we do not have before us, for the very good reason that the committee is still considering the main estimates, as are committees in the other place. We also do not have before us the usual rather full explanation of the intention of this bill, and as a result there seemed to be some confusion when the bill was introduced on second reading last night. This, I think, is due to the wording of the bill.

The question was asked, of course, whether the total requirements included the additional twelfths asked under certain subsections of clause 2. The answer is a rather interesting one. It was not given last night, but it is roughly this. The total expenditure requirements to be authorized by this bill amount to $5,657,022,492, and the general statement is that interim supply—because this is an interim supply bill—asks for three-twelfths of all estimates and other proportions of other estimates. Even adding on the other proportions, which gives us the total of $5,657,022,492, this is far from being three-twelfths of the main estimates, which are $48 billion. The explanation of that is that the three-twelfths deals only with the non-statutory items, which in the total budget amount to $20 billion, which is 42.6 per cent of the total budget, so that we are dealing with a request for three-twelfths plus some additional twelfths in specific cases of the $20 billion, which is 42 per cent of the total budget.

We are dealing now with the main estimates, because the bill before us makes a very definite reference to the main estimates in the preamble:

Whereas it appears by message from His Excellency, the Right Honourable Jules Léger, Governor General of Canada, and the estimates accompanying the said message.

We therefore normally deal with the main estimates at the time we deal with the first interim supply bill. For that reason I have a few comments that may be of interest to honourable senators on these main estimates.

These estimates are put before us now in a form that is not traditional, and as far as I can see the purpose is, of course, to support the intended policy of the government stated prior to the 1976-77 estimates, that the government would undertake immediately a restraint program, and the objects of that restraint program were suggested as being a policy that the increase in government expenditure from year to year would not exceed the increase in the GNP. This was a policy that had been urged on the government for a good many years by the Senate Finance Committee, in fact going back to the days, I recall, when the late Senator Leonard was the chairman.

For many years the government paid no attention to that. The increases, as honourable senators will remember, leading up to the present, ran in this order: in 1973-74 the total estimates were $24 billion; in the next year $31 billion; in the next year $37 billion; in the next year $41 billion; in the next year $44 billion; and this year $48 billion. The general policy of restricting increases in federal spending intentions to the increase in the GNP has been more or less adhered to in the last two years. It has taken considerable manipulation of the figures, of course, to reach this conclusion and put it down in terms of a bill such as the one before us.

[Senator Hayden.]

When I spoke on Appropriation Bill No. 4 for the last fiscal year, I said I was inclined to disagree with the statement in the report of the committee that the year-to-year figures were comparable. I am still of the same view, that they are not comparable, because there has been a decision, perhaps a wise one, to make certain bookkeeping, if you like, adjustments in the figures to reach this total.

In introducing the bill, the sponsor (Senator Molgat) referred to the breakdown between budgetary and non-budgetary, which he gave as $48.2 billion, consisting of budgetary of $46.4 billion and net non-budgetary expenses of $1,774 million. In the past it has not been usual to use that word "net," and it is part of the manipulation of the figures that I spoke of, because what has happened in this case—there are other cases, but this illustrates the point I am making—is that non-budgetary spending intentions are clearly shown as $1,774 million, as stated by the sponsor of the bill. The fact of the matter is that the actual spending on that item will be $2.256 billion. In other words, the actual spending, the money the government will spend in that non-budgetary item, will be $482 million more.

How do they arrive at that figure? The key is the word "net," because there will be loan repayments during the year of that $482 million. These are netted out, so we have a transfer from the revenue side to the spending side in an attempt to justify this total increased figure. This, of course, in accounting terms, is absurd. I say this because you could net out everything. The government could net out all its revenues against its expenditures, item after item, and then they could come before us and say, "The only thing we are really spending is the deficit"—as large as it is. The same principle could be applied, and the government could come back and say to us, "We are spending nothing but the deficit."

There are other instances of the same kind throughout. I am only mentioning these to show that the figures are not comparable, and that the 9.2 per cent increase in expenditures may not be, and almost certainly is not, realistic. To take one item as an example, the Canada Council expenditures this year will show as being $20 million less than they would have been if the Canada Council had not sold off certain assets. Obviously we could do this with almost every department of government. We could sell off some assets and net them against the spending intentions, and wind up with a budget half this size.

Another example is the Export Development Corporation in the amount of $365 million. The Export Development Corporation was previously funded by government so the funding would show in the estimates we have before us as a non-budgetary spending intention on the part of the government. The Export Development Corporation was persuaded, I presume, to borrow money from the private sector so it is not now borrowing from the government. The same principle applies. You could do that with every single non-budgetary expenditure which is a loan, investment or advance. The CMHC is in much the same category. It decided recently to sell off many of its loans for a total, I think, of about $473 million. This again will not show in the expenditure accounts in this area that I am discussing.

I point that out, honourable senators, because I think it is important that we are aware that the silver lining indicated in the clouds by the estimates and the government statements about the estimates is a little grey; it is not all that silver. Personally, I regret the fact that the government is using these devices. Whatever expenditures we are going to be required to make this year, they should not be offset by loss of revenue or, as in another outstanding case, by transfers to the provinces, but I will not go into that at the moment. They should not be offset by losses on the revenue side. This makes no sense in any system of accounting that I have ever heard of. Nor is there much sense in selling off assets to net them against expenditures, because if you are going to spend money then you are going to spend it, and obviously it has to come from somewhere. If it is coming from normal revenue sources, that is fine, but if you are selling off assets or transferring obligations from the federal government to the provinces, or transferring obligations from the public to the private sector, you should not claim that that money is not part of, and should not be taken into consideration in estimating, the total expenditures.

It is the very principle of net voting which the government itself in a recent report has condemned—this type of presentation of the figures which is not full disclosure. Yet the government is carrying it on here. It is prohibited now all over except in a few isolated cases which are being phased out, and it is prohibited in respect of payments from the private sector, so it is about time it was prohibited in terms of interdepartmental, inter-crown agency or inter-consolidated revenue fund payments.

Honourable senators will be interested to know where the increases are. An almost 10 per cent increase to $44 billion is a substantial amount of money. I should say again that the $48 billion figure for 1978-79 in itself cannot be taken just as it stands. The government has—and I commend them for it—added an amount of $1.550 billion as an estimate of what may be required in supplementary estimates. That is normal. But then for the first time, certainly in the last two or three years, the government estimates the normal lapse. There has always been a lapse ever since there has been a budget—that is, authorizations that cannot be carried forward, and departments that slipped up and did not spend all the money they were authorized to spend. For the first time in recent years we are taking this into account in the statement of government spending intentions, and in this case this is $1 billion. I have no doubt it will be reached, but again this illustrates these matters I am raising and makes these figures absolutely non-comparative beyond two years ago. I hope that Statistics Canada will in due course revise the total tables of federal government spending to reflect these matters that I am raising at this particular time.

The main increases this year show 48 per cent of budgetary increases in what is called the functional classification as health and welfare expenditures. Honourable senators are aware that government breaks down some of its expenditures into 11 main functional categories. One of these is Health and Welfare, which accounts for 48 per cent of the total increase from year to year.

The increase in the public debt accounts for 20 per cent of the total increase. Perhaps this is a warning to government that continued large scale deficit financing is not postponing the evil day. The evil day is here, and each year, if we add to that public debt, we add to the next year's expenditures. Educational assistance above the secondary school level accounts for another 7 per cent. Those are the major items there.

On the objects—that is the classification of expenditures by objects—honourable senators will be interested to know that crown corporation deficits account for $737 million in the year's budget. The increased expenditures on the Unemployment Insurance Commission account will add $387 million. That is due, of course, to the decision of the government some years ago to make up the deficit in the fund over the actuarial basis at which it was sustained for many years. The cost of that fund this year will be approximately $3 billion.

Of that horrendous total of $737 million of deficits of crown corporations, honourable senators will be interested to know that the CBC deficit alone amounts to $522 million. Elsewhere in the estimates we find we are advancing further money to the CBC. The situation today is that the government is lending the CBC money to pay interest on the money the CBC owes to the government. It seems to me it is time for something to be done about that situation. It can be corrected, even if it means wiping out those debts that are obviously non-recoverable. We should stop carrying them as assets on the books of Canada. They are not assets; they are liabilities.

As I said at the outset, we are not at this time approving the main estimates or the government's spending intentions for the year. That, presumably, will be the function of the Senate when it receives the report of the National Finance Committee on its examination of the main estimates which, I presume, will take place after the election!

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Molgat speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, if I may, I shall go back to the debate of yesterday to answer a specific question asked by Senator Buckwold. I must admit that I did not reply accurately when I said the figures were not available, because, in fact, they are available. The answer is that they are in the book. Had I opened the book at the right page, I would have been able to reply at that time.

In this respect, I refer to the extra book tabled by the minister at the time of the tabling of the estimates and entitled Federal Expenditure Plan: How your tax dollar is spent, 1978-79. I commend that book to members of the Senate and to the Canadian public. It is a very informative book.

[Senator Grosart.]

At page 69 we find the information Senator Buckwold was asking for—that is, the expenditures of the various levels of government expressed as percentages of the gross national product. There are tables on page 68 outlining the expenditures for the federal government, the provincial governments, and local governments, and if we turn to page 69 we find that, including transfer payments to persons—and these are sizeable amounts—the share of the GNP taken by the federal government increased from 13.3 per cent in 1967 to 15.7 per cent in 1976. If you exclude the transfers to persons, the federal share was 8.9 per cent in 1967, and 9.7 per cent in 1976. Certainly this is a more moderate increase than that indicated by some people when they talk of federal government expenditures.

The provincial share of the GNP similarly increased in that period, but to a much greater extent. It went from 7.9 per cent in 1967 to 11.6 per cent in 1976. This represents a much larger percentage of increase and, obviously a much larger number of points.

The local governments' increase was smaller than this. Their share went from 8 per cent in 1967 to 8.1 per cent in 1976.

I should now like to turn to Senator Grosart's comments. As he indicated, we have not completed the study of the estimates in committee. We will have that discussion in the next few weeks. I agree with him when he says that that time has not yet come, but it will, and the comments he has made today will be considered then. When the report of the committee is presented there will be an opportunity for a complete discussion of the estimates. It is for that reason I rise now to close the debate, and not because I think Senator Grosart's comments should not be answered.

When Senator Grosart speaks of confusion in the bill, I cannot agree with him. I have read it carefully, and it seems to be fairly straightforward. First of all, clause 2 lists the full amount to be appropriated, and the full amount is $5,657,022,492. That is stated in the opening words of clause 2, which then proceeds to enumerate the amounts which make it up in paragraphs (a) to (h). It is clear that all those are in addition; that they are not separate items. It is three-twelfths of the total to begin with, and then all of the other amounts in addition. However, if it is possible to make it clearer, I think we should do so. Again, this is something we can take up when we have a full discussion of the estimates. I have mentioned this to the departmental officials. If there is a way of making it clearer, I am sure it will be done and should be done.

Senator Grosart mentioned the presentation of the estimates. I shall not go into it right now, but it seems to me that when we were discussing this in committee, officials from Treasury Board were more than co-operative in giving us information and assisting us in any way that they could. I commend them for that, but I agree with Senator Grosart when he says that the finances of the country should be explained as clearly as possible to the people who pay the taxes.

There has been an attempt to do that. The Treasury Board has gone out of its way to accommodate us whenever it could.

One example that stands out in my mind is that the Treasury Board explained very clearly in committee the carryover of $1 billion, or, shall I say, the amount left unspent at the end of the year.

● (1520)

Senator Grosart, in his comments this afternoon, seemed to intimate that this was miscalculation—a failure on the part of the departments to do their job, or a miscalculation on the part of Treasury Board, or somebody. It was explained very carefully in committee that if you say to a department, “You are allowed to spend $1 million between March 31 this year and the end of the next fiscal period, and that is all you can spend; you cannot go over that amount,” then quite obviously they have to hedge. They have to make sure that they do not have an overrun, and in order to guarantee no overrun they will, in some cases, have an underrun. It is not as if one is working on a plus or minus; one is working on an absolute top limit. One cannot go above that amount. A prudent manager, if that is his absolute top limit, must protect himself by ensuring that he is below it.

Senator Flynn: With supplementary estimates, you can do whatever you want.

Senator Grosart: What you are saying is not so.

Senator Molgat: Inevitably, one will end up by having some underruns. One cannot have that absolute top limit without having some underruns. It seems to me that that was explained in committee. Therefore, the $1 billion referred to is not due to sloppy business, and not due to mismanagement, but the rules that we ourselves impose on departments.

I could go on, honourable senators. There are a number of other points which Senator Grosart wanted to put on the record—and legitimately so. Having sat as a member of the opposition in another place, I quite understand that technique; but, on the other hand—

Senator Flynn: It is a necessity.

Senator Langlois: A necessary technique.

Senator Molgat: That may be so. But having said that, when we reach the committee stage, we can obtain a much fuller explanation of some of the other points, and have an extended debate when the report of the committee is presented.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, because I have been misunderstood, I am sure I am entitled to say that I did not use the word “sloppy” or any word of similar connotation in respect to lapsing funds. I made no criticism of them whatsoever. The honourable senator is obviously not familiar with the situation, if he gained that impression. It was not criticism. I merely drew attention to the fact that this lapsing anticipation is now being carried into the estimates. I did not go beyond that. I am sure that had the honourable senator been more familiar with the estimates, he would not have taken that meaning from what I said.

Secondly, the suggestion that I rose to respond to some sort of technique because I happen to be in opposition is, I am sure, due to a misunderstanding. I have always taken the attitude in committee, and in the chamber, that it is the function of the Senate to try to improve a bill, regardless of which side of the chamber the suggestion for improvement comes from. I do not think a debate such as this is helped by a suggestion that the main reason for a senator's rising to make suggestions for improving a bill is that he happens to be in opposition.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I quite understand that my honourable colleague might not like some of the terms I have used. May I ask him to explain why he started off his comments by referring to “confusion” in the bill? I see no confusion in the bill. The only possible confusion—

Senator Flynn: That is your problem.

Senator Molgat: —is the confusion in my honourable friend's mind. Can he tell us what confusion there is in the bill, which, to me, is very clear?

Senator Grosart: I presume the honourable senator is again asking me a question, and again I have to question his hearing. I said there was confusion in the debate last night, and it might have arisen from the wording of the bill. That is very different from saying there is confusion in the bill. I referred to the fact that the word “additional” is not written into the subclauses once, but I am sure that when that is brought to the attention of the officials it will be. These twelfths are in addition; so that when we are asked by subclause 2(b), for example, to vote eight-twelfths of the total of the amounts of the several items in the said estimates set forth in schedule A, it is not eight-twelfths but eleven-twelfths that will be voted. That is an important consideration that the Senate will want to look at—that in this case we are voting eleven-twelfths of supply.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, if I may rise on a point of order, we are voting three-twelfths of the total. Under paragraphs (b) to (h) very clearly further twelfths—

Senator Grosart: It does not say further twelfths.

Senator Molgat: That is clearly identified to anyone who can read English.

Senator Grosart: The honourable senator says it is clearly identified. The fact of the matter is that when he was asked the question last night he did not have the faintest idea.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Molgat moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT ELECTION EXPENSES ACT
NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Lucier for the second reading of Bill C-33, to amend the Canada Elections Act, the Election Expenses Act and the Northwest Territories Act in respect of territorial elections.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Lucier for his explanation of the bill. The passage of this bill in the House of Commons probably set a world record in that place, because there was agreement on the part of all parties and it went through second reading to committee and was given third reading in less than ten minutes. The total record of the Committee of the Whole in the House of Commons is three lines. As I say, it is a remarkable bill.

On the other hand, for a number of reasons, I have some doubts as to whether it would be appropriate for the Senate to pass it with such expedition. In the first place, in the Senate we are all conscious of the fact that one of the important reforms of the Senate in the last few years is in the area of this bill, which refers to the Yukon and to the Northwest Territories. The main purpose of the bill is to add one more step to the long, slow, but steady march of those two very important parts of Canada towards responsible government at much the same level as those of the ten provinces.

I say it is a long and slow march for many reasons. At the present time both the Yukon and the Northwest Territories have their own legislative councils. Indeed, it was just two years ago that we were able to join with the Northwest Territories in celebrating the first sitting of a wholly elected legislature in the Northwest Territories. It is a matter of pride to all senators that in the last few years we have added to our numbers two very distinguished senators, one representing the Yukon and the other representing the Northwest Territories. I refer to the Honourable Paul Lucier and to the Honourable Willie Adams.

The subject matter of the bill deals with a part of Canada which too often tends to be forgotten. As a matter of fact, an indication of what can happen is that in the Canada Year Book for the current year, which has just been published and has just been delivered, in the listing of honourable senators in this chamber, neither of those distinguished senators is named. It is true that the date given is as of January 1, 1977, but at that time we already had here one senator from that part of Canada and the other was on the way.

Something we often forget is that that part of our country comprises 40 per cent of the whole area of Canada. If you put the Yukon and the Northwest Territories together you are talking about 40 per cent of the total area of Canada.

It is the traditional role of the Senate, a role I am afraid often neglected, to concern itself particularly with the problems of minority areas and minority peoples in Canada. Although we are dealing here with, as I have said, 40 per cent of the land area of Canada, we are concerned with perhaps not more than 65,000 Canadians; but they are becoming increasingly important in the cultural, the economic and the social development of our country.

The long march to a level of self-government that would be satisfactory to the people of both the Yukon and Northwest Territories has been slow. There has been a degree of self-government given to these territories, but the main exclusion is the control of their own resources. I am quite sure that particularly those senators who represent the newer provinces of Canada in the development of our Confederation will realize the importance of that exclusion. The reason given in official documents is that these resources are widely scattered and that the population is thin. One doubts that that is the real reason. The real reason is that these resources are of tremendous value to Canada and we are still, in my view, at a level of the old mercantile thinking: that we should be careful about giving people control over tremendous resources. That, of course, was the basis of the whole mercantile theory in history; it is why colonies in the south revolted and why our newer provinces in Canada, particularly in the west, insisted that the essence for self-government was control of their own resources. But we still deny this to the people of these two parts of Canada.

I am not saying that this cannot be rationalized. There is a degree to which it can. Moreover, there is a considerable level of lack of control of their own finances. Perhaps that remains understandable so long as it is necessary for the federal government to support their financial position by direct contributions.

The history of the development of this long, slow march towards self-government is interesting. The Yukon won its right to representation in the House of Commons in, I think, 1902. The Northwest Territories was considerably later, first of all in 1953 for one member and in 1977 for a second member. It is interesting, I believe, that the first bill that was introduced to provide for an additional senator from the Northwest Territories was introduced in the Senate, and honourable senators will not mind my saying it was introduced by the official opposition.

Senator Flynn: It was introduced by you.

Senator Grosart: The bill itself is simple, as has been explained. I mentioned that it is one more step in the long march toward self-government. It provides, particularly, that the Legislative Council of the Northwest Territories will now have control of its own elections. The bill also refers to the Yukon situation, which is quite different, because in the Yukon that authority has been in place for a number of years. The bill purports to amend both the Canada Elections Act and the Election Expenses Act, as well as the Northwest Territories Act, to provide for the utilization of the services of the Chief Electoral Officer in connection with elections for the Council of the Northwest Territories and the Council of the Yukon Territory. It is, however, another small step toward the objective of self-determination in both these important areas of Canada, because in the case of the Northwest Territories the people of the Territories asked for it. They wanted to control their own machinery, and when this bill is passed, they will have that right. As I say, it is a simple bill. It does not involve very much, but it is one more historical step toward the objective of full provincial self-government in these important parts of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Perrault moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSFER OF OFFENDERS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Carl Goldenberg moved the second reading of Bill C-21, to implement treaties on the transfer of persons found guilty of criminal offences.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to have the opportunity of moving second reading of Bill C-21 because in my opinion it is essentially a humanitarian measure. I am confident that it will commend itself to all honourable senators, as it commended itself, like the bill on which Senator Grosart just spoke, to the members of all parties in the other place, where the spokesmen for both the official opposition and the New Democratic Party urged its speedy passage.

The bill is designed to enable Canada to implement treaties which have been entered into with the United States and with Mexico allowing persons under sentence for criminal offences to be returned to the country of which they are citizens to serve their sentences. It applies to persons under sentence of imprisonment or who are on parole or probation. With respect to parole, it will be of some interest to honourable senators to note that the bill gives effect to a specific recommendation of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs in its report on parole in 1973, which reads as follows:

Canadian governments should consider the possibility of agreements with foreign governments on exchange of parole supervision.

This bill, I repeat, gives effect to what the committee recommended almost five years ago.

Honourable senators, I wish to emphasize at the outset that this bill is not concerned with extradition or expulsion of foreign nationals. An important condition set out in the treaties is that no transfer may take place except with the consent of the person under sentence, of the authorities of the country in which he is held, and of the authorities of the country to which he wishes to return. In no circumstances will a person be transferred without his consent. I should point out further that the bill does not provide for an exchange of prisoners, for example, on a one-to-one basis. It is a transfer regardless of the difference in numbers affected in each country.

The provisions of the bill, while they deal with the transfer from Canada of a foreign offender who desires to return to his own country, deal in the main with the transfer to Canada of a person convicted in another country. The intent is that the offender on his return shall be treated in the same fashion as if he had been convicted and sentenced in a Canadian court. In serving the sentence in Canada the offender will be credited toward completion of his sentence with all time that stood to his credit in the foreign state at the time of his transfer. Moreover, he will also be eligible to earn remission at the same rate as a Canadian offender newly committed upon a sentence of imprisonment.

Implementing provisions of the treaties, the bill provides that a conviction and sentence abroad will not be subject to review in the Canadian courts when a Canadian offender is returned to this country. The United States and Mexico are, of course, similarly committed with respect to a Canadian conviction or sentence when one of their nationals is returned to them under the treaty.

The bill has been developed after consultation with the provinces, because it is they who will be charged with responsibility for the custody of a Canadian who is returned under the treaty and whose sentence was for less than two years. That falls within provincial jurisdiction. Accordingly, in these cases the consent of the provincial authorities is required before the federal authorities can agree to a transfer.

The bill seeks to deal with the difficult problem of establishing the length of time that a person returned to Canada while under incarceration must serve before parole is granted. In ordinary cases the National Parole Board will set an eligibility date, which is, as far as possible, the date at which the person would have had been eligible if the conviction and sentence had taken place in Canada.

This is not, however, a practical rule where a Canadian has been convicted of murder abroad. In Canada, as honourable senators know, a conviction of first degree murder renders the offender ineligible for parole for 25 years. In the case of second degree murder, the period of ineligibility is from 10 to 25 years, depending upon the decision of the court after ascertaining the views of the jurors. This is subject to the further complication that a person convicted of murder in Canada may apply to a judge after 15 years for a reduction in the period during which he is ineligible for parole when he was sentenced.

It will be at once apparent that these complexities of Canadian law cannot be made applicable without modification to foreign sentences of life imprisonment imposed for the offence of murder. In the result, a compromise has been reached in the bill whereby the Canadian offender is, in these circumstances, eligible for parole after ten years. However, the bill provides, by way of exception, that if the documents furnished by the foreign state show that the murder should be treated as first degree murder, the person transferred is not eligible for parole until 15 years from the date of his conviction. It does not mean that he will automatically get parole, but he will not be eligible for 15 years.

With respect to day parole and temporary absence, the bill, in clause 10, imposes the same restrictions as are found in the Criminal Code.

Let me say a word about persons who return to Canada on parole or probation. Those on parole will be subject to the jurisdiction of the National Parole Board and will have to abide by the conditions imposed by the board. They will be subject to the same supervision as inmates paroled from Canadian institutions, and if the National Parole Board finds it necessary to revoke their parole they may be re-imprisoned, but, of course, in a Canadian institution, in the same way as if the original offence had taken place in Canada.

Those on probation will be bound to abide by the conditions of the probation order imposed in the foreign country, although a Canadian court will have power to change those conditions on application from the person involved or from a representative of the Crown. A breach of the conditions of probation will constitute a further offence, but for obvious reasons will not attract a liability to be sentenced for the offence committed abroad.

The bill makes special provision for juveniles, so that provincial authorities will be able to deal with them by placing them in institutions suitable for their age. A safeguard has been included to ensure that the transfer to a juvenile institution will not result in holding a youthful offender longer than he would be required to serve under his original sentence.

That is a broad summary of the bill. Honourable senators will perhaps be interested in the number of persons who may now be affected by the measure. I am advised that definite figures are not available, since we have no precise information about the length of time that some of the Canadians in the United States must serve on their sentences. This is important, because a person undergoing imprisonment is not eligible for transfer unless at the time of his application at least six months remain to be served.

I have, however, been furnished with an estimate that of the Canadians imprisoned in the United States approximately one-third have such a short period of time left to serve that they will not come within the conditions prescribed by the treaty. With this caveat, I am told that the latest returns from the United States show that there are 126 Canadians in federal institutions and 92 in state institutions. Canadians in Mexico who are under sentence total eight. We have knowledge of only one Mexican serving a sentence in Canada, but there are 229 Americans reported as being held in provincial institutions and 172 in penitentiaries in Canada.

I might say that the figures I have just given to you are more recent than those that were available during the debate in the other place. The figures show that there now are a fair number of Canadians who may benefit from the treaties that have been negotiated. In the long run, however, it will not be only Canadians in the United States and in Mexico who may benefit. The legislation is drafted so that it can apply to similar treaties that may be entered into with other countries, and I am informed that preliminary negotiations have already begun officially with certain European countries.

Honourable senators, it has been said that incarceration in a foreign land increases the pain of imprisonment far in excess of the punishment intended by the courts which imposed sentence. The bill before us gives recognition to this painful fact. I believe it deserves the support of all of us.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I rise for but a few moments to support the speech made by Senator Goldenberg, and perhaps to bring to his attention a few matters that I do not quite understand.

As he said, this bill has to be passed before the treaty can be ratified, so it would be beside the point to say whether or not the treaty should have been made in the first place. We have it, and to ratify it we must pass the legislation, so I say let us pass it and get on with it. Senator Goldenberg fully explained the purport of the legislation, so there is no need for me to go over it again.

I was especially impressed with the fact that all concerned must agree. The person convicted in a foreign land must make an application to be transferred to Canada; the foreign government must agree; the Canadian government must agree, and the province must agree if he is to be imprisoned in a provincial institution.

One provision in the bill that struck me is that if a person has been sentenced to more than two years he must serve his remaining time in a federal penitentiary in Canada. It seems to me that in the event a returned convict has less than a year to run on his sentence, he should be able to serve that in a provincial institution.

I am also wondering how the mechanics of this will work, given the various state jurisdictions in the United States. Will all such transfers be channelled through the Canadian embassy, or some other such federal institution, in Washington?

There was some criticism in the other place about the fact that a Canadian convicted in a foreign country might not have enjoyed some of the safeguards which exist in Canada in terms of his prosecution, such as the safeguards built into our laws on evidence, and so forth. It may even be that in some foreign countries he would not be entitled to counsel.

Mention was also made of the fact that such individuals could have been subject to a considerable period of time in custody before coming to trial, or even before being charged. Perhaps the sponsor of the bill could inform us as to whether there is a substantial number of people in that category.

In his remarks on closing the debate on the motion for second reading, I would ask the sponsor of the bill to direct his attention to clauses 14 and 18. Specifically, in the event that a Canadian national imprisoned in Mexico is returned to Canada to serve his sentence, does the foreign jurisdiction retain any authority over that individual? Would the foreign jurisdiction be able to revoke that individual's parole, for example, or issue a pardon? From reading of those two clauses, it is my impression that the foreign jurisdiction would retain some authority over the prisoner transferred to a Canadian institution.

The only other matter I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate relates to the figure given by the sponsor of the bill as to the number of Canadians who are imprisoned, for example, in the United States vis-à-vis the number of United States nationals imprisoned in Canada. In the event that a goodly number of Canadian nationals serving sentences in the various states of the United States apply for transfer to Canada, and are, in fact, accepted for transfer here, and, at the same time, very few of the United States nationals serving prison terms in Canada apply for transfer to United States, we could end up bearing the expense of maintaining the United States nationals and our own nationals. I am wondering whether there is any provision in this legislation for a sharing of expenses in that eventuality.

It is my view that by referring this bill to committee we shall learn nothing more than what its sponsor has already told us. That being so, I am quite satisfied that it not be referred to committee.

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might put a question to Senator Goldenberg.

He mentioned that a Canadian national imprisoned in a foreign country who is transferred to Canada would retain the privileges he had in the jurisdiction in which he was originally confined to jail. As I understand it, if he had been entitled to three days remission for each month of sentence, he would retain that privilege or advantage on being transferred to a Canadian institution.

In the event that an individual sentenced in Canada for a similar crime would be entitled to remission of more than three days for each month of sentence, would the remission awarded the transferred prisoner be governed by the regulations of the foreign jurisdiction or would he benefit from the greater number of days allowed under the Canadian regulations?

Senator Goldenberg: As far as remission is concerned, he would be governed by Canadian law. The transferred prisoner is to be treated as though he had been convicted and sentenced in Canada.

Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière): What happens in the event that the prisoner refuses the transfer?

Senator Goldenberg: A prisoner cannot be transferred against his will. The prisoner must apply for the transfer.

Dealing with the points raised by Senator Macdonald, specifically his point as to whether or not the returning state retains the right to pardon, I will read from Article IV, section 1 of the treaty with the United States, which says:

The Sending State shall, in addition, retain a power to pardon the Offender and the Receiving State shall, upon being advised of such pardon, release the Offender.

That confirms Senator Macdonald's impression.

Senator Macdonald also asked why an offender with one year or less to serve on his sentence should not be confined to a provincial institution.

This law endeavours to treat the persons affected as though they had been convicted and sentenced in a Canadian court, in which event they would be confined to a penitentiary. I think there is a further consideration, and that is that if they are brought back and confined in a provincial institution, the province in question would have to bear the cost, and I do not think that is something the provinces would be enthusiastic about.

I have nothing further to add, except to say that if there are any figures that Senator Macdonald wishes to have, I would be glad to try to get them for him.

Senator Macdonald: May I ask one further question with respect to clause 14 of the bill? In the event that the person transferred to Canada is granted parole by the National Parole Board in Canada, can the foreign jurisdiction revoke that parole?

Senator Goldenberg: I do not know if this answers Senator Macdonald's question entirely, but I should like to read to him a note that I have on clause 14 of the bill. It is headed "Counting Time on Revocation," and reads as follows:

The amendment to the Parole Act that enabled a person to count time spent on parole toward completion of a sentence when his parole was revoked was proclaimed effective October 15, 1977.

That, by the way, explains the date in that clause. It continues:

Clause 14 will enable Canadian offenders transferred to Canada, while on parole, to enjoy the same benefits of the revised legislation. The Canadian who was on parole in a foreign country, who was transferred to Canada on parole, and whose parole was later revoked may count his time on parole after October 14, 1977, up until the time he is transferred to Canada. In respect of time after transfer to Canada, he would be entitled to "street" time since clause 4 has equated his finding and sentence to those of a Canadian finding and sentence.

Senator Macdonald: A transferred prisoner granted parole by the foreign state comes under the jurisdiction of the National Parole Board on being transferred to Canada. I am wondering whether the foreign country still has sufficient jurisdiction to revoke that parole while that person is in Canada.

● (2040)

Senator Goldenberg: I will not say that I have a definite answer, but I believe that it does not retain that jurisdiction.

Senator Macdonald: On the matter of the actual mechanics of this thing, how would it operate? Would it be similar to our system? Here it would have to be done through the Minister of Justice, but who would approve the transfer in the United States?

Senator Goldenberg: Is Senator Macdonald asking who would approve a transfer requested by an offender?

Senator Macdonald: Yes, in the United States.

Senator Goldenberg: Somewhere in the treaty it is provided that each country designates an authority to deal with the application of the treaty.

Senator Beaubien: Senator Goldenberg, if a man commits armed robbery while out on parole and his parole is revoked because of that, would it make any difference?

Senator Goldenberg: Would it make any difference to what?

Senator Macdonald: Obviously, he would be charged with armed robbery again.

Senator Beaubien: He would?

Senator Goldenberg: Well, of course, he would be charged with the offence he has committed. I am glad that Senator Beaubien approves.

Senator Macdonald: Do you have any information concerning persons who are held for considerable periods of time in jail without being brought to trial, say, in Mexico? Long periods of time may elapse before they are brought to trial, or even before they are charged. Do you have any information on that?

Senator Goldenberg: I think Senator Macdonald and I have been reading the same newspapers recently. The definition of "offender" in clause 2 says:

"Canadian offender" means a Canadian citizen, within the meaning of the Citizenship Act, irrespective of age, who has been found guilty of an offence—

I would say that a Canadian who is held for a year or two without trial would not be covered.

Senator Macdonald: Thank you.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Goldenberg moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL UNITY

MAGAZINE ARTICLE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Forsey calling the attention of the Senate to a most mischievous article by June Callwood in the January number of L'actualité.—(Honourable Senator Langlois).

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, this inquiry has been on the order paper for some time. Senator Langlois has been holding it in his name in the event that other senators might wish to speak to it. Since no other senators wishes to do so, I suggest that this inquiry be considered as having been debated.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

THE SENATE

NUMBER OF VACANCIES—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Forsey calling the attention of the Senate to the large number of vacancies in the Senate.—(Honourable Senator Langlois).

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, this inquiry has been on the order paper for some time for the same reason I just gave with respect to the previous one. Therefore, as no other senator wishes to speak to it, I suggest that it be considered as having been debated.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DOCUMENTARY PROGRAM "DUPLESSIS"—INQUIRY STANDS UNTIL LATER THIS DAY

On the inquiry of Senator Desruisseaux:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Radio Canada seven episode program entitled "Duplessis".

Senator Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I believe Senator Thompson is prepared to make his speech on the Helsinki Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, and I am prepared to yield to him now. I am at the disposition of the Whip so far as my own remarks are concerned. It was suggested that I might deliver them later. I have no objection to that.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

CONFERENCE ON SECURITY AND CO-OPERATION IN EUROPE

VISIT BY PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION TO BELGRADE, YUGOSLAVIA—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Andrew Thompson rose pursuant to notice of Monday, March 20, 1978:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to his recent visit to the Helsinki Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Desruisseaux for his courtesy and kindness in allowing me to speak at this time.

I wish to report on the final languishing week of the Belgrade Conference. Two years ago the political leaders of 35 nations signed the Helsinki Accord declaring their determination to act in accordance with its provisions. The Belgrade review, as I think all senators know, was to assess how much had been implemented.

I have always had a strong skepticism about the Helsinki Declaration. I have been concerned that is aroused expectations that would not be fulfilled. The trial of the signatories of Charter 77 in Prague and the imprisonment of members of the Helsinki monitoring groups in the Soviet Union seemed to provide more dark shadows than rays of hope on the advancement of human rights.

Certainly, on the eve of my departure for Belgrade the reports from Senator Bosa and Senator Yuzyk, most recently back, could not evoke wild enthusiasm. They reported that the conference was not able to produce a substantive, meaningful final statement. In fact, after six expensive dreary months of diplomatic labour, they were reporting that the 400 delegates of 35 nations meeting in Belgrade could produce only a bland, face-saving, four-page formula. Indeed, because of the conference's rule of consensus or unanimity, the Soviet delegation could and did successfully insist that the words "human rights" not be mentioned in the final document.

Yet I do not consider the Belgrade meeting a fiasco. Prior to leaving I had had a briefing by that crisp, competent, External Affairs representative, Mr. Chistoff. I had listened to him and Senator Yuzyk, who were reporting to a NATO parliamentary session. With them I had also talked to a group of Canadians of Baltic background, who, incidentally, were in Ottawa to attend their annual Baltic festival on Parliament Hill.

Several months before that, I had attended a meeting of the parliamentary Helsinki group at which representatives of the Canadian eastern European groups had presented briefs. I am stating this background because some European delegates at Belgrade were genuinely puzzled at our concerns over human rights, family reunification, visas, et cetera, in east European homelands. They were not aware that one-third of the Canadian people came from those homelands.

I had read the briefs presented by communities of East European Canadians, and so had, I am sure, most of the other 18 parliamentarians who participated at Belgrade. Certainly, the members of the Canadian diplomatic delegation, led by Ambassador Delworth, were thoroughly informed about them. And the Honourable Norman Cafik, representing the Minister of External Affairs at the closing, was fully up-to-date on them. I was with the minister at all the informal meetings which Ambassador Delworth arranged with other delegates.

The documented facts in those briefs were the basis for Mr. Cafik's discussions with the Soviet ambassador, a breakfast meeting with the Czechoslovakian ambassador, and our talk with the representative of the Holy See about the persecution of the church in the Baltic States and the Soviet Union.

It should not be necessary to stress that the stand taken by Mr. Cafik and the Canadian delegation did not represent only the Liberal government's policies on human rights. All political parties in Canada are united and consistent on that issue. And certainly in my period in public life, Canadian spokesmen—whether Prime Ministers or Ministers of External Affairs—have spoken out with the solid support of all parties. I bluntly deplore those who would diminish Canada's stand on human rights and fundamental freedoms to narrow partisan division. No Canadian public figure backs down on human rights.

The Honourable Don Jamieson at a meeting of the External Affairs and National Defence Committee on March 3, 1977, said that the Canadian government will take a direct approach in protecting human rights, but this does not mean going public on all occasions; it depends on what is the more effective means. He wants results rather than polemic. He further stated that public pressure, in general, is more useful in respect of dissidents than family reunification. In family reunification cases, it is more useful to take direct and somewhat unpublicized diplomatic initiatives. He said that the Belgrade meeting will not resolve the whole question of human rights, but it will certainly be a useful forum for highlighting them as they relate to those countries that are signatories to the Helsinki Pact. But he emphasized that there must be initiatives in other fora as well.

The review of implementation was carried on from October to December. Discussions relating to security and economic matters were largely free of controversy. However, as anticipated, the discussion of human rights and humanitarian questions saw some heated exchanges. Ambassador Delworth presented our criticisms about the human rights situation in Eastern Europe with force and blunt fact.

There were some 100 proposals tabled. Canada co-sponsored nine proposals, six of which related to humanitarian questions, including respect for human rights; the role of the individual, institutions and organizations in the implementation of the final act; the elimination of some of the administrative barriers to human contacts, especially regarding family visits and family reunification; and the freer flow of information and ideas. The seventh proposal related to confidence-building measures; the eighth aimed at a convention on terrorism; and the ninth contained our draft of the concluding document.

By mutual agreement within the western caucus, the main western economic and related proposals on science and technology were put forward by the delegations representing the European Economic Community. Although Canada did not co-sponsor them, it supported them and their aims which were, essentially, to reduce the barriers to freer access to relevant information, and to freer contacts between businessmen and between scientists and others involved in the activities covered by this part of the Final Act.

Like other western governments, Canada is disappointed that it was not possible to get a meaningful, substantive concluding document at Belgrade.

The reality of the situation at Belgrade was that no document which referred to human rights and humanitarian questions could achieve a consensus in view of the position adopted by the Eastern European delegations on this matter during the discussions. Rather than agreeing to a selectively substantive and therefore unbalanced document that would not deal with the humanitarian dimension of the Final Act, but would deal only with other matters, Canada and its friends proposed that the concluding document which had to be produced before the meeting could come to a formal end should be short and factual. However, Canada's approval of the document does not indicate that we have abandoned our commitment to humanitarian issues or the various ideas that we put forward in order to achieve progress in implementation. Indeed, it indicated our intention to hold governments to their Final Act commitments, and to pursue our ideas in the interval between Belgrade and the next conference, in two years, which will be held in Madrid.

Although the Belgrade meeting did not end with the kind of document we would have liked to see, I and many others were not entirely surprised. However, I do not think that the West should despair. Some positive things have resulted so far, particularly in the area of family reunification and family visits. And at Belgrade the Canadian team managed to have a sufficiently good discussion of the progress made in implementing the Final Act that the Eastern Europeans can be in no doubt about how we expect the undertaking in the Final Act to be fulfilled.

The Belgrade meeting also helped to establish that human rights and human contacts are legitimate subjects for discussion in this multilateral forum, contrary to what the Eastern Europeans have argued. The Belgrade meeting should, therefore, not be written off as a failure. The Helsinki Final Act remains in effect as our standard of conduct, and the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe process continues. The important thing now is to see how we can encourage the East Europeans to improve their performance after Belgrade.

I know it is customary to express appreciation to the host country. My words of appreciation are not motivated by custom, but by feelings of genuine gratitude for their patient and generous hospitality. Like many Canadians, I have always wanted to visit Yugoslavia with its magnificent scenery and proud diversified people. There are 100,000 citizens of Canada of Yugoslavian background, and among them I have close friends. I have always admired the determined and successful efforts of the people of Yugoslavia to maintain their independence and political integrity. Despite a limited knowledge of international affairs, I cannot help but appreciate the important and constructive role which Yugoslavia plays in the neutral and non-aligned grouping of nations. They are a hospitable, warm people.

Ambassador MacLellan arranged for the minister and myself to have lunch at the embassy with Mr. Mihailo Javorski, President of the Committee for Foreign Affairs of the National Assembly, and Mr. Bozidar Crnjak of the Federal Secretariat for Foreign Affairs. It was most informative.

Yugoslavia is a diversified land of exciting change. Mr. Javorski, as has Mr. Kardej, expressed in his recent book the view that the essentially western liberal idea of pluralism is compatible with both the Marxist idea of public ownership of the means of production, and with the Leninist one-party political system. Mr. Javorski described their efforts to try to create a combination of political and industrial democracy with an egalitarian framework. I have some doubts that the factory manager, operating the individual enterprise—or BOAL, as they call it—who is usually appointed for four years, is not dependent on the party's good will. He has to sign obligatory planning agreements from central party authorities. But I still sensed an independence, which I know would not be permitted in the Soviet Union.

I talked to many people. A very able hotel manager operates with, I sensed, wide discretion; artists and professional persons such as doctors, with whom I talked, function without severe ideological interference. I went to both Orthodox and Catholic churches, to markets, the opera, to a wonderful military exhibit, and met many Yugoslavs. But one point I should like to make is that at times, as a Canadian, I was embarrassed because I found I was having to defend the reputation of other Canadians whom I respect deeply. I refer to the 100,000 Canadians of Yugoslav background.

Within Canada there is a miniscule minority of citizens from the provinces of Yugoslavia who consider abuse can achieve their goals of historical allegiances. It is hard for me to explain why at the Yugoslav Consulate in Toronto we have to maintain, and have done for many years, protective police. I abhor those few Canadians of Yugoslav background living in our free country who profane freedom by exploiting it, as did the Nazis. I know that in Yugoslavia there are not yet all the freedoms that we so deeply hold dear. I have read Djilas' book The New Class, and others. It is to those few Canadians of Yugoslav background that I say, "Don't give the opportunity to a Yugoslav official in his own country to reproach a Canadian by calling us 'the imperfect society'."

In connection with the conference, I started on a skeptical note. That was before I arrived in Belgrade. I was encouraged by the steady work carried out by Ambassador Delworth and his delegation. It will be a long, long road. Our refugees—many of us know them here—from Communist régimes who now reside in Canada understand, perhaps more than I do, that "communism with a humane face" is not going to happen overnight. In meeting delegates from east and west at Belgrade I discovered from all of them, after the long months of discussions, that they had a longing to see their families. Surely, also, they must all understand our Canadian concern to provide that same freedom of reunification to our citizens with separated families in Eastern Europe. What is the alternative, I ask myself, to negotiating and reviewing in order to ease the harsh restrictions on freedom? I leave that question with the critics of the conference.

Let me end with the concluding paragraph of the Canadian statement by the Honourable Norman Cafik, who said:

I would ask whether, a decade ago, anyone would have even envisaged that meetings such as Belgrade would ever have taken place.

Can anyone have doubts as to the value of nations of differing ideologies sitting down together and freely and frankly discussing their mutual concerns?

Belgrade is a significant and positive step forward. As long as this process of dialogue continues, we need not be discouraged.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, it was not my intention to speak on this subject tonight, but I think it is my duty to say at least what I think about the whole conference.

I have followed what happened after the Helsinki Conference. If you are optimistic, I, unfortunately, am pessimistic about what happened in Belgrade. I think that the Helsinki Conference was used by the USSR to attain certain international political aims, which they did attain, and now they are no longer interested in the subject we are interested in, which is really related to human values.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

DOCUMENTARY PROGRAM "DUPLESSIS"

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux rose pursuant to notice of Monday, March 20, 1978:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Radio Canada seven episode program entitled "Duplessis".

He said: Honourable senators, with your permission may I now proceed with my inquiry?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Senator Desruisseaux: Once again, Radio Canada relates in its programs historical facts reported as genuine but which not only distort the truth but cause prejudices to the reputation of honest citizens. Let me quote from an editorial which appeared in La Tribune of last Friday, March 17:

The sixth part of the historical saga produced by Marc Blandford and written by Denys Arcand is nothing but a gross, contemptuous and erroneous caricature of His Excellency Georges Cabana, the former Archbishop of Sherbrooke. And through the character of Archbishop Cabana, the entire population of this region today resents this offending, gratuitous and useless gesture made Wednesday evening before an audience which, according to polls, exceeds one million viewers.

Viewers are warned at the outset that the facts reported are authentic but that they have been dramatized. To dramatize facts is one thing but that does not mean making things up, lying or insulting people. Wednesday night, one man, Archbishop Cabana, was ridiculed for quite some time in a series supposedly dedicated to Maurice Duplessis. In reading on this page the comments of the former pastor of the diocese of Sherbrooke, readers will understand how the author and the producer of this series did not report history but only told petty stories. But how can the story of Maurice Duplessis, of the foundation of the University of Sherbrooke and the history of Quebec be served by including in this episode references to campaigns by Archbishop Cabana? Why describe him as a man who would have let even the premier of the province treat him as the last of the last?

But those who have known Archbishop Cabana are perfectly aware that he was no puppet in the hands of Mr. Duplessis. Even Mr. Duplessis was too much of a gentleman to ignore off-handedly a bishop who was fighting with eminent citizens of Sherbrooke for the establishment of the university.

And I was one of them.

If the state television network still believes in respect for individuals and history it will apologize to the wronged prelate and the people.

Following that editorial the same newspaper published a letter from His Excellency Mgr. Jean-Marie Fortier, the Archbishop of Sherbrooke, and I wish to quote a passage for the record.

I must unfortunately deplore the clearly hostile attitude towards the clergy in Quebec which seems to be an underlying theme of the series. Under the pretext of historical accuracy, it presents a caricature either through the various characters depicted or through a highly conscious selection of facts illustrating that administration.

Thus it gave no recognition to the Asbestos strike and the well known commitment of several members of the clergy in support of the miners. Cardinal Villeneuve has been depicted as a clever opportunist. The representation of Archbishop Cabana, who is still living, has been done in such a mean way that it denies the real historical role of the Archbishop of Sherbrooke. His efforts have been completely distorted. No mention has been made of the joint efforts towards the creation of the University of Sherbrooke which have been extremely beneficial to the Eastern Townships and with which were closely associated the Hon. J. S. Bourque, who has been completely ridiculed in the sixth program of the series, as well as some other personalities of the area. This program is also offensive to the residents of the Eastern Townships who made every sacrifice to establish that university of which they are proud.

The origin of that university is related to the obscure influence of an ambiguous character, a nun with a strange behaviour certainly exceedingly rare at that time.

In short, the injustice towards Archbishop Cabana is such that I think that Radio-Canada should make a public apology. I would certainly come out of it taller in the eyes of the public and particularly of the people who knew the former archbishop of Sherbrooke well and appreciated at their true value many of his initiatives.

By insulting and mendaciously reporting as they did the Duplessis series on the French television network of CBC, author Denys Arcand and producer Marc Blandford did not concern themselves at all with the truthfulness of their story or the historical facts that Radio Canada at the beginning of every Duplessis program stated to be authentically true. They rather relied on dishonest inventions and fictions of untrue facts—in the sixth episode, for example—to irresponsibly tarnish the reputation of people who contributed to our advancement and development when several of the people falsely insulted are still living among us.

Radio Canada, author Arcand and producer Blandford are also insulting all those in their audience who knew the people whom they claim to have historically described and portrayed.

I personally knew Premier Duplessis very well and most of the people who were in the public eye and who were referred to in the Duplessis series.

I must say that the interpretations that were made of those people were false, erroneous, unjust, mendacious, quite disgraceful and, I believe, disgusting at certain times even if the cast was made up of excellent artists who succeeded in amusing the viewers who had not known the people being portrayed.

In fairness, I must say here that Duplessis, for whom I did not have much esteem, being a Liberal, and whom I did not appreciate much politically either, was a lot more honourable, more intelligent, more gracious and also more honest than Radio Canada, the author and the producer showed him to be under the label of "historically authentic".

Archbishop Georges Cabana, whom I knew and held in high esteem for his vitality and intelligent and very useful accomplishments for our fellow countrymen, was not by any standard the overly devout, selfish, insignificant man that Radio Canada showed us as being "historically authentic".

In fact and in fairness, he was the shrewd instigator, the practical builder and the very soul of the foundation and the first developments of the University of Sherbrooke which has not stopped rendering tremendous services to the Eastern Townships and the whole province of Quebec. Contrary to the image given by the CBC of the Archbishop of Sherbrooke, the latter has always surrounded himself with first rate assistants. I can testify that they became his loyal, faithful and devoted friends. He was not at all the colourless character depicted on this program.

With this "Duplessis" program, CBC has lost a fine opportunity to prove equal to the task and to pay a well-deserved public tribute to some distinguished characters of our history.

[Senator Desruisseaux.]

Mr. J. S. Bourque, whom the CBC depicts as a spineless minister, an incompetent and a ninny, was actually one of the ablest businessmen in Sherbrooke, a man noted for his civic virtues and his success in business long before he entered politics. He was chosen president of the Sherbrooke Liberal Association. He showed remarkable strength of character, and much to my regret at that time, since I was a Liberal, we could not prevent him from joining the Union Nationale, then at its beginnings.

● (2120)

In the opinion of those who knew him and of the voters who assessed him, he deserved his several re-elections. The governments of the day entrusted him with several of the major portfolios.

The personality and the story itself of "Duplessis" shown to the TV viewers of the French state-owned network were false, historically deficient and mostly slanderous. It is an insult to the intelligence of the TV viewers who are quite familiar with this period of our history, with the public figures as well as those who worked with them to promote our development.

Premier Duplessis would never have treated the archbishop of Sherbrooke in the manner shown by the CBC in the sixth part of "Duplessis."

Cardinal Villeneuve was never the complete opportunist, the vile and despicable schemer portrayed by the CBC which termed such description as strictly authentic.

Mr. J. S. Bourque was portrayed by the CBC in a slanderous manner which brings disgrace upon his memory and his family. This holds true for most of the historical figures depicted in such a spurious and tactless way by the CBC.

With the "Duplessis" series, the CBC loses all credibility, despite its cast of excellent actors who succeeded in making the viewers laugh because they did not know the figures portrayed.

It is not the first time that the CBC manages to run down French Canadians who were prominent in their day.

We cannot allow our state-owned network to go on fooling so deliberately our French-speaking viewers by damaging wantonly and falsely at every turn the reputation and good name of fellow citizens who distinguished themselves in their public life.

Radio Canada in my view has and has always had a duty, since its inception as a crown agency and corporation, to check the truth and authenticity of historical data it is using, especially when it shows the assertion "historically authentic" at the beginning of each program in its "Duplessis" series.

How come then it must on so many occasions, and this is not the first time, stoop so low once more as to falsely and maliciously tarnish the reputation or good name of well-known personalities to whom we owe much of our cultural, social and even economic progress?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Desruisseaux: Is that the purpose for which we have bestowed billions of dollars onto Radio Canada since its inception as a crown agency and corporation?

Radio Canada failed in its duty, because as a crown corporation it must always and in all circumstances ensure that the historical data it is using are true and genuine.

Radio Canada, the writer and the producer of the "Duplessis" series have a duty, because of their blunders, to recognize honestly before their viewers their malicious and unexcusable slanders affecting innocent people, and to put before the general public the necessary corrections.

I feel Radio Canada has an obligation to do that. It should not skimp it if it has any sense of responsibility, if it wants to restore some credibility. This crown corporation is daily deserving closer scrutiny from this Parliament. No practical purposes have been served by the "Duplessis" series. It only succeeded in pulling down everything that was in authority in Quebec, in falsely insulting the people in authority during that period of our history.

We should not tolerate here such historical falsehoods, even though they may come from our own government TV network.

I feel we have a duty to point out significant corrections that are needed on historical facts that were declared to be genuinely historical at the beginning of each program in the "Duplessis" series.

Such, honourable senators, was the purpose of my remarks.

Hon. Jean Marchand: Honourable senators, if you have no objection, I would like to make a few comments. If you do, I could wait until tomorrow.

Some Hon. Senators: Go ahead.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, about the events or the program mentioned by our colleague, Senator Desruisseaux—at least those who know me will understand—I have been involved personally in those events, be it the asbestos strike, or the textile strike, or relations with bishops and, of course, relations with the Duplessis government and his ministers; indeed, that was all my life or at least a good part of it.

I agree with Senator Desruisseaux on one thing: the formula endorsed by Radio-Canada. I believe it is wrong because it is a hodgepodge of what may be true, or partially true, historical facts and others which are nothing more than theatrical effects, if you wish, and which have to do with drama and not history.

A hodgepodge indeed! And it is exactly the same phenomenon with another very successful play in the province of Quebec called "Charbonneau et le chef". Having been one of those who negotiated with Bishop Charbonneau, when I see the play I do not recognize myself at all. This is also true of some events mentioned in the program "Duplessis".

Now, I think it is important to discuss this subject in the Senate even if it may seem a little parochial, but I do not think so because you now have an entire generation of young people who have not lived through that period and who have not been taught any history whatsoever. I am not saying that they have been taught an irresponsible sort of history. No, history has not been taught at all. I noticed at one time that even university students knew nothing about very important events in our history such as, for instance, Bill No. 5 which was introduced in 1949, and which reflected Duplessis thought. To several people, Bill No. 5 is an abstract concept. This is the only bill I know of in Quebec, and perhaps in Canada, which has been opposed unanimously, by everybody, employers, workers, unions, bishops, everyone. There was only one person apart from Duplessis who agreed with Bill No. 5, and that was Mr. Asselin of the Legislative Council who more or less understood its scope. Mr. Barette learned that very morning that he was the sponsor of this bill but he had not even had the time to read it.

In any case, I simply want to say that under this formula, and Senator Desruisseaux is right, this program has at present a considerable influence in Quebec. It fails, not because of the facts which it mentions but rather because of those it does not mention. The problem is that the program depicts incidents which can be explained only to the extent where one knows the other events which it fails to report; that is to say, it does not throw light on that whole period, which was vital for Quebec and, do not forget, for all Canada, because November 15, 1976 cannot be understood unless one knows what happened between 1945 and 1960. That is why I feel that in trying to cover that period as it is being covered, one is doing a disservice to the country, to the province and naturally also to truth itself.

As for Archbishop Cabana, our colleague, Senator Desruisseaux, defended him well. Many others were mixed up in those events. There was Monsignor Charbonneau, and Monsignor Desranleau, also of Sherbrooke. There was also Monsignor Courchênes of Rimouski. There were also two ministers who went to the Vatican, and also Monsignor Antonioti here in Ottawa. In a word, it is all of Quebec's history, a history which had considerable influence on the social, political and even religious orientation of Quebec.

So, that Radio Canada should adopt that formula, you know, half fiction, half history, to represent the whole period I agree that could be shocking to my colleague from Sherbrooke, Senator Desruisseaux, although not me. Of course, I would not want to describe to you the image Mr. Duplessis has left with me. I doubt that this is the right place to do so. But I shall do it sometime, because I too knew Mr. Duplessis well, in every respect and in everyone of his moods.

So, in any event, what I feel is serious, and where I agree we should protest, is that by using a formula like this one Radio Canada is, in fact, distorting our history significantly. I think the formula should be changed, even though the people find the program very funny.

In the play "Charbonneau et le chef", they made the character of Monsignor Charbonneau walk across the stage the way the former Mayor of Montreal, Médéric Martin, would have; I'm sorry, but Monsignor Charbonneau was not the same build as the Mayor. I knew him. He talked very seldom and was extremely severe in his gestures and ways. We must not forget that Monsignor Charbonneau was not born in Quebec. Many events occurred in Quebec which he did not see or understand. However, he knew Montreal. He decided one day to collect funds at the church door and Monsignor Roy, the Cardinal of Quebec supported him.

That was an historical moment. I think one cannot deal with the history of Quebec without referring to that period. I do not understand why CBC used only part of the whole thing, which gives a distorted account of the history of that period. So, to this extent, I think my colleague from Sherbrooke, the Honourable Senator Desruisseaux, has every right to protest.

There are some points I would be willing to discuss with him about things which happened or did not happen. However, I think the subject was important enough to be discussed here, in the Senate, tonight.

PRIVATE BILL

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (LUCIEN ROCH JOSEPH MORIN AND MARIE ROSE HÉLÈNE MORIN)—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Senator Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Wednesday, March 22, 1978

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to which was referred Bill S-7, intituled "An Act to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Lucien Roch Joseph Morin and Marie Rose Hélène Morin" has, in obedience to the order of reference of February 8, 1978, examined the said bill and now reports as follows:

Your committee recommends that the bill be not proceeded with further in the Senate for the following reasons:

Under the public general law in Canada, parties may not marry if they are related to each other within one of the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity. The evidence presented in committee revealed that there is no relationship of consanguinity between the petitioners, nor is there any other relationship between them that is of a kind prohibited by the public general law of Canada.

Your committee is of the opinion that

(a) article 125 of the Civil Code of the Province of Quebec, which prohibits marriage between brother and sister, did not, as it existed prior to Confederation, prohibit marriage between two persons who are brother and sister through adoption;

(b) the said article 125, as it existed prior to Confederation, remains the source of the present law in the Province of Quebec since it has not been repealed or altered by the Parliament of Canada pursuant to section 129 of the British North America Act; and

(c) the Adoption Act of Quebec cannot have the effect of amending article 125 of the Civil Code so as to alter the law respecting the degrees of relationship within which persons may not marry since parliament has exclusive legislative authority in relation to "Marriage and Divorce" under section 91(26) of the British North America Act.

Your committee has, therefore, concluded that since there is no impediment to the proposed marriage of the petitioners, the private bill they have requested is unnecessary.

Your committee recommends that the parliamentary fee of $200 paid under Rule 90 and the sum of $450 deposited with the Clerk of the Senate to cover the costs of the translation and printing of the bill be refunded to the petitioners.

Respectfully submitted,

H. Carl Goldenberg,
Chairman.

[Senator Perrault.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Goldenberg: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat, that this report be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I do not think any explanation is necessary.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I would suggest that the chairman of the committee might wish to give an explanation, as this is a unique case and one which, to some extent, may be regarded as making law.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I shall be glad to do so. The reason why the committee decided that this bill should not be proceeded with is easily explained. The bill is based on an interpretation of article 125 of the Civil Code of the province of Quebec to the effect that since that article prohibits marriage between brother and sister, legitimate or natural, it also prohibits marriage between brother and sister by adoption.

After careful study and hearing expert witnesses, the committee decided that this was not a correct interpretation of that article of the Civil Code. When the article was adopted there was no law governing adoption in Quebec, and therefore the article has the same effect in this respect as before Confederation. It could only be changed or repealed by the Parliament of Canada, which alone has exclusive jurisdiction over marriage and divorce under the British North America Act.

It has not been changed; it has not been repealed with respect to marriage, and therefore the article is in effect as it has been since the years before Confederation, before there was any law governing adoption.

In the circumstances the committee came to the conclusion that adoption in itself does not create an impediment to the marriage of the petitioners.

I might add that considering that the committee concluded that the bill was based on an interpretation which was not correct, and considering further the financial circumstances of the petitioners, the committee thought it only equitable that the costs involved should be refunded to them. That is the concluding part of our recommendation.

● (1410)

Senator Grosart: Would the honourable senator make a distinction between the decision regarding this particular bill and one or two others in the same general category which were referred to his committee, and in respect of which the report of the committee differed from the report in this case?

Senator Goldenberg: The distinction is very clear, Senator Grosart. In this case the relationship is that of a brother and an adopted sister. There is no consanguinity between them. In the other two cases there were blood relationships between the parties, and the general public law prohibits marriage within certain degrees of consanguinity. Marriage in those cases can only be permitted by a law of exception. That was why in those two cases we recommended that the bills be passed.

In this case we do not think it necessary because there is no consanguinity between the parties. If I may be permitted, I should add that some years ago the Province of Quebec established a commission to revise the Civil Code. That commission reported and specifically recommended that the law provide that marriage between parties related by adoption in the collateral line be permitted.

[Translation]

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, as I was the sponsor of this bill, may I make a few brief comments concerning the report which has just been tabled by the chairman of the committee, the Honourable Senator Goldenberg?

I am not a member of this committee but I did attend all meetings. So I want to commend the remarkable job done by the members of the committee and by its chairman, Senator Goldenberg, who did not hesitate to seek evidence from experts who could cast some light on the problem we had to solve in order to go to the roots of the problem in a very complex study.

I must confirm what Senator Goldenberg said. I do not think we have had in the past a case like this in Parliament. There was unanimity on one very precise point. I think that is where we can find the basis for the report we have now before us. The fact is that under neither the Quebec Civil Code nor under the Adoption Act is there an explicit impediment to the parties getting married.

I must add that the chairman of the committee thought it wise to communicate with the ecclesiastical authorities of the diocese of Amos to inform them that the report of the committee clears the way for them to proceed with the marriage of the parties concerned.

So I think that all those who are concerned or who have been concerned in this bill will be very pleased about the decision we have made in this regard.

[English]

I understand there will be a refund of fees to the petitioners. As a personal favour, would the chairman of the committee see to it that that refund is not the responsibility of the sponsor?

[Translation]

Senator Goldenberg: I am going to add one word. I think that when we distributed copies of this report it had just been written and the French translation was not ready, but you will have it within an hour.

[English]

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, April 4, 1978, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, I should like, before the question is put, to give you a brief run-down of what we can expect to have before us when the Senate resumes after the Easter adjournment. I shall deal with the committees first, as a number of meetings have already been set down for the week of our return.

The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has scheduled a meeting for 2 p.m. on Monday, April 3, to continue consideration of its draft report on Canada-United States relations.

The Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet on Tuesday, April 4, at 2 p.m.

On Wednesday, April 5, there will be a meeting of the Subcommittee of the Health, Welfare and Science Committee on Childhood Experiences at 4 p.m., or when the Senate rises on that day.

The Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will hold another meeting on Thursday, April 6, at 11 a.m.

In addition to the foregoing, I have been informed that tentative arrangements have been worked out for a meeting of the Special Committee of the Senate on a Northern Gas Pipeline for the afternoon of Tuesday, April 4. However, nothing has been finalized, and as soon as a decision is reached the notice will be sent out.

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will hold a meeting that week on the subject matter of Bill C-29, an act to amend the Farm Credit Act, but as yet the date and time have not been fixed.

There will, of course, be additions to this list, and one of them could possibly be a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to further consider Bill C-2, an act respecting the administration and development of certain fishing and recreational harbours in Canada. However, the meeting of this committee will depend on the arrangements to be made for the attendance of the minister. I understand that at present the minister is away from the capital and that these arrangements will not likely be concluded before some time next week, when the notices will be sent to honourable senators.

On Tuesday evening when we return, Senator Hayden will move second reading of Bill S-11, an act respecting bankruptcy and insolvency, and Senator Lang will call the attention of the Senate to the nineteenth meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group, held in New Orleans, Louisiana, in February.

I believe we can also look forward to receiving a number of bills from the other place during the week of our return.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I would assume from the statement made by the deputy leader that the pipeline bill will not reach us today, and that we are not expected to pass it in a few minutes before six o'clock. Consequently, there is no fear or possibility of dissolution before April 4, the date in the adjournment motion.

● (1420)

Senator Laird: No comment.

Senator Perrault: The universe will unfold.

Senator Flynn: I hope it will, as it should.

Motion agreed to.

FARM CREDIT ACT

AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY AMENDING LEGISLATION IN ADVANCE

Senator Argue, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture be authorized to examine and report upon the subject matter of the Bill C-29, intituled: "An Act to amend the Farm Credit Act," in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is an amendment to the Farm Credit Act and contains some important provisions. The Farm Credit Act is far-reaching and is of great importance to the agricultural community of this country. In these uncertain times to which the Leader of the Opposition made some reference, it would seem to us to be a wise move for the committee to have the opportunity to examine the bill so that if we do feel that certain changes should be made we might be in a position to make recommendations and leave sufficient time to have them considered.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to know what stage this bill has reached in the other place. When is it likely to come to us? Also, when does the committee intend to sit? We have just had an interesting experience in connection with the pipeline bill. We have sat in advance of the bill's coming over, but just in advance is too late, because we cannot do anything that is practical with these references of the subject matter of a bill to committee. If it is to be useful, it must be done long in advance so that our recommendations, if any, go to the other place and to the government before the legislation passes second reading and the committee stage in the other place. That is why I should like the chairman of the committee to explain if this can be done with regard to this bill. I can understand the urgency. All the bills you can pass before the election—that's the attitude.

Senator Argue: In answer to the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition, the bill has just been introduced in the other place. It is now at second reading stage and I take it there is considerable debate remaining, so that we have whatever time there may be. Of course, we cannot judge what time will elapse between the beginning of the debate on second reading and the passage of the bill. Therefore we are in at an early stage.

Senator Flynn: When do you intend to meet?

Senator Argue: Early next week.

Senator Flynn: Do you mean the week following Easter?

Senator Argue: No, when we come back.

Senator Flynn: That is in two weeks.

Senator Argue: That is right.

Senator Flynn: Thank you.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DOCUMENTARY PROGRAM "DUPLESSIS"—INQUIRY

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the Leader of the Government.

Yesterday evening we heard speeches from Senator Desruisseaux and Senator Marchand on a matter involving the CBC. I feel this is an important matter which should be brought to the attention of the head of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Will the Leader of the Government deem it necessary to send copies of these speeches to the head of the CBC?

[English]

Senator Perrault: I am prepared to give a commitment to send a copy of yesterday's Hansard, along with a covering letter, to the head of the corporation.

AGRICULTURE

ESTABLISHMENT OF EXPERIMENTAL FARM IN KENT COUNTY, NEW BRUNSWICK

Hon. Hervé J. Michaud: Honourable senators, I should like to request leave to speak briefly on a matter which I believe will be of considerable interest, and which is most timely.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Grosart: What is the subject?

Senator Michaud: It has to do with new initiatives taken by the Government of Canada and the Government of New Brunswick regarding agricultural production and development.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Michaud: Honourable senators, you will recall that the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture published a report on September 29, 1976, entitled "Kent County Can be Saved: An inquiry into the Agricultural Potential of Eastern New Brunswick."

Today I am pleased to report that a number of our recommendations have been accepted by the ministers responsible for agriculture and for regional development.

Today in Fredericton, the Honourable Marcel Lessard, Federal Minister of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the Honourable Eugene Whelan, Federal Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable Richard Hatfield, Premier of New Brunswick, and the Honourable Malcolm MacLeod, Minister of Agriculture for the Province of New Brunswick, signed a new subsidiary agreement for agriculture under the general Development Agreement.

Honourable senators will appreciate why I am anxious to refer to that aspect of the agreement first which has to do with agriculture. I shall read from the communiqué itself in that respect. It reads as follows:

Fredericton, March 22, 1978—Agriculture Minister Eugene Whelan today announced that a new experimental farm will be established in Kent County, in eastern New Brunswick.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Michaud: The communiqué continues:

Designed specifically to serve the agricultural needs of this area, the farm will be used to carry out research on existing crops—with emphasis on fruits and vegetables—as well as investigations into new crops that can be used as livestock feed.

“We will initiate a research and development program at the farm during the current growing season,” Mr. Whelan said. “At the same time, permanent field, office and laboratory facilities will be established.”

Senator Flynn: What does “current season” mean?

Senator Michaud: It means the current growing season.

Senator Flynn: Oh! It does not mean the electioneering season?

Senator Michaud: No. I should like to continue reading the communiqué:

Scientific and technical staff at the experimental farm, which will be a substation to the Agriculture Canada Research Station here, will concentrate their efforts on the solution of local production problems as well as developing and demonstrating new technology which will enhance the agricultural impact of producers located in this area of New Brunswick.

“The decision to establish this experimental farm is consistent with current development policies and programs of the federal government, in co-operation with the Province of New Brunswick,” Mr. Whelan said.

The federal government this year completes a first phase of joint development initiatives with the province which has been effective in halting the decline of the agricultural sector. Next month, the federal government—through collaborative efforts of Agriculture Canada, the Department of Regional and Economic Expansion with the province—will begin a second phase of development aimed at achieving real growth in agriculture.

“A significant portion of the total development opportunity has been identified in eastern New Brunswick,” Mr. Whelan said. “It’s essential that sound production technology be in place and readily accessible in the region for this development potential to be realized.”

● (1430)

It is a fair but general conclusion, based on the information that we have about the complete agreement, that many of the problems, objectives, and solutions found, identified and recommended by our Agriculture Committee have been accepted as the basis for this multimillion dollar initiative. Recognizing, of course, that while the committee concerned itself with the very severe situation in eastern New Brunswick, the new agreement is concerned with the whole province.

I should like to make particular mention of several of our recommendations. The committee recommended that an educational facility be established in the province to provide agricultural training at the diploma level in the French language. The agreement provides for the establishment of a federal-provincial task force to review this proposal, which has been accepted in principle by the provincial government.

The committee made many recommendations concerning the development of markets and the establishment of storage and processing facilities. The agreement provides for the expenditure of $10,570,000 for these purposes over the next five years, some of which, I am certain, will be spent in eastern New Brunswick.

The committee identified the agricultural potential of Kent County as being primarily in vegetables, small fruits and beef production and, to a lesser degree, in sheep, potatoes, poultry, et cetera. The agreement signed today has as its emphasis three major commodity groups, being potatoes, fruits and vegetables, and livestock and livestock feed.

[Translation]

The implementation of these various recommendations is not the only result of the study the Senate Committee on Agriculture carried out on this subject. As I often indicated during our discussions, the University of Moncton is now offering the first three years of a course in agronomy, the last two years of which can be completed at Laval University. The agreement between these two universities is the result of discussions which were organized by our committee and which were held in this very building on December 4, 1973, with all the interested parties present. Six students completed their course at Laval University last year, and ten more are expected to do so at the end of the current academic year in a few days. The universities of Moncton and Laval deserve our congratulations for implementing this program which will ensure that New Brunswick will possess from now on in both languages the necessary knowledge and expertise in the area of agriculture. The Secretary of State Department also deserves our congratulations for the important financial support it has provided to the students taking part in this academic program.

[English]

Through research and demonstration, the physical and human resources can be developed, and, if I may say it, "Kent County Can be Saved," "Sauvons le Comté de Kent."

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it seems to me it is worth commenting at this point that there is no doubt in this chamber that the efforts of certain honourable senators have brought about the momentous and important decision taken in respect of the province of New Brunswick today. I cite particularly the efforts of Senator Michaud, who has fought unceasingly, both here in the Senate and previously as a member of the other place, to bring about this development in his home province, and also the Chairman of the Agriculture Committee, Senator Hazen Argue.

The report, "Kent County Can be Saved," is one of the great achievements of the Senate in recent years, and for that reason I think it is worthwhile bringing this decision to the attention of the Senate.

Too often there is criticism of the Senate. Of course, honourable senators are inured to the criticism that the Senate is a rubber stamp and fails to initiate important actions on behalf of the Canadian people. In the event that honourable senators have not been keeping count of the number of amendments made to bills that have come before us from the House of Commons, the total is now over 100 for this session, and that is in addition to a number of very important reports which have been produced by Senate committees. I point that out as another example of the great value of the Senate to the people of Canada.

Again, congratulations certainly should go forward to those who kept up the pressure and who did the work to persuade the Minister of Agriculture to take this important decision today.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have no difficulty in sharing the views expressed by the Leader of the Government with regard to the work done by Senator Michaud and the other members of the Agriculture Committee, and even to the most worthy work of Senator Argue. However, I suggest that this is a matter which should be dealt with at the proper time in our order of business.

The Leader of the Government, by his remarks, has given us the opportunity to continue this debate until 6 o'clock, if we wish, thereby delaying the passage of certain bills which are up today for third reading and which the government wishes to have passed.

Had we proceeded in the proper order, those bills on the order paper for third reading would have received third reading, following which Senator Michaud could have brought this very important matter to our attention. But the Leader of the Government, having commented on the immense role of the Senate, has provided us with the subject matter of a debate that could last for at least three days had we the desire to underline even a small part of the worthy contribution the Senate makes to the legislative process in Canada.

[Senator Michaud.]

The Leader of the Government, by virtue of his remarks, has provided the opportunity to initiate such a debate, although it is not my intention to do so.

At the same time, I could criticize the conduct of the Liberal majority in the Senate and the timing of this decision from the point of view of the government. As I say, it is not my intention to do so, but I could initiate a rather lengthy debate on the basis of Senator Michaud's inquiry—and it was an inquiry—and the kind of endorsement given to his remarks by the Leader of the Government. Instead, I merely say to the Leader of the Government that he should instruct his troops to make that kind of announcement, that type of election speech, at the appropriate place in our order of business.

I am not being critical. I do not want to take anything away from the merits of the decision which Senator Michaud has drawn to our attention, but I could not help but make those few observations in view of the type of endorsement given to his remarks by the Leader of the Government.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I might say at this point to the Leader of the Opposition and to the Senate itself that perhaps the insertion of this item at this stage in our order of business could be attributed to the inexperience and naivete of the Acting Whip on this side. I am sure that if our Whip were here this would not have happened. However—

● (1440)

Senator Flynn: If you stop there, you are going to get absolution.

Senator McElman: However, while I am on my feet, I hope the Honourable Senator Flynn will permit me to say how happy I am not only for New Brunswick—although, of course, I am very happy for New Brunswick—but also for Senator Michaud who has devoted 20 years of his life to this effort and now sees it coming to fruition.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, it seemed to me that this was an appropriate way to bring this item before the Senate. It was done with leave. After all, this is the day the announcement was made and so it seems timely.

Senator Flynn: I said "later this day," just trying to be a little more subtle.

Senator Argue: In any event, since the Leader of the Opposition has raised the point, Senator Michaud gave great leadership in this field and in the work which has resulted in the announcement made today. But we should not forget either that this is a joint effort between the Government of Canada and the Government of New Brunswick, and that our committee is composed of members from both sides of this house. A few months ago Senator Yuzyk and I went to Fredericton, and there we met with the Premier of New Brunswick, the Honourable Richard Hatfield, and the Minister of Agriculture of that province, the Honourable Malcolm MacLeod, on this very point. I think this is an example of the Senate at its best, and an example of federal-provincial co-operation at its best. This is a wonderful day for the Senate, and it is particularly a wonderful day for Senator Michaud. Today is Senator Michaud's day, and I congratulate him.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: What I said was obviously too subtle for Senator Argue to understand.

Prayers.

NEW SENATORS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received certificates from the Registrar General of Canada showing that the following persons, respectively, have been summoned to the Senate:

Duff Roblin, P.C.
Joseph-Philippe Guay, P.C.
Stanley Haidasz, P.C.
Mrs. Florence Bayard Bird
Philip Derek Lewis, Esquire
Jack Marshall, Esquire
Miss Margaret Jean Anderson

NEW SENATORS INTRODUCED

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there were senators without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senators were introduced; presented Her Majesty's writs of summons, which were read by the Clerk Assistant; took the legally prescribed oath, which was administered by the Clerk, and were seated:

Hon. Duff Roblin, P.C., of Winnipeg, Manitoba, introduced between Hon. Jacques Flynn, P.C., and Hon. Paul Yuzyk.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay, P.C., of St. Boniface, Manitoba, introduced between Hon. Raymond J. Perrault, P.C., and Hon. Gildas L. Molgat.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz, P.C., of Toronto, Ontario, introduced between Hon. Raymond J. Perrault, P.C., and Hon. Andrew Thompson.

Hon. Florence Bayard Bird, of Ottawa, Ontario, introduced between Hon. Raymond J. Perrault, P.C., and Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg.

Hon. Philip Derek Lewis, of St. John's, Newfoundland, introduced between Hon. Raymond J. Perrault, P.C., and Hon. William J. Petten.

Hon. Jack Marshall, of Corner Brook, Newfoundland, introduced between Hon. Jacques Flynn, P.C., and Hon. John M. Macdonald.

Hon. Margaret Jean Anderson, Newcastle, New Brunswick, introduced between Hon. Raymond J. Perrault, P.C., and Hon. Charles McElman.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the honourable senators named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the British North America Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I know that all honourable senators will wish to join with me in extending a very warm welcome to those who have joined our ranks tonight. The great diversity of talents, the great range of abilities represented in this group, will without question enable the Senate to make an even more important contribution to the progress of this nation. We certainly welcome each one of our new colleagues, regardless of party.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have no hesitation in joining the government leader in welcoming our new colleagues.

As Senator Perrault pointed out, we can expect from our new senators a diversity of talents, new contributions of all kinds, but I would like to say in particular that as far as the opposition is concerned we are very pleased to see that our ranks are reinforced. It is not that we feel inferior but sometimes the number is fairly important because if we are not here, we are not here, but when there can be at least one of us, we can face seven Liberals.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is good to note that the Leader of the Opposition is in such good spirits this evening.

THE HONOURABLE JAMES DUGGAN

TRIBUTES ON RESIGNATION FROM SENATE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, it is fitting that we pay tribute to Senator James Duggan, who retired from this chamber at the end of February.

Senator Duggan made a valuable contribution to this house for over 12 years and brought to our proceedings a deep concern for the less fortunate members of Canadian society.

Senator Duggan was a railwayman who started work as a telegraph operator with the Reid Newfoundland Company at the age of 17. He was station agent, train dispatcher, and all the while was actively involved with the trade union movement in Newfoundland. He served many years as Chairman of the Newfoundland Legislation Committee of the International Railway Brotherhoods and as a member of the Newfoundland Labour Relations Board.

He had not enjoyed good health in recent years, but despite this he maintained an active interest in the work of the Senate. We will miss his presence and we wish him well in his retirement.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I join with the Leader of the Government in extending to Senator James Duggan our very best wishes for a lengthy, fruitful and well-deserved retirement. Senator Duggan served his province well in this chamber, and he was especially effective in championing the cause of labour. The good senator had been a veritable tower of strength and responsibility in the trade union movement in Newfoundland before being appointed to this chamber. He knew and understood the worker and had the enviable ability of being able to express simply and forcibly the worker's goals, aspirations and fears.

We wish him well and we wish him restored health and happy years in his retirement.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I should like to associate myself with the remarks of my leader and the remarks of Senator Flynn in paying tribute to my friend and colleague Senator Duggan.

Senator Duggan was faithful in his attendance in this chamber until his health failed; he has always maintained an interest in the activities of the Senate. We shall miss him.

He has made a valuable contribution to the trade union movement in Newfoundland. He has been a faithful, conscientious servant of his community, his province and his country.

I am sure we all wish him and his charming wife Kathleen all that is good in his retirement.

THE LATE HONOURABLE JOHN EWASEW TRIBUTES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: It is with deep regret that honourable senators will have learned of the untimely death of our colleague Senator John Ewasew, Q.C., nine days ago.

Although Senator Ewasew had been with us for less than two years, he impressed the Senate with the vigour of his opinions and a determination to be a working member of this house. This capacity for hard work marked his whole life. He was born in Grenfell, a small town in Saskatchewan, 56 years ago. The son of Ukrainian immigrants, he knew the despair the depression brought to the prairies. He left home and rode freight trains through the Rockies in search of work.

He later served in World War II and returned home in 1945 to finish high school in Moose Jaw. He gained his Bachelor of Arts at Regina College and then went to McGill University where he studied law and graduated in 1950. He became a partner in the law firm of Howard, McDougal, Ewasew, Graham and Stocks and was appointed Queen's Counsel in 1965.

The late Senator Ewasew was active in the community, particularly in veterans affairs. In 1967 he received the Centennial Medal for his services on behalf of veterans, and he was awarded the Amity Medal by the American Legion for his work in international veterans affairs. He was active in politics in Montreal. He was president of the Notre Dame de Grace Liberal Association and president of the Town of Mount Royal Liberal Association.

Senator Ewasew's death is a real loss to this chamber. Here was a man who knew both western and eastern Canada. Here was a man who knew both hardship and prosperity. His knowledge and background would have served the Senate and Canada well, and our sympathy goes out to his wife Jeanne and his three children.

● (2010)

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, like all of you, the death of our colleague, John Ewasew, fills me with sadness. Last fall he attended a few sittings against his doctor's advice. He undoubtedly felt he was very ill, but he wanted to see us again.

Senator Ewasew sat among us for 15 or 16 months only, as the government leader mentioned. He was appointed a senator in December 1976, but even in so short a stay among us he asserted his strong personality. He was outspoken, a free thinker and he showed it on many occasions in his criticism of the government, even by supporting positions adopted by the opposition. He was a fine man who had the ability to contribute greatly to the work of the Senate. His untimely death leaves the Senate with a great loss.

In the name of the opposition, I wish to express to his widow and to all his relatives our deep regrets and our very sincere condolences.

[English]

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, the scythe of death mowed down Senator John Ewasew in the prime of his life, aged 56. His career in the Senate was meteoric. He was with us in this chamber for a little over a year. During that brief time he spoke on several occasions, participating in debates and raising issues for the consideration of this house.

The late senator was a likeable person with a friendly disposition. Sincere in his approach to problems and people, he nevertheless was fearless in defending a matter of importance or in presenting a case. Senator Ewasew showed great promise in the work of Parliament, and we can only regret that his life was snuffed out by cancer.

Among his senatorial duties he considered it important to participate in community and national endeavours. He was intensely active in his support of the Liberal Party and in participating in election campaigns. Once in the Senate he was very conscious of his origin and felt that he should become more closely involved with the Ukrainian Canadian group. Accordingly, he spoke at banquets and conventions of the leading Ukrainian organizations in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Edmonton, always speaking some Ukrainian and sometimes French. Having served in the Canadian military forces during the last war, he was proud of being Canadian and equally proud of the contributions that Ukrainians were making in all spheres of Canadian life. Having lived and worked for over 30 years among French Canadians, from whom he gained his wife, he staunchly defended their interests and maintained that Canadian unity could best be furthered by the implementation of a dynamic multicultural policy.

To his wife Jeanne; to his children, Diane, John-Pierre and Joane; to his elderly mother who survives him; to his brothers, Leo and Walter, both doctors, and to all the mourning relatives, I should like to express heartfelt condolences. May John Ewasew's memory inspire his fellow countrymen to serve Canada as faithfully as he did.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, John Ewasew was one of my close friends for about 12 years.

[English]

Senator Ewasew was a big, blustery man. When we first came to know each other, in the course of his political duties, at one point he called me at my office in Ottawa to inquire about a few matters. My reply at that time had to be negative. Two and a half hours later, I heard a loud voice outside my office saying, "Where is Paul Lafond?" And suddenly there he was in front of my desk. We became friends.

Early last December, when the provisional committee on national unity met in Quebec City, John Ewasew had recently come out of hospital, confident of his convalescence, and we spent three days together exchanging memories and tall stories. Our wives were there, too. He was anxious to get back to work with us. Our selection committee had appointed him to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, and he had an extreme interest in the question of freedom of information. Though he was about to take off for five or six weeks down south, to resume his convalescence, I discussed this matter with him and helped him arrange to get the necessary background documents. Then he was in for a few hours in early February, and that was it.

Senator Ewasew, a child of the depression, as was said before, was a good soldier, a good lawyer, a good husband and father, and, had Providence permitted, would have been a very good senator.

All in all, he was a good man.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Paproski had been substituted for that of Mr. Marshall on the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament.

NATIONAL REVENUE

NOTICE OF QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, with the appointment to this chamber of Senator Guay we have now a member responsible for a department.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: It has been a long time since this situation has existed in the Senate. I believe it goes back to when Senator McCutcheon was Minister of Trade and Commerce. I thought I would put a question to the new senator, who is still the Minister of National Revenue, but as I do not wish to spoil his evening I will ask him the question tomorrow.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Presumably he must take that as notice?

Senator Flynn: As a warning.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADIAN GRAIN STABILIZATION FUND

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on March 16 Senator Olson asked if he could have a reply spelling out in some detail what the intention of the minister responsible for the Wheat Board was in connection with interim payments under the Western Canadian Grain Stabilization Fund.

Of course, the government is very concerned about the needs of those in agriculture in this nation. I am happy to advise honourable senators that there will be a statement made tomorrow, Wednesday, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, Winnipeg time, by the Honourable Otto Lang, the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. I am able to report that a copy of the press release will be available at 3 o'clock tomorrow afternoon in this chamber. I hope the information will be of real interest to all those associated with our grain farming community.

MIDDLE EAST

PARTICIPATION OF CANADA IN UNITED NATIONS PEACEKEEPING FORCE IN SOUTHERN LEBANON—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Olson on March 20, 1978, with respect to Canada's contribution to the United Nations interim force in Lebanon.

May I say that I have received a report from the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I can say that when the Right Honourable the Prime Minister saw the Secretary General of the United Nations on March 21, the Prime Minister said that, if needed, Canada would offer a battalion of combat troops, but he said that our logistic capacity was limited and that the most we could do would be to give temporary help, drawing on resources in UNEF/UNDOF where over 1,000 Canadians are serving.

Mr. Waldheim preferred to request assistance from countries not now represented in Middle East peacekeeping, and has so far been promised contingents for UNIFIL from France, Norway, Nepal and Senegal, and is seeking a contribution from Latin America.

The Commander of the Canadian contingent in the Middle East has been authorized to provide temporary assistance in the establishment of UNIFIL, provided he can do this within his existing resources in the theatre without degrading his present operations or interfering unduly with his rotation plans. On this basis, he is providing two officers and 33 other ranks to UNIFIL, broken down as follows:

Advance Guard—seven men with the Swedish company in Lebanon; six men with the Iranian company, just inside Isreal on the Lebanese border;

UNIFIL Headquarters—a signals detachment of one officer and 17 men operating out of Naquora, Lebanon;

Beirut—a movement control detachment of one officer and three men assisting with reception and deployment arrangements at Beirut airport.

Apart from these personnel temporarily assigned to UNIFIL, Canadians have been assisting with the transport and supply of the Swedish and Iranian companies during their transfer from UNEF and UNDOF to Lebanon. We have had to decline a request to provide transport to assist the Norwegian battalion in its deployment within Lebanon, because the available Canadian resources have been fully taken up with the above commitments.

In addition to Canadians with UNIFIL, four Canadian officers are in Lebanon with the UN Truce Supervision Organization.

Honourable senators, I conclude this rather lengthy statement by stating that, concerning the events leading up to the present crisis, the Prime Minister sent a message of sympathy to the Prime Minister of Israel following the terrorist attack. No comparable message was sent concerning the Israeli action in Southern Lebanon. The Honourable the Secretary of State for External Affairs told the House on March 17, however, that Canada deplored the terrorist action which occurred in Israel and the retaliatory action which followed. He said these diminished the prospects of a peaceful settlement in the Middle East.

As honourable senators are aware, Mr. Jamieson announced on March 23 that Canada was contributing $1 million through the International Committee of the Red Cross for emergency relief to Lebanese civilians.

The statement has been a rather lengthy one, but there is a good deal of interest in this chamber concerning this matter.

Senator Olson: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a supplementary question on that rather complete reply to my question about the Canadian contingent going into Southern Lebanon. Have all the parties, such as Lebanon, Israel, Syria, the P.L.O. and so on, who have a great interest in that area, given their assurance of co-operation with the UN force that is going in? I know some of them have, but the news reports to date have not given a complete resumé of assurances from all interested parties.

Senator Perrault: The situation there, of course, is very fluid at the present time. I must take that question as notice, and an endeavour will be made to provide further information tomorrow.

AGRICULTURE

GRAIN ELEVATOR FACILITIES AT PRINCE RUPERT—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, before the Easter recess I committed myself to provide supplementary information for Senator Argue with respect to grain elevator facilities at Prince Rupert.

He had asked me if, when looking into the matter of possible construction of a large-capacity grain elevator at Prince Rupert, I would "ascertain whether or not there has been opposition from Pioneer Grain Company and/or the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool for such a facility." Then Senator Argue asked whether the Canadian Wheat Pool was pushing for this facility.

In reply I should like to report that there has been no formal opposition to the government's announcement concerning the development of the Port of Prince Rupert from either Pioneer Grain Company or Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, who are currently engaged in rebuilding and expanding their grain handling facilities in Vancouver. On the contrary, the announcement has generally been well received. The grain trade is being encouraged to build new grain terminal facilities in Prince Rupert to meet the grain export projection of the Canadian Wheat Board. Industry will judge the timing of new construction in Prince Rupert, and this will depend on commercial considerations. The National Harbours Board is responsible for the comprehensive planning and development of Prince Rupert. The board is prepared to offer fully serviced sites on a long-term lease to grain companies seriously interested in building ocean terminals on Ridley Island.

CHARTER AIRLINES WITHIN CANADA

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a reply in response to an inquiry by the Honourable Senator Benidickson, which I shall leave until tomorrow as he is not in the chamber this evening.

BANKRUPTCY BILL, 1978

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill S-11, respecting bankruptcy and insolvency.

He said: Honourable senators, I do not want you to look at this bill, which is in your files, and immediately conclude that it is so terrifying in its volume and/or proportions that it is bound to be very dry and uninteresting. Of course, we know that the subject of bankruptcy and insolvency is not the most interesting in the world. We also know, however, that it must be accepted as a fact of life, and there must be laws that provide for the regulation of insolvencies and bankruptcies.

May I give you a short history of this bill to this moment? In 1975 a new measure was introduced in the other place, Bill C-60, dealing with bankruptcy and insolvency. Immediately a motion was made in the Senate to refer the subject matter of that bill, and any related bills dealing with the subject matter of bankruptcy, to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

For those new senators who joined us tonight I should point out that this reference of subject matter is a procedure we have adopted for some time now in the Senate, so as to have early consideration of important bills that are introduced in the other place, without having to wait for the usual course whereby such bills proceed through first, second and third readings in the other place and then come to us, and then after second reading in the Senate go to a committee for consideration.

• (2030)

As it developed, Bill C-60 was not proceeded with in the House of Commons during that session. As a matter of fact, the then minister indicated to the Senate committee, before which he appeared on another subject, that he would like very much for the committee to undertake a study of the subject matter of the bill. This we did. We heard witnesses, considered briefs which were submitted, and prepared a report which was tabled in this chamber and adopted on December 11, 1975.

Included in that report were 139 amendments, many of them substantial. I can tell you now that the present Bill S-11, which is a revised version of Bill C-60 of 1975 vintage, contains 109 of the amendments which were proposed in the Senate committee report of December 1975. In addition, 19 amendments adopt in part recommendations of the Senate committee, and 11 of the committee's recommendations are not included.

Some amendments were also accepted in the drafting of the bill that is now before us following submissions made by various organizations to the Senate committee. Included in those organizations, as honourable senators will recall, were the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, the Canadian Bar Association, the Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver Stock Exchanges, the Investment Dealers' Association and the Canadian Bankers' Association.

Therefore, we commence our consideration of Bill S-11, with the premise that in it are reflected many of the substantial objections which were made to the committee, and in respect of which the committee made recommendations in its report to this chamber. I do not propose tonight, nor would I propose at any time at this stage in the consideration of a bill, to make a detailed study and examination of its various features. It should be sufficient if I deal with some of the substantial amendments—those that were so regarded by the committee—and indicate where and in what form they occur in this bill.

First of all, I will point out that an examination of the bill will reveal that several clauses are printed in italics. The reason for this is that the government feels that these clauses, by implication at least, involve the appropriation of public money, and under section 53 of the British North America Act money bills must originate in the House of Commons. Therefore, where bills have incidental references involving the expenditure of public funds, there has developed a practice of making the particular clauses so that a Senate committee will not deal with them when it considers such bills. As a matter of fact, the practice which has developed is one of deleting those clauses. The purpose of the italics is to make easily identifiable those clauses with which the Senate has no power to deal.

This evening I intend to indicate the page numbers on which these clauses can be found, and at your convenience you can study them. The page numbers and clauses are as follows: page 13, subclause 11(1), providing for the appointment of a Superintendent of Bankruptcy; pages 14 and 15, subclauses 15(2) and (3), providing for the designation of bankruptcy administrators; page 16, subclause 18(4), providing for the Superintendent to make inquiries; page 35, clause 56, dealing with the Bankruptcy Trust Account; and page 36, clauses 57 and 59, dealing with the Bankruptcy Indemnity Account.

Those wishing to determine whether or not, by implication, a charge or an appropriation of public funds is or is not involved may examine those clauses. Their purpose is as I have just stated.

I should explain what has occurred between the time of the tabling of the committee's report in the Senate in December 1975, and the introduction of Bill S-11. This is a departure from the usual practice when dealing with a bill where money payments are provided for. Usually the House of Commons insists on dealing with bills of that type. There is precedent for such a course of action being followed in the Senate, and I refer you to pages 980 to 983 of Hansard of August 29, 1966, where the then Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Honourable John J. Connolly, gives references to actual cases of where this course of action was followed in the Senate in respect of bills which had, incidental to the achievement of their purposes, some provisions which, by implication, at least, could be said to involve the appropriation of public funds.

● (2040)

One of them, of course, was the obvious one in 1947 when the Senate was dealing with the bill to amend the National Parks Act. In that case the bill, which was introduced in the Senate, actually proposed authority to the National Parks Branch to levy taxes in connection with the maintenance of certain park resources. That, of course, was not by implication an appropriation of money. In my opinion, it could not be so.

Bourinot has a provision on this. Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure is the Canadian authority, and at page 982 of Senate Hansard of August 29, 1966, Senator Connolly quotes from the Fourth Edition, page 493, as follows:

It is frequently found convenient to introduce bills involving public expenditure in the Senate, and in such a case, the money clauses are embodied in the bill as presented, in order to make it more intelligible. When the Senate goes into Committee on the bill, these clauses are ordered to be left out. They are printed in red ink or italics in the engrossed bill sent up to the Commons, and are technically supposed to be blanks.

[Senator Hayden.]

Senator Connolly, in his speech, referred to the procedures in the House of Lords and the House of Commons in Britain where they adopt a similar practice in cases where, incidental to the main purpose of the legislation, there is, by implication, the appropriation of public moneys, and he quoted from a memorandum he had received from Mr. Charles Gordon, the Fourth Clerk at the Table in the House of Lords, as follows:

The methods by which financial provisions are inserted in Bills originating in the Lords (described on pp. 506 and 555 of the 17th Edition of Erskine May) are governed entirely by practice and are not referred to in the Standing Orders of either House.

Although no Money Bill (in the technical sense) can originate in the Lords, Bills from that House containing financial provisions are not uncommon. In the last complete Session of normal length (1964-65), thirty Bills were sent down from the Lords to the Commons. Of these, fourteen were Consolidation Bills, which of their very nature imposed no charge. Of the remaining sixteen, ten contained no financial provisions; five contained a "privilege insertion" later struck out by the Commons (May, p. 506); and the remaining one had a provision left blank for the Commons to fill.

So, you can see that a fairly uniform practice exists, and is acknowledged, in both the British and Canadian Parliaments.

I have summarized very briefly Senator Connolly's speech. It is a speech well worth reading. I thought the Senate was entitled to an explanation as to why certain clauses of this bill appear in italics. The government, in presenting the bill for introduction in the Senate, prepared it in this form, recognizing that, by implication at least, these provisions involved the appropriation of public funds.

I should go back and tell you what happened between 1975 and this time. At the request of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, whose minister is directly in charge of the administration of this bill, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce was asked if it would make available its experts on this subject so that they could work with the officials of the department with a view to resolving the problems, if any, presented by the proposed recommendations contained in the Senate report.

The only stipulation we made was that the chairman of the committee as well had to be au fait with what went on in the discussions, the nature of the discussions, and what, if anything, in the way of compromise was being proposed.

Several drafts of a possible bill were prepared in the course of those discussions, and finally there evolved Bill S-11, with its recognition, as I have already indicated, of the major recommendations on important items contained in the Senate report.

I would think our position this time round, as and when the bill is referred to committee, must be that we are not in a position to object to something that we recommended two years ago, and I do not think there is any thought of that. But there are still several points that may be regarded as being outstanding, and which are contained in the 11 recommendations which were not accepted at all by the drafters of Bill S-11.

Moving on to the next item, the major recommendation of your committee had to do with the proposal in Bill C-60 that wage earners should have a priority up to $2,000 over secured creditors in the event of bankruptcy or insolvency. The committee took a strong view in relation to that proposal, feeling that it would upset the whole business of commercial lending and commercial financing if secured creditors were deprived of their position. The problem would arise in any financing as to how one takes care of that and still make fairly reasonable reports to those investors as to the safety of their security when they are contemplating making loans. In our report, we rejected completely the proposal that there should be this priority, and I can say that in Bill S-11 that priority has been deleted.

The second recommendation we made in that connection had to do with the suggestion that in place of this priority there be established an insurance fund, which fund would be contributed to by the employer and the employee. It would be government-operated, and the unpaid wage claims of wage earners would be paid out of that fund. The department have not seen fit to accept the suggestion. However, they have given an explanation for their not doing so, so I would say it is not an outright rejection. The explanation is that information is not available about unpaid wage claims engendered by the insolvency of business firms, thus preventing an accurate average aggregate of such unpaid claims to be made in Canada each year. However, Bill S-11 includes specific provisions empowering the Superintendent to survey banks, receivers and persons handling mechanics' lien claims with a view to determining the aggregate average unpaid wage claims caused by insolvency or bankruptcy of the employer. This should provide the data for determining the feasibility of setting up such an insurance fund. Then the minister went on to say:

● (2050)

If it can be justified, after careful analysis, a funded insurance scheme would clearly be the most desirable solution to the problem of indemnifying employees who suffer losses of wages as a result of their employer's bankruptcy.

Now I would not regard that as being a negation of our recommendation. Certainly it is a postponement, but I have included that as being a recommendation which was not accepted just so that the tally could be said to be reasonably accurate.

I said earlier that this proposal of priority of wage earners' claims over those of secured creditors was regarded by the committee as being a most important, if not the most important, recommendation of the committee. I should point out to you that the reasons behind that were very simply stated in the report, that such a priority would be likely to create the inevitable disruption of the commercial system of financing, and that labour-intensive industries might well find it extremely difficult to borrow funds. Yet such a proposal would not necessarily assure the wage protection intended. The clause dealing with this question in Bill S-11, if you wish to look at it, is clause 148 on page 95.

Then the other important changes which I might enumerate are: first, the promotion of both consumer and commercial arrangements as an alternative to straight bankruptcy. This is covered in Parts III and IV of the bill. What this means is a method by which, instead of declaring bankruptcy, one might make a consumer or commercial arrangement. A debtor could make the proposal and if the necessary percentage of creditors accepted there would then be an administration to work out either a 100 per cent liquidation of the debts over a period of three years, or a lesser percentage which is acceptable to the creditors.

Another change is the express delegation to the provinces of the administration of consumer arrangements and bankruptcies to maximize the use of local counselling services. That will be found in clause 16 on page 15 of the bill.

The last one—and I do not need to repeat it—is the priority of wage earners over unsecured creditors. When I say “the last one” I should add there is yet another one which deals with the treatment of international insolvencies. This is a matter which has not been particularly dealt with so far as statutes are concerned, and yet international bankruptcies and insolvencies are becoming more current than they were many years ago. This is due, I suppose, to the expansion of the multinational companies and their operations.

If I might digress for a moment, last summer when I was in London there was a committee of one of the departments of government there charged with the study of bankruptcy laws in the various countries forming part of the European Common Market. When they learned that I was going to be in London, and that I was chairman of this committee, they asked if they could sit down with me. So we had quite a chat discussing the information that they were looking for, and it was on this very subject of how bankruptcy and insolvency provisions in the various countries with which they were concerned could be correlated.

A problem used to arise with bankruptcies that took place in Canada when some of the operations and assets were in the United States. I think they are now becoming more lenient, but at one time the courts took the position that they could not recognize a trustee because he was not established or appointed by the court, but they would recognize a liquidator. And this is the way in which, in some measure, things were able to carry on. Now the severity of that treatment has lessened, and there are provisions in this bill to improve that situation. You will find those in clauses 309 to 312, commencing at page 190.

Clause 309 gives the court the power to appoint a liquidator of a bankrupt company whose powers will be recognized by a foreign jurisdiction. Clause 311 enables the court in Canada to assist a foreign court in exercising jurisdiction in bankruptcy matters, and clause 312 gives a foreign representative who is acting in foreign insolvency proceedings the right to apply to a Canadian court for assistance.

It is expected that these changes, being innovative, may also encourage some reciprocity in dealings between the two countries in the matter of bankruptcy operations.

I think that that is possibly a good place for me to stop, and that is exactly what I propose to do, but I should like to state my opinion, for what it is worth, that Bill S-11 is a significant improvement over Bill C-60. It is a creditable attempt to achieve a proper balance of the rights of creditors, debtors and the public, and as such, I think, shows a real effort on the part of the government and the particular department concerned to develop the law in the proper relationship between those three subject matters—that is, the rights of creditors, the rights of debtors and the rights of Mr. Public.

I must say that in the opinion of your committee—and it so stated in its report—Bill C-60 did not achieve that, and it did not appear, from any careful reading, to aim at accomplishing that correlation. It looked very much as though the purpose of the bill was to strengthen the rights and position of debtors at the expense of the creditors. We thought that was an unfair method; we thought it was a destructive and disruptive method from the point of view of the interest of the public and also from the point of view, of course, of financing.

I think I can conclude my remarks with that explanation. My reason for not developing in detail all the clauses of the bill is simply that there are 417 of them covering 125½ pages—there are actually 251 pages, but half of each page is in French and half is in English—plus perhaps another 30 or 40 pages of schedules. Obviously, it is a quite involved bill for consideration, and it is difficult to read. I will not say it is difficult to understand, once you can establish a correlation of subject matter among its different parts. However, in my opinion, it is more properly a job for the committee to which the bill is referred to do that, and then report its findings to the Senate, rather than have the Senate spend a considerable amount of time trying to study it clause by clause without the benefit of experts. The experts, although they would be available to the committee, would not be available if we were considering the bill in the house.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

NORTHERN PIPELINE BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto.

Bill read first time.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, we are not prepared to give leave unless we have some explanation. I should like the government leader to explain what he has in mind, and to the last detail. When does he see debate on second reading ending? Is there any intention to refer the bill to committee? If so, when will the committee sit? When does he expect the committee to report? When does he expect third reading to take place, and following that royal assent? I should like to know that. If there is no urgency about this, let us handle this matter as we do others. If we are going to sit here all next week, we can dispose of this bill in the normal course of our usual sittings. But if the Leader of the Government has something in mind that would require us to give the bill a very definite preference and speedy passage, I should like him to take us into his confidence.

Senator Perrault: I think all honourable senators would agree that it would be most improper for me to suggest that there is some pre-ordained framework within which this important measure must be passed.

Senator Flynn: In the regular course.

Senator Perrault: A rigid position of that kind would suggest at the outset that there is to be an attempt to force the opposition to foreshorten its legitimate right to criticize this bill, or to suggest amendments to it. So, honourable senators, I regret that I cannot provide the kind of schedule which has been requested by the Leader of the Opposition. I can suggest, however, that if it is possible for the second reading speeches to be completed later this day, if honourable senators believe this to be a useful course of action—it will be for them to decide—I have been informed that the special committee is prepared to call for witnesses tomorrow morning or this evening to listen to testimony on the specific clauses of the gas pipeline bill. The progress of the bill from that point will rest with the members of the committee, which of course includes representation from all parties in the Senate.

Honourable senators, I need not review in great detail the importance of this bill to Canada.

Senator Flynn: No, that is not the point. You do not have to do that.

Senator Perrault: One of the reasons for the bill's high priority is the fact that there is the important matter of obtaining the vast financing for the project. There is a real time factor involved here. As well, the project will provide up to 100,000 man years of employment.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Those will not all take place this week.

Senator Perrault: No, that is quite true and that is not the suggestion.

Additionally, we have a situation whereby the United States Congress must also pass legislation, just as must the Parliament of Canada, before the project can get under way. There is an enormous amount of detail associated with the project, vast administrative detail and other considerations. For these and other reasons, it is felt that in view of the importance of the measure it should be given high priority. I do not believe that the official opposition disagrees with that viewpoint.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Perrault: Certainly the opposition parties in the other place dealt with the bill expeditiously and in full realization of the importance of the measure. I do not know whether I have answered adequately the questions posed by the Leader of the Opposition. If leave is given at this point it would be proposed by the government that the second reading statement by the sponsor of the bill would be made later this day, following which the official opposition may decide whether they wish to respond to the remarks of the sponsor.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if I could ask the Leader of the Government whether we have before us the bill as passed by the House of Commons.

Senator Perrault: I have been informed that the bill is in transit now to the Senate, and copies will be made available as soon as possible to honourable senators.

Senator Grosart: So we do not have the bill, but the Leader of the Government is asking leave to proceed with second reading when the bill is not before the Senate.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the words "later this day" were employed in the motion I made. I may say that the subject matter of the bill has been under extensive study and review by the special committee. The contents of the bill are hardly a mystery to members of this chamber who have interested themselves in its subject matter. I understand that four or five meetings have been held and a number of witnesses have been heard with respect to the subject matter. However, the printing of the final amendments made in the other place has taken the Printing Bureau longer than had been anticipated. In any event, I understand that the bill is in transit.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government, first, whether he thinks it reasonable to ask us on this side to respond to the sponsor of the bill when we have not seen the final edition? Secondly, does he really think his explanation has indicated any particular reason for our proceeding more rapidly than our ordinary expeditious procedure would have us do in order to deal with this bill? No one denies that it is a very important bill; we agree that it is. No one denies that it will provide hundreds of thousands of man days of work, or we certainly hope that is the case. However, I ask him whether he really thinks he has told us anything in his response to the other questions which have been asked which would lead us to believe that any of this importance will be impaired or any of these man days of work will be lost should we deal with the bill in our ordinary expeditious procedure?

● (1410)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, certainly no member of the Senate can be faulted for taking the view that fair and adequate consideration of this legislation is essential. The pre-study of the subject matter of bills which come before us is a process which is not understood by many observers and commentators in this country—

Senator Flynn: And perhaps some members of this place, including the Leader of the Government.

Senator Perrault:—but I do not think there is any disagreement in this place concerning the procedure. I do not think any senator disagrees with the technique evolved by the distinguished chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. It is an excellent technique which has served the Canadian public very well. That pre-study procedure, involving careful consideration in advance of the subject matter of bills, has been followed with respect to the proposed legislation regarding the natural gas pipeline.

Honourable senators may well ask what difference a few hours would make as far as the bill's passage is concerned. Superficially, that point of view has some validity, but may I suggest to you that this pipeline is the largest project of its kind ever undertaken in the history of mankind. We are in urgent need of economic development in all parts of this country. The sooner we are able to contact our counterparts in the United States and inform them that Canadian parliamentary approval of the pipeline bill has been given the sooner we can inspire them to give early approval in Congress so that the project can proceed.

The challenge of obtaining the vast amounts of financing which confront Foothills Pipe Lines (Yukon) Ltd. is a responsibility not to be taken lightly. Additionally, I am sure that all honourable senators want to convey to the Canadian people that all parliamentarians, regardless of party affiliation, are in basic support of this project, a project which will generate such vast benefits for this country.

Senator Smith (Colchester): There is no doubt that all of us in this chamber agree with the Leader of the Government in terms of the importance of the bill and the great sums of money involved in it. But, I am still wondering why we should not deal with this bill in the ordinary manner, which would mean that, basing it on past experience, the Senate would deal with this bill expeditiously in all its stages. Because it is so important, does it not require more consideration than usual?

The practice of pre-studying the subject matter of a bill has only been available to the 14 or 15 members of the committee and not the house as a whole. Would you not agree that, bearing in mind the importance which is imputed to the bill, which I accept completely, that a more careful study should be conducted rather than taking the chance of letting things slip by?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I want to provide this assurance: There are no factors known to me, outside of the important ones which I have stated, which would suggest the need for urgent passage of this particular bill. The suggestion that there are other factors has no basis in any fact that is known to me. Additionally, I should like to reiterate that it is not the intention of the government to restrict the right of any senator to participate in the debate on a matter of such national importance. It would be unfair and completely wrong for the government to suggest that there is any urgency sufficient to restrict the right of any senator to speak on this matter. I wish to provide that assurance.

There is a feeling, however, that we should indicate to the country our support for this project. We can do that by getting on with the job here, by moving as quickly as possible on this measure. It is for that reason that leave is asked that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later today.

Honourable senators on the other side may decide, after hearing the sponsor's speech, whether or not they wish to respond today. That is their right. It may be that they will wish to defer until a later date further debate and discussion of this measure. That is their right and no one here would wish to restrict that right. At this time we are merely seeking to provide the opportunity for the sponsor of this measure in the Senate to speak to it and to indicate its importance for the Canadian people. Honourable senators will then be in a position to judge whether or not they wish the debate to continue this evening or tomorrow and whether they want time to go through the bill, which I understand is now on the desks of all honourable senators. That is the appeal which I make to the chamber.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, on a lighter note, I wonder if I might congratulate the Leader of the Government on the fastest action and answer we have had from him in the time he has been with us in his present capacity. Within two minutes of my request, the bill arrived on my desk.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government referred to the fact that the bill has been the subject of a pre-study by the Special Committee of the Senate on a Northern Gas Pipeline.

Senator Perrault: The subject matter.

Senator Flynn: The subject matter, yes. But are you aware that we could not continue that study because the questions that were of importance at that time concerned some amendments which were proposed in the other place? We have only now received those amendments in the bill as passed by the other place.

Were we to give you the assurance that, as far as we are concerned—and I am sure the Leader of the Government has complete control on his side—we will expedite the passage of this bill so that it receives royal assent on Thursday of next week, would that be satisfactory?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, first of all, may I endeavour to reply to the first question. The Leader of the Opposition has indicated that there may be some complication as a result of certain recent amendments which had been advanced in the other place and that in some fashion this fact may lead to the need for longer study on this side—

Senator Flynn: On your side?

Senator Perrault: In this chamber.

Senator Flynn: Oh, I see.

Senator Perrault: Second reading debate, of course, is a debate on the principle of the bill. It seems to me that any senator who may wish to speak to the principle of the bill has long known its principle. The principle of the bill, to my mind, could well be discussed without delay and, indeed, might well be dealt with later this day, or perhaps during an evening sitting today. But that is only a suggestion. I do not suggest that the government is attempting to insist on that as a course of action.

What is clear, however, is that when the bill reaches committee stage, honourable senators will have more than ample opportunity to discuss in detail the amendments which were advanced in the other place. It is at that stage that the late amendments to which the Leader of the Opposition has referred can be discussed and debated, and on which expert testimony can be heard.

With respect to the generous offer of the Leader of the Opposition to enable a representative of Her Majesty to come here for royal assent on Thursday of next week, may I say that that kind of timetable is not one to which the government is prepared to give its assent. It may well be that when certain honourable senators see the nature of the bill and the details of the bill they may wish to express their voting assent or dissent before Thursday of next week, or even beyond that date.

Senator Flynn: Beyond?

Senator Perrault: Perhaps we should not agree to any rigid timetable such as Thursday of next week. It may well be that honourable senators on the government side will wish to go beyond the schedule suggested by the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: You are not worried about that at all, then?

Senator Croll: He said “may.”

Senator Flynn: You are not worried about the fact that the bill may be delayed until after Thursday of next week. If that is the case, then you don't need leave.

● (1420)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we hope to have this important bill considered as quickly as possible in order to indicate the positive attitude of Parliament toward the greatest public work project ever undertaken on this continent. Certainly, we on this side intend to proceed as expeditiously as possible. Those who wish to contribute to the debate on this side or the other side will be given a full opportunity to do so. That is the essence of the suggestion made by the government, and the only request made to the opposition is for co-operation in the process.

Senator Flynn: I will be blunt. As far as we are concerned, if there is to be dissolution we might as well vote on an imperfect bill right away than a more perfect bill in 10 days. But if there is no problem with dissolution of Parliament then we would rather refine the bill, if that is possible. But we do not want the government to be delayed in its decision to dissolve Parliament just for the purpose of refining this bill. But if we can have a long debate to refine the bill, then we would rather have that. It is the choice of the Leader of the Government.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is hoped, at least, that the bill can be started today and it may well be that members on the government side and on the opposition side may have their own ideas with respect to the “refining” process referred to by Senator Flynn. It should be observed, however, that in the other place the leader of the party which the distinguished Leader of the Opposition here represents so eloquently spelled out in considerable detail his views with respect to “refining”, and I understand that a number of proposals advanced by the opposition in the other place were accepted by the government in a spirit of co-operative Canadianism. It is hoped that the same spirit will prevail, as well, in this chamber.

Senator Flynn: It always does. You do not have to worry about that. But I suggest that you ask this leave later so that those on this side who have the responsibility of looking at the bill may have half an hour or so in which to do that, and in the meantime we can proceed with the other items on the order paper. Then when we have reached the end of the items on the order paper, you can put your request again.

Senator Perrault: That is perfectly satisfactory.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Canadian Livestock Feed Board for the crop year ended July 31, 1977, including its accounts and financial statement certified by the Auditor General for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1977, pursuant to section 22 of the Livestock Feed Assistance Act, Chapter L-9, R.S.C. 1970.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Phillips be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Macdonald, on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Perrault, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Senator Grosart: Is the Leader of the Government indicating that there is some urgency for this committee to sit while the Senate is sitting?

Senator Perrault: I think it would be appropriate to have the chairman of this committee provide the explanation for this.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, it is the committee's idea to study the subject matter of Bill C-29, which is before the House of Commons and is at the second reading stage there. It is most urgent to have the bill passed during the present session because the Farm Credit Corporation needs additional capital. The bill is bringing forward some important amendments, most of which were suggested by Senator Hays a couple of years ago. If we can complete the preliminary study we will then be in a position to deal with the bill more expeditiously.

We have the officials slated to come before us this afternoon and we would like the opportunity to go ahead and do the work of the committee by meeting with those officials.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Grosart: May I ask further whether there is no other time when the committee could sit, because it has been the view on this side at least, and I think the view of honourable senators on the other side, that it should only be in cases of emergency that committees have power to sit while the Senate is sitting. In the statement just made, except for the fact that the witnesses have already been called, which I object to, I see no urgency, although I am not at the moment saying I will withhold leave.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, this is our slot. It is most difficult to work on Wednesday afternoons. We have had the situation on prior occasions when the work of the Senate, as is proper, has gone forward and we have had witnesses waiting all afternoon until perhaps 5 o'clock before we have had a chance to meet. Moreover, there is urgency in that this is an exceedingly important bill for farmers in all provinces of Canada. It is urgent that it be passed and receive royal assent before any eventual dissolution.

Senator Flynn: When will that be?

Senator Argue: Indeed, it is just as urgent from a farmer's standpoint as is the pipeline bill from a national standpoint.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL REVENUE

INVESTMENT OF RRSP's IN TRUST FUNDS—QUESTION

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I note with regret the absence of the Minister of National Revenue, despite the fact that I advised him yesterday that I intended to ask him a question. I suggest he is very quickly falling into the bad habit of being absent during the question period which, in the Senate, is sometimes slower in coming than elsewhere. Nevertheless, I am going to ask him this question.

[English]

Senator McElman: You should not have warned him.

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the Government said I was giving him notice. I said I was warning him. He believed me rather than believing the Leader of the Government. Anyway, I will put the question and he can read it in Hansard and that will be the notice that the Leader of the Government suggested I should give him. It is not a warning.

The problem is in connection with the investment of registered retirement savings plans in annuities as opposed to trust funds. That debate has been going on for some time, and I understand that the Department of National Revenue is in favour of investing RRSP's in trust funds as well as in annuities, this, in opposition to the position taken by the Department of Finance. I was wondering whether this matter has been or is likely soon to be resolved. Since he can read my question in Hansard, I hope that the minister will be in a position to reply.

● (1430)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in the absence of my colleague, I shall make certain that the question is brought to the notice of the Minister of National Revenue for his attention so that an answer will be forthcoming.

MIDDLE EAST

PARTICIPATION OF CANADA IN UNITED NATIONS PEACEKEEPING FORCE IN SOUTHERN LEBANON— SUPPLEMENTARY QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, yesterday the honourable Senator Olson asked a supplementary question with respect to the Canadian contingent in southern Lebanon. He asked whether all the parties, such as Lebanon, Israel, Syria, the PLO, and so on, who have a great interest in that area, had given their assurance of cooperation with the UN force that is going in.

I have been informed that Lebanon requested the presence of UN troops. Israel has provided verbal assurance that its forces would be withdrawn when UNIFIL is deployed. Kuwait voted for the creation of UNIFIL in the Security Council. This was done, I have been informed, as a result of consultations by Kuwait with Syria, Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia. The Lebanese Christians have tendered no formal agreement. The PLO has provided unofficial indications of cooperation. It should be noted that the PLO is neither a fully united nor a well-disciplined organization. In sum, the UN is dealing with all groups involved in Lebanon at some level.

BANKRUPTCY BILL, 1978

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Hayden for the second reading of Bill S-11, respecting bankruptcy and insolvency.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I am quite satisfied that this bill, the Bankruptcy Bill, 1978, is not as urgent as the pipeline bill. As was indicated by the sponsor last night, in 1975 we had Bill C-60, dealing with bankruptcy and insolvency. That bill was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which studied it extensively and presented a report dated December 11, 1975. As a consequence of that report, the bill was redrafted and has now been introduced in the Senate. As the sponsor indicated, 109 of the 139 amendments recommended by the committee have been accepted entirely. In addition, 19 amendments were proposed and adopted in part. Only 11 of the committee's recommendations are not included.

I wish to say that I, as well as, I am sure, all members of the Senate, are very much indebted to the sponsor of the bill for his expert analysis and explanation of the bill last night. As he said, the subject of bankruptcy and insolvency is a complex matter, because one has to deal with the rights of the debtor, of the creditor and of the public, and to keep a proper balance between those often conflicting interests is not an easy matter.

The first bill was the product of that period when the government, on the advice of the technocrats, was revising all the major legislation, including fiscal legislation, consumers' protection legislation, bankruptcy, and so on. We had to revamp all our legislation, and out of that came some rather funny—perhaps I should say phony—ideas, such as, for instance, giving preference over secured creditors to the extent of $2,000 in wages for each worker in a corporation or enterprise. As indicated by the committee chairman last night, and strongly supported by the committee, that would have disrupted the method of financing our enterprises. It was nonsensical. I am very happy, as far as this is concerned, that the government has accepted our recommendation, because it is unbelievable that such an idea would occur to the draftsman, or the one responsible for the philosophy, if you will, behind Bill C-60. I am quite sure that many other foolish ideas have been eliminated.

I did not have time to go into the details of the new bill; besides I think that this can more properly be done in committee. In any event, very often when you read this kind of thing, if you do not have an opportunity to discuss it with someone else you do not grasp the immediate effect of the text.

Of course, the committee at that time—and it was not my view—was concerned, as was the original architect of the bill, about the problem of workers who would lose wages in the event of a bankruptcy, and recommended that a funded insurance scheme be established to provide indemnification in those cases. I think this idea arose from the fact that if we were going to reject the idea of preference over secured creditors we should try to find some kind of solution along this line. But, to me, the idea of trying to solve everybody's problems is characteristic of the thinking of those who are in favour of a welfare state which, though we may be close to having one in Canada, we have not yet achieved.

You have to remember that the wages of workers are already privileged. They are not preferred to the claims of the secured creditors, but they are preferred over a lot of other claims, and if the situation is that bad, it means that this privilege means nothing, and if we are going to secure or indemnify these people with an insurance scheme, I shudder to think where we are going to stop in our quest to solve everyone's problems. As far as I am concerned I am very happy that the government did not accept the alternative proposed by the committee. The chairman said he would not regard this as a negation of our recommendation. If it is not a negation, it is an acceptance of our main recommendation not to disrupt the whole system by giving a preference over secured creditors with regard to the wages of workers of a bankrupt company, corporation or enterprise.

I was also intrigued by the comments made by the sponsor of the bill with regard to the so-called money provisions in this bill. I looked up the debate that was referred to, and I found that at that time we discussed the whole problem of what a money bill is and is not, and whether it should be only an appropriation or a taxing bill. As far as I am concerned this should have been the historical interpretation, although in fact it was not.

I have been in the Senate over 15 years and I have not yet seen in operation the process advocated by Bourinot, and which is followed in the House of Lords, of putting certain clauses in blank, or in italics, or in red. I think Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) mentioned that in the debate of 1966. These were indicated as not being the concern of the Senate nor of the committee of the Senate. This is the first time, to my knowledge, that we will have experienced that.

● (1440)

I am very much interested in, and am in favour of, that technique, but if we say we are not going to adopt these clauses because of the financial implications contained in them, should we not give our advice on them even though we do not agree with them? Eventually these clauses must come to us and then the Senate will have to concur in the amendments to include these clauses in the bill. The Senate will be called upon to ratify the amendments.

Therefore, if we are of the opinion that these clauses should be changed or should not be adopted, we should at least give our advice for whatever it's worth and without offending the other place in doing so.

In any event, perhaps my comments will have no effect. The bill will be referred to committee and discussed with the experts that the committee usually has at its service. Before the committee can bring in a report an election will surely have been called.

Bill C-60 died on the order paper, and I am very much afraid this bill will suffer the same fate. In the meantime, the process of improving the bankruptcy and insolvency legislation will continue, and perhaps in the end we will have a much better measure than Bill C-60, and perhaps even better than this one.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Hayden moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

CONFERENCE ON SECURITY AND CO-OPERATION IN EUROPE

VISIT BY PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION TO BELGRADE, YUGOSLAVIA—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 21, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Thompson calling the attention of the Senate to his recent visit to the Helsinki Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, before proceeding with my speech, I should like to welcome to this chamber the seven new senators who were sworn in yesterday, particularly the two lady senators, and to greet Senator Duff Roblin, Senator Jack Marshall, Senator Stanley Haidasz and Senator Joseph Guay, whom I know personally. With their vast experience in political, national and community life, we can look forward to their active participation in the many-sided work of the Senate, and to significant contributions in many fields.

The two former Ministers of State for Multiculturalism, for example, will be able to pursue effectively their special interests inside and outside this chamber. I am sure that the large Polish community in Canada is happy with the appointment of Senator Haidasz whom they have regarded as their spokesman.

At this time I should like to make special reference to Senator Duff Roblin. I came into this chamber in February 1963, when he was Premier of Manitoba. Today I would like to express my sincere thanks to him for his support which was instrumental in my appointment to this office. I know that he will be a great asset to the Senate in many ways. Premier Roblin made an indelible impression upon me and some 50,000 people in July 1961 at the unveiling of the monument to the great Ukrainian poet, Taras Shevchenko, before the Legislative Building in Winnipeg. In his eloquent address he recited an important passage from Shevchenko's poetry of 1838 in beautiful Ukrainian, and I quote:

Uchitesya, braty moyi,
Dumayte, chytayte,
I chuzhoho nauchaytesh,
Svoho ne tsuraytesh.

Senator Flynn: The interpretation system is not working.

Senator Yuzyk: Here is the English translation:

Study, my brethern,
Think and read,
Learn about other cultures,
Do not shun your own.

This is a maxim that applies very well in our pluralistic society, to all the various ethnicultural groups, particularly in the implementation of the federal policy of multiculturalism.

Honourable senators, following the reports of Senator Bosa, Senator Thompson and Senator Marchand there is no need for me to present a detailed account of the deliberations that took place at the Belgrade Review Conference of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe which was signed by 35 European states, including the United States and Canada, at Helsinki, Finland, on August 1, 1975. I participated twice as a parliamentary observer at the Belgrade Conference—two weeks in November, 1977, and two weeks in February last, just prior to the closing.

During the months of October, November and December, the 400 delegates of the 35 nations made an extensive review of the implementation of the various sections of the Final Act. This was done in committees and working sessions of the conference. Very little of the deliberations appeared in the news because these meetings and sessions were held in camera and therefore closed to the press. Consequently, there was very little press coverage of this event, except after it was concluded.

I attended meetings of all the committees as well as several plenary sessions. The statements and exchanges of views on security, economic, social and cultural matters were made by ambassadors and delegates in rather low key. On the other hand, the discussions on human rights and humanitarian issues often became heated and even explosive. At times the delegates of the Soviet Union and the Soviet-bloc countries threatened to walk out, but, however, did not carry out such threats.

Some 100 proposals were tabled, none of which reached the recommendation or resolution stage, as the conference operated by consensus. This virtual veto was effectively applied by the Soviet-bloc states even against proposed compromises; it was sometimes used by the other states.

Canada's role, as presented by Ambassador W.T. Delworth and his competent staff, was very evident throughout the conference. We had the largest number of parliamentarians in attendance of any country, a total of 19. Canada dealt with human rights; humanitarian issues; the role of the individual, institutions and organizations in the implementation of the Final Act; the elimination of certain administrative barriers to human contacts, particularly in cases of family re-unification and family visits; and the freer flow of information and ideas. The other proposals dealt with confidence-building measures, a convention on terrorism and a draft of the concluding document, as was explained by Senator Thompson. Canada was a staunch supporter and defender of the human rights and humanitarian issues of Basket III of the Helsinki Final Act and co-operated closely with the United States and other NATO countries.

January, February and part of March were devoted to discussions, often stormy, of the content of the concluding document, as was required by the Helsinki Declaration. Several drafts were presented by a number of countries, including what was called a compromise draft by the neutral and non-aligned states, as well as a Canadian one, but these were all unacceptable. Finally, a modified version of the Soviet document, after it went through several revisions, was agreed upon, I must say very reluctantly, by the democratic states.

This puny four-page statement makes no reference whatsoever to the fundamental issue of human rights that was discussed at the conference. The only real accomplishment in this communiqué was the agreement to hold another review conference in the fall of 1980 in Madrid, Spain, and to hold a meeting of experts to prepare a "scientific forum", and a meeting of experts on the Mediterranean question. A mountain gave birth to a mouse.

Canada's closing statement was made by the Honourable Norman Cafik, Minister of State for Multiculturalism and the special representative of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He stated that the minimal document was a disappointment to the government as it did not reflect the vital substantive concerns of the participating states. Canada, he said, has placed particular emphasis on the humanitarian dimension of the CSCE process, and that the meeting in Belgrade "has confirmed us in our view that human rights will remain a central preoccupation of our government".

Canada came to the defence of the dissidents who are monitoring the implementation of the Helsinki Agreement in the Soviet Union and the satellite states by saying:

There is evidence that individuals who have tried to exercise rights that are endorsed in the Final Act are still being harassed, exiled, arrested, tried and imprisoned. This has led the Parliament of Canada to adopt resolutions as a unanimous expression of its deep concern in respect of what we see as violations of fundamental human rights. We earnestly hope that the attention that we have focussed on these matters will encourage governments to reflect on the negative impact of their practices.

Referring to the fact that détente must have a human dimension, Mr. Cafik stressed that:

Our concerns on these humanitarian issues are not motivated by a desire to wage ideological warfare, or to interfere in the internal affairs of other countries.

Further on in his speech, Mr. Cafik stated that there will be skepticism about the value of the CSCE process, or even about détente itself. Noting that détente does not have an independent existence, but is a two-way street, he warned that:

The public will weigh the reality of détente on the basis of results. We suspect, in view of the high expectations of our public, that it will be a source of disappointment in Canada that the ideas that we hold to be so fundamental and which we have advanced so persistently and strongly have not been reflected in the document because of this meeting's inability to achieve consensus. However, we reaffirm our continuing commitment to these concepts and values.

In conclusion, the Canadian spokesman asserted that the Canadian government "remains firmly attached to the policy of détente," but that the heart of the matter must be that the commitments freely undertaken at Helsinki must be carried out in practice by all the signatories. Looking forward to the next review conference, he was still hopeful, as is indicated in the following passage:

At Madrid [two years hence] we shall have a clearer picture of where we stand. It will then be five years from the signature of the Final Act. Public opinion in our countries is not likely to grant us much of a further reprieve if we are not seen by them to have pursued the course we charted together at Helsinki with a greater sense of commitment and with greater imagination. Belgrade and Madrid may be important milestones on that course. But the real test of the CSCE lies in the commitment we are prepared to give to its continuity, and in whether concrete adjustments will be made in our national policies. We should not look to a miracle at Madrid to relieve us of the responsibilities of proper performance between now and then.

The Canadian minister took up the matter of human rights and the dissidents in a face-to-face meeting with the Soviet ambassador, Yuli Vorontsov. Canada offered to accept some of the Soviet dissidents as immigrants. The reply was terse: those arrested had violated the law and will be judged by the law. Mr. Cafik also got no place with the question of the reunification of families and the freedom of the movement of people and ideas.

I should now like to make a few concluding remarks about the achievement of the Belgrade Review Conference as embodied in the "Concluding Document".

When we look back at the Helsinki Declaration of 1975 we must remember that the Western democracies and the Soviet Union with its satellites signed this Final Act with different and diverging motives and objectives. The Western countries, particularly those in NATO, stressed paramountly the respect of human rights and a freer exchange of ideas and people across the borders in order to gradually liberalize the communist societies, and thus bring them closer to our Western societies. The Soviet Union with the Warsaw Pact countries, however, stressed the relaxation of tensions in Europe through the détente, the ratification of the international borders that had been established by the Soviet occupation of the Baltic states and the satellites, freer trade and accessibility to Western technology, thus regarding the Helsinki Accord as a kind of peace treaty ending the Second World War.

In assessing the implementation of the Final Act at the Belgrade Conference both sides judged the outcome from their own point of view. There was some agreement that progress, even how little, had been made and therefore the exercise was considered worthwhile. The West, however, was greatly disappointed that the Soviet Union down-played the issue of human rights, assailing the Western democracies for interfering in the internal affairs of the Soviet Union and the "Socialist countries" and defending all dissidents, who were regarded by the U.S.S.R. as criminals.

One thing must be made very clear at this time. The signatories of the Helsinki Final Act are not allies. The 15 NATO countries are allies dedicated to the principles of freedom, democracy and human rights. The Warsaw Pact countries, under the leadership of the Soviet Union, are their own allies, dedicated to the propagation of communism, the destruction of capitalism and world revolution—the antithesis of the way of life that we hold dear. The communist-bloc countries evidently are our enemies. In our dealings with them, this must always be kept in mind. They treat the Western democracies as enemies.

[Senator Yuzyk.]

● (1500)

It is a mistake to assume that the Communist leaders honour their agreements. The communist approach to treaties was defined by Stalin, who, during the Second World War, was an ally of the Western World powers, in the following manner:

Words must have no relation to action—otherwise what kind of diplomacy is it? Words are one thing, actions another. Good words are a mask for the concealment of bad deeds. Sincere diplomacy is no more possible than dry water or iron wood.

Let us look at the record of the Soviet Union in the implementation of treaties. The United States Senate Judiciary Committee, in its investigations, has recorded the details of over 100 Soviet treaty violations. The study was published officially in 1964 under the title Soviet Political Agreements and Results. The conclusion of the chairman, Senator James Eastland, should be remembered. He said:

Since the Soviet Union came into existence, its Government has broken its word to virtually every country to which it ever gave a signed promise. It signed treaties of nonaggression with neighbouring states and then absorbed those states. It signed promises to refrain from revolutionary activity inside the countries with which it sought "friendship", and then cynically broke those promises. It was violating the first agreement it ever signed with the United States at the very moment the Soviet envoy, Litvinov, was putting his signature to that agreement, and it is still violating the same agreement . . .

I seriously doubt whether during the whole history of civilization any great nation has ever made as perfidious a record as this in so short a time.

So, bearing in mind this perfidious record, what else can be expected from the Soviet Union with respect to the Helsinki Agreement? Obviously, the U.S.S.R. is playing a game applying its own rules. Insistence by the West on the implementation of human rights in the Soviet Union, which had signed this declaration, provoked anger on the part of the chief Soviet delegate. Ostensibly in self-defence, Ambassador Vorontsov assailed the Western states for attempting to "sidetrack the (Belgrade) meeting on to the path of psychological warfare and to turn it into an arena of ideological confrontation."

There are circles that look upon the Belgrade Conference with cynicism and despair, and understandably so. It does appear that the Soviet Union has no intention of honouring the Helsinki promises, while at the same time it is increasing repressive measures against the dissidents as well as increasing its military might. But one must not lose sight of the efficacy of the Helsinki principles and the Helsinki process.

The publication in Pravda in Moscow of the full texts of the Helsinki Accords in the fall of 1975 gave a new impetus to the Soviet dissidents and to the human rights movement in the U.S.S.R. On May 12, 1976, a Helsinki monitoring group was organized in Moscow, headed by Academician Yuri Orlov. Later in November a similar group was formed in Kiev, Ukraine. The chairman, Mykola Rudenko, and the secretary of this group, Yury Tykhy, were arrested in February 1977, and later tried, the former receiving a seven-year prison term and five years' exile, and the latter a 10-year term and five years' exile. Both houses of the Canadian parliament unanimously protested these arrests and requested the prisoners' release, but to no avail. Other Helsinki monitoring committees sprang up in Lithuania, Georgia and elsewhere.

Russian activists such as Sakharov, Solzhenitsyn, Bukovsky and others supported these groups. Despite repressions, arrests and expulsions of some leading dissidents, the human rights movement appears to be steadily growing in the U.S.S.R. and other communist countries.

These courageous people, who are risking their lives for the cause, are fully aware that the Soviet Union torpedoed the human rights issue at the Belgrade Conference. The Soviet dissidents, as well as those in the satellite countries, are pinning their hopes on the implementation of the Helsinki principles. We who believe in these principles cannot let them down. The Helsinki process must continue and become more effective at the forthcoming Madrid Review Conference in 1980.

In response to critics who state that increased pressure from the West impels the Kremlin forcibly to crush dissent, Andrei Sakharov, the father of the Soviet hydrogen bomb, Nobel Prize winner, and the guiding light of the human rights movement in the U.S.S.R., said that détente unaccompanied by increased trust and democratization was a danger, not a blessing, that rapprochement without democratization in the U.S.S.R. was worse than no rapprochement at all. With answering faith in the cause of human rights, Sakharov, on behalf of the dissidents, makes the following appeal to the Western democracies:

Resolute and ever-growing pressure by public and official bodies of the West—up to the highest—the defence of principles and of specific people can only bring positive results. Every case of human rights violations must become a political problem for the leaders of the culprit countries.

The three annual sessions of the North Atlantic Assembly of NATO, which were held subsequent to the signing of the Helsinki Final Act, placed great emphasis on "a comprehensive application of the Helsinki Principles," particularly on the free flow of information and people. Member governments of NATO were urged "to monitor carefully the implementation of human, cultural, educational and information obligations so that a detailed accounting may be presented to the follow-up conference in Belgrade".

A Standing Subcommittee on the Free Flow of Information and People was established, and it has been regularly publishing a quarterly-bulletin that has been intensively presenting the monitoring of the Helsinki Act by most of the NATO countries. The Canadian government has been fully co-operating in the monitoring process. This constant monitoring pressure, which has already yielded some tangible results—family reunification, for example—will continue and will be reviewed at the Twenty-fourth North Atlantic Assembly in Lisbon this fall.

In June 1977, a Canadian Parliamentary Helsinki Group, chaired by the Honourable Martin O'Connell, was established in Ottawa. It has heard briefs from the Canadian Committee of Captive European Nations and has brought their requests to the Canadian government. These have included the utilization not only of "quiet diplomacy" but also "loud diplomacy", as expressed through peaceful public demonstrations of citizen groups, protests in the press and protests in our Parliament. The Canadian Parliamentary Helsinki Group is inviting all parliamentarians—and this includes senators—to a meeting in the Railway Committee Room on April 6, 1978 at 12 o'clock noon, to hear the Canadian Ambassador, W. T. Delworth, discuss the Belgrade Conference.

Let us constantly keep in mind that the Soviet Union has been an aggressor since its establishment by the Russian Communist Party (Bolsheviks) in 1917. At the end of the First World War, and immediately after, it subverted and conquered with the Red Army the following democracies, the Ukrainian National Republic, the Byelorussian National Republic and other Caucasian republics, and incorporated them into the U.S.S.R. During the Second World War, and immediately after, the Red Army occupied the Baltic states—Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia—which were annexed by the U.S.S.R. in 1940 as Soviet republics, similar to the Ukraine and Byelorussia. The Soviet Union with the Red Army then occupied the following democratic states of Poland, Romania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Czechoslovakia, as well as East Germany, which were subverted, sovietized and converted into subsidiary satellites. On the path of aggression, the Russian power threatened to overrun other European democracies. The United Nations, in which the U.S.S.R. applied its veto, was powerless to act.

● (1510)

In order to defend democracy and freedom, and stop the further aggression of the Soviet Union, the Western states of Europe and North America formed the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, NATO, in 1948 and, later, its parliamentary component, the North Atlantic Assembly. NATO is a protective alliance, the bulwark of freedom and democracy. The U.S.S.R. soon after established an alliance with the satellite states, known as the Warsaw Pact, which has been putting constant pressure on the adjacent countries. Judging from the Soviet military interference in the Hungarian revolt of 1956 as well as in Czechoslovakia in 1968, during which events the Western powers remained passive, the Soviet Union would probably have made advances elsewhere in Europe if it had not been for the border clashes with Red China.

While promoting détente the Soviet Union in recent years has been steadily building up its military forces on all fronts at an alarming pace, surpassing NATO's conventional forces and equipment. The Western democracies are today faced with the greatest threat since the inception of NATO. The lesson is obvious. We must not be caught with our guard down. The retaliatory capacity of the NATO forces must be improved rapidly. It is gratifying that Canada has assumed a larger share of this responsibility.

Détente must not be allowed to mesmerize the West into complacency. Human rights is now one of our strongest weapons against the menace of the enemy. Let us strengthen NATO and support the implementation of human rights in Canada and in all countries which are signatories of the Helsinki Final Act. As this movement is gathering greater momentum in various parts of the troubled world, it has ushered in the age of human rights, in which Canada can play a significant role, having already enacted the Canadian Human Rights Act.

On motion of Senator Haidasz, debate adjourned.

NORTHERN PIPELINE BILL

SECOND READING

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, that the Bill C-25, intituled: "An Act to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto," be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading this day.

Senator Flynn: Leave is granted.

Hon. H. A. Olson moved the second reading of Bill C-25.

He said: Honourable senators, I want to begin by expressing my appreciation to all members of this house, and especially to the leader and other members of the opposition, who have given leave to proceed to second reading today.

Although we have only just received from the other place this bill to provide for the establishment of a northern gas pipeline, I know that many honourable senators have followed the progress of this whole project very carefully, and indeed are quite familiar with its provisions. Of course, the measure has already been given some advance consideration by the special committee which was established early in March for that purpose. I should say, for those honourable senators who have only in the last few minutes received a copy of the bill as passed by the House of Commons, that there are only two amendments that make it different from the bill that was considered by the special committee before Easter.

We did at that time have the amendments that were moved and carried in the special committee of the House of Commons. Of course, there was then the report stage when a number of amendments—I believe 11—were accepted for debate in the House of Commons, but only two of those did, in fact, pass, and they are, therefore, included in the reprint of Bill C-25 which we received a few minutes ago. I shall refer to them specifically, if any honourable senator wishes me to do so, at the end of my brief comments.

[Senator Yuzyk.]

Honourable senators, this is an historic bill, providing, as it does, for Canada to join with the United States in one of the largest private projects ever undertaken anywhere in the world. The project involves construction of a multi-billion dollar northern pipeline—and that, by the way, is excluding the further cost of a lateral to the Mackenzie Delta—which altogether will cover a distance of nearly 5,500 miles, to transport gas from the northern supply to southern customers in both Canada and the United States. The legislation before the Senate for its consideration will implement the terms of the agreement between the governments of Canada and the United States that was signed in Ottawa last September.

It also provides for the establishment of a northern pipeline agency to provide what has been termed a single regulatory authority to exercise all federal responsibilities directly related to building the pipeline system by the Foothills group. One of the underlying objectives of this legislation is to ensure that this mammoth project is undertaken in a way that will maximize its potential economic, industrial and social benefits for Canada, while at the same time minimizing the adverse social and environmental aspects.

The potential benefits of this system for Canada are considerable. It will provide us with at least one access to the present and future reserves established in the Mackenzie Delta and, I might say, in the Beaufort Sea as well, in line with our national goal of establishing Canada's self-reliance in energy.

It will provide a much needed boost to consumer and business confidence in this country, and a strong stimulus to output and employment. It is estimated that the total project in Canada, including the construction of the lateral Dempster link to the Mackenzie Delta, will provide an additional 100,000 man-years of employment in this country.

The project will have a strong favourable impact on Canada's balance of payments position. There are some estimates of the size of this influence. We cannot project with precision at this time how much of the debt, that is, the loan, the borrowed money, that will be used in the building of the project will be raised in Canada and how much in the United States. Therefore, it is a little difficult to try to predict with precision the amount of additional inflow of American money that would help us in our present situation with respect to the dollar, so I will not try to do that. I think it is fair to say, however, that in the initial years, when the construction is going on, that the size of this inflow of foreign exchange will be greater than after the project is completely constructed.

Bearing that in mind for a moment, what I can be a little more precise about is predicting the amount of earnings in United States funds that will be available to Canada to assist in this international exchange problem. We know, from the company's testimony before the committee, that the annual earnings by this project after it is in place and operating will be in excess of $800 million annually, and these earnings will be paid in United States dollars.

Offsetting that to some extent—I should say, to a significant extent—will be the annual payments of both principal and interest on money that is borrowed in the United States. There is no doubt at all, honourable senators, that during the construction period, and for however long the project is in place, there will be a favourable balance in the international market so far as Canada is concerned.

It may be interesting for us to hear one other statistic related to that, and that is that at the present time there are known reserves in the Prudhoe Bay area of some 30 trillion cubic feet. That is enough to keep this pipeline filled at the rate of over two billion cubic feet per day for 40 years. Therefore, although the size of the pipe, at 56 inches, and with an operating pressure of 1,180 pounds per square inch, sounds enormous, I would like to set at rest any fears that there are insufficient gas reserves to keep it going, because those that are known to date—and there is a great potential for more reserves—are sufficient to keep this line fully supplied for 40 years.

While there may be some adverse effects experienced in the north during the actual construction, on balance there is every reason to believe that both in the short term and over the longer term the project will, on balance, yield substantial benefits to the people who live there.

Yukon workers will be given preference in training and hiring in respect of construction and operation of the system. Yukon businesses will also enjoy a preferred position in the procurement of goods and services for the system. While permanent opportunities in connection with the operation of the system are not large, there is every prospect that it will serve as a catalyst and will help to foster other industrial development in the years ahead. This, of course, includes accelerated petroleum exploration and development in the western Arctic, and possible extension of the electrical generating capacity in the Yukon that will be required to enable new industrial projects to go forward.

We have already learned that the compressors that will be put in place along the way, especially in the Yukon—and perhaps also in the rest of the pipeline—will be designed in such a way that the gas turbine engines driving the pumps can be easily removed and replaced with electrical motors if the necessary amount of electrical power becomes available along the line.

The ability of the Yukon to benefit from the project will be substantially enhanced by the financial arrangements agreed to with the United States under which the pipeline company will be required to pay property taxes totalling $35 million during the years between 1980 and 1982. After the system goes into operation, which is scheduled for the beginning of 1983, the company will pay annual property taxes of $30 million, a sum that will be escalated in line with the rise in the price deflator of the GNP.

Honourable senators, I should point out that the effect of the substantial increase in pipeline property taxes that will become available to the Yukon government will enable it to make substantial strides toward its goal of financial independence of the federal government. In addition, however, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development announced during the course of the debate in the other place that the federal government was prepared to support a build-up of a Yukon heritage fund of up to $50 million to be used for the general benefit of the Yukon residents without effect on the annual deficit grant paid to the territory by the federal treasury.

A further benefit that would be derived by the people of the Yukon stems from the amount of up to $5 million that the company would be prepared to put up in order to install lateral lines for the distribution of gas to communities along the pipeline route. They have also committed themselves to supply that gas at the Alberta border price.

Honourable senators will recall that under the agreement with the United States, a start on the pipeline laying in the Yukon will be deferred until January 1, 1981. That is only seven months earlier than the starting date recommended by the Lysyk inquiry, and it will provide time for the settlement of Indian land claims and the start of their implementation. I think it is widely recognized that the achievement of this objective would substantially enhance the ability of the Indian people in the Yukon to capitalize on the potential benefits offered by the building of the northern gas system through the territory.

As a further means of assisting the native people of the Yukon to accomplish this objective, the federal government has made it clear that it is prepared to provide an advance payment of $50 million against a final settlement, once agreement in principle has been reached in the course of the present negotiations.

While the federal government has clearly been sensitive at every stage of development about the impact of this project on the interests of northern residents in general, and to native people in particular, I believe that amendments adopted in the other place—those are the ones to which I have just referred—provide clear recognition of their interests in the legislation itself. They also make it apparent beyond any doubt that this bill will not interfere in any way with native land claims in the future. That can be found in clause 23.1 on page 12 of the bill now before us.

One of the central provisions of the legislation is that providing for the establishment of a northern pipeline agency. This agency will be expected to work in close conjunction with the National Energy Board, and will provide a single regulatory authority for the exercise of all responsibilities related to the planning, monitoring and controlling of the construction of the system throughout Canada. Under the bill, the Governor in Council will be authorized to transfer federal powers now exercised by various departments to the agency, to the extent that they are required for the purpose of maintaining central control over the project. The agency will be responsible to a designated minister in essentially the same way as government departments are, and, therefore, will be fully answerable to Parliament at all times.

Acting under the authority of the minister will be a commissioner who will serve as deputy head of the agency in Ottawa, and there will be an administrator who will assume responsibility for the day-to-day operations from the agency's offices in Calgary. I think it is assured that other offices will be established in Whitehorse, in British Columbia and Saskatchewan.

To provide for the close co-ordination with the National Energy Board that will be so essential, a member of the National Energy Board will be appointed to the agency as the designated officer and will serve either as the administrator or the deputy administrator of the agency. Certain responsibilities which bear on the long-term responsibilities of the National Energy Board will continue to be exercised by it, either alone or in concert with the minister.

As honourable senators are aware, the bill establishes a number of general terms and conditions that Foothills will be required to meet in addition to the undertakings it has already given before the National Energy Board. These cover such matters as design specifications and routing of the system, minimization of adverse socio-economic and environmental impacts, and also the input of Canadian manpower, goods and services.

In addition to these general provisions, the company will also be required to comply with a number of detailed terms and conditions, which will be laid down by the agency, covering all these areas.

I should say at this point that even after this legislation is passed all of the specific detailed terms and conditions will not be known exactly, but it will provide the basis on which rules and regulations can be made. The agency will certainly have several weeks, and up to three months, to spell out the final precise details to the company before construction begins.

As you are all well aware, one of the major points of controversy in the other place related to the question of Canadian input into the whole system. While it was contended by some in the other place that firm guarantees of Canadian content should somehow be written into the legislation, they recognized that such a guarantee would be contrary to the provisions of the general agreement on tariffs and trade and, indeed, contrary to the provisions of the Canada-United States agreement calling for the supply of material on competitive terms. That was clearly a principal requisite in reaching any agreement at all that would derive all the benefits to come from this. If it were otherwise it would be contrary to Canada's interest in holding down the cost of building the system, and thus the cost of transporting gas from the Mackenzie Delta to Canadian markets in the south.

Nevertheless, I am sure that an examination of the terms and conditions laid down in the legislation will provide honourable senators with the necessary assurance that the minister responsible for the agency will have ample powers to ensure that Canadian firms have a full opportunity to compete fairly for the right to supply goods and services to the project, which is all that Canadian industry itself has asked for.

[Senator Olson]

One of the major controversies that developed was, of course, over the supply of pipe. That is by far the largest single component. My information is that Canadian companies which are capable of fabricating that size of pipe, to the specifications attached to it, are extremely competitive in that field.

While it does not form part of the legislation, I believe honourable senators will find of particular significance the undertaking given by the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council to propose a change in the Standing Orders of the other place to establish a continuing committee on the northern pipeline, which will provide an opportunity for continued parliamentary surveillance of the progress of the project. While members of this chamber will recognize the exceptional nature of this provision in our parliamentary system, I think they will agree that it is justified by the exceptional nature of the project itself.

I simply want to conclude by advising honourable senators that the two amendments made to Bill C-25 can be found at pages 4042 and 4045 of Commons Hansard for March 22 last. Those pages will both identify the amendments and provide you with explanations of why those amendments were accepted. I mention that because I do not want to take up more time this afternoon to explain them in detail.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I hope that we will be able to give this bill second reading this afternoon so that it can be referred immediately to the special committee. I make this comment for the information of those senators who do not already know that the committee is prepared to meet later this day. We are certainly prepared to meet at 9.30 tomorrow morning. We have a commitment from the National Energy Board and the officers designate of the agency, as well as some senior officers of Foothills Pipe Lines (Yukon) Ltd., to be with us tomorrow to answer questions about the contents of this bill.

Senator van Roggen: Senator Olson, may I just ask a question? Would you point out to us the two clauses that were amended?

Senator Olson: I believe they are clause 23.1, which is found at page 12 of the re-print of the bill, and clause 18.1 of Schedule III, which is found at page 53. I wanted to quote the two pages of Hansard, but I have not had the bill long enough to be absolutely certain that those are the two clauses. Essentially, they clarify and spell out more detail of Indian claims. I shall try to ascertain that.

Hon. George I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have been given the privilege of speaking to this bill. I am sure the honourable senator who has just explained it so clearly will not be surprised if I say that, like him, I have not been able to acquaint myself with the two amendments to which he gave us a reference. Therefore, in order that I may decide just how I should deal with these in my response, if at all, I would appreciate his being kind enough to read the clauses to us so that I may hear through his voice, as well as search for myself, the changes which have been made and which may turn out to be very important indeed.

Senator Olson: I am trying to do my homework here while also listening carefully to your remarks. I am now certain that the one I mentioned, clause 23, has been amended by adding a new clause, clause 23.1, which can be found at page 12. This new clause is headed "Native Claims," and it reads as follows:

Notwithstanding this Act, any native claim, right, title or interest that the native people of Canada may have had prior to the coming into force of this Act in and to the land on which the pipeline will be situated continues to exist until the settlement in respect of any such claim, right, title or interest is effected.

● (1540)

Honourable senators will remember that this is one that the Council for Yukon Indians presented to us and felt very strongly about. It is now incorporated in the amendment. The other one I mentioned is different.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): May I interject before the honourable senator goes further? Perhaps I did not hear him correctly, but as I understood it he was indicating that an amendment has been made to clause 23 of the bill.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Clause 23.1 has been added.

Senator Flynn: It is not clause 23 subsection (1); it is clause 23.1.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Thank you.

Senator Olson: That will be found at the bottom of page 12 of the bill, copies of which were distributed a few minutes ago.

The other one is different, and it is not in Schedule III. Subclause 20(6) has been amended by striking out lines 29 and 30 and substituting the following therefor—

Senator Grosart: Would the honourable senator indicate the page?

Senator Olson: It is subclause 20(6) on page 11. They have added the words:

"not, without the prior approval of the Governor in Council and the Board, terminate, alter or amend".

I am now trying to find where that fits in.

Senator Grosart: I hope the Leader of the Government is listening to this.

Senator Flynn: He would rather not.

Senator Olson: It makes that subclause more specific. The added words are:

"not, without the prior approval of the Governor in Council and the Board, terminate, alter or amend".

That is the whole of the other amendment that was accepted by the House of Commons.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Olson for his explanation of the amendments, and for his lucid explanation of the bill. We on this side have given leave, as requested by the Leader of the Government, to proceed with this bill today, after we had some chance at least to ascertain that the bill in its final form conforms, substantially at least, to the views that we have as to what its contents should be. We have satisfied ourselves, as I say, that it conforms substantially to our views, but we have not had an opportunity to study it with sufficient care yet to be able to give any commitment that we will not have some alternative views at some point to put forward as the bill proceeds along in its course in the Senate and before the special committee, if that is the committee to which it is referred. To put it another way, while we are prepared to give our approval in principle, we certainly are not prepared at this stage, with the very short time we have had to look at the final version, to give any commitment about the details that we may wish to discuss later.

I noticed with some interest that in the other place the Deputy Prime Minister and Leader of the House paid considerable tribute to the contribution of the opposition parties there to the debate on this bill, and allowed himself the recognition that their contribution had been of a very constructive nature. I am glad to be able to see that his perception of the activities of the opposition has reached the point where he has come to realize that the contributions the opposition make are constructive and useful, and do expedite the business of Parliament. This I think, is a tribute to his progress in education as much as it is to the contribution that the opposition makes.

I do not wish to dissent, at this stage at least, from anything Senator Olson said. I agree—as I perhaps indicated earlier in the questions I was asking the Leader of the Government—that this is indeed a tremendous undertaking; that it does seem to have great potential for the benefit of Canada and Canadians. I think it would be perhaps a little imprudent of us to accept as necessarily accurate all the estimates we have had, all of which were given to us in perfectly good faith, of course, by Senator Olson today. Whether it will be 100,000 or 200,000 man-years, or 50,000 or 68,000, as suggested by somebody who tried to refine the figures, nobody knows. Very intelligent, learned and careful estimates have been made, but I think it is important for us all to remember that these are only estimates. While they are estimates that carry with them a great deal of weight, having been made carefully by skillful and learned people acting in the best of good faith, they still are estimates.

The same, of course, is true of the estimate that the final Canadian content of this great undertaking will be as much as 90 per cent. We all certainly hope it will be. I am sure we on this side hope as sincerely as anyone does, or could, that not only will the 90 per cent Canadian content be equalled but will be exceeded. Again, however, we must remember that this is an estimate. It depends on a multitude of things which none of us can envisage with any certainty now.

We put forward the view, which I think fairly represents the view of those on this side of the house—and probably the view of perhaps all members of the Senate—that it will take eternal vigilance to make sure that no fair and proper opportunity is lost to encourage Canadian content; that no one is reticent about creating such opportunities, keeping in mind, of course, all the time that we must conform to our obligations internationally. We must conform to our obligations as a responsible country, and we must conform to our obligations not unnecessarily to increase the already well-known tremendous cost of this undertaking.

Some of us had the opportunity of listening at first hand to representatives of citizens of the Yukon and British Columbia and hearing their views on what might be the dangers to them and their way of life necessarily bound up in such a great undertaking in the country in which they live. No one can but have the greatest sympathy for these people. Undoubtedly, they are going to be faced with a tremendous influx of people and people's habits, accompanied with a great many changes to the environment in which they have become accustomed to living. They have their own lifestyle, a lifestyle which spans many generations, and perhaps one which extends to prehistoric times.

While I am not for a moment suggesting that the undertaking be delayed, it seems to me that there must be an ongoing and extremely alert vigilance to ensure that, within reason, whatever can be done to lessen the adverse impacts upon these peoples and their lifestyle is done. They have a lifestyle which is as important to them as ours is to us.

We must not allow engineers, bulldozer operators and other construction people to simply go out and build a pipeline having no regard to the consequences. Many precautions can be taken and must be taken to ensure that something of this nature does not happen. I have every confidence that, by this time, those responsible for carrying out this undertaking realize the importance of taking every precaution necessary, from the commencement through to the completion of this vast project.

One thing I should mention—not because it is strictly a matter of principle, but because I wish to draw it to the attention of the committee which will study this bill—is the certificate of public convenience and necessity under which this pipeline will be constructed. I will not elaborate on this now, but, as I read the bill, that certificate will not carry on its face any of the substantial conditions under which the certificate is granted and which must be observed if the certificate is to remain in force. There must be a means by which those affected by the construction of this pipeline, including those living in the immediate areas concerned, can determine what the conditions are under which the certificate is granted, and what responsibilities those operating under the certificate have in carrying out their particular operation. I do commend to the committee to which this bill will be referred a very careful consideration of this problem.

There has been, as all honourable senators are aware, an ongoing discussion over a long period of time with respect to native rights. I know it is difficult to harden one's heart to this, but I also know that this undertaking should not necessarily wait for the settlement of these land claims and other matters relating to native rights. I understand why those directly affected by this feel so strongly.

[Senator Smith (Colchester).]

It seems to me that with the addition of clause 23.1, to which Senator Olson drew our attention a few moments ago, those rights are intended to be protected. I must say, however, that I can understand why some people are not as enthusiastic about this as they might be, because it does read in a rather narrow way with respect to rights they may have had in and to the land on which the pipeline will be situated.

The pipeline will not occupy a great deal of land, unless one uses the term to refer to "the whole of the great land." I am sure the rights those people are concerned about are not only those rights which would be affected by a pipeline occupying a few feet of land, but are of a much broader nature and concern a much larger piece of land which might be adversely affected because of a pipeline being located there. I think the committee to which this bill is referred must give this problem a great deal of consideration.

Senator Olson quite properly drew the attention of the Senate to the rather complex arrangements set up in the bill by which the administration of this vast undertaking will be carried out. I do not have the same confidence as he in the ability of people, at this stage and in dealing with such an undertaking, to set up administrative arrangements which will satisfactorily cope with the inevitable and unexpected serious situations which are bound to occur as work continues.

Therefore, it seems to me that there must be a readiness to be extremely flexible and a readiness, if necessary, to say that the arrangements in this bill are not satisfactory for the administration of this project and must be changed, even if they require change through parliamentary procedure.

I sincerely hope—and I think it is necessary not only to hope, but also to feel confident—if these administrative arrangements in the form in which they are set out here, or in some other form, cannot cope with the problems which might arise, that we will have an opportunity to improve or change them by legislation, if necessary.

I suppose it is inevitable with such an undertaking that, at this stage, it is not possible to spell out detailed rules. I do wish, however, that it were possible to get a little closer to detailed rules than this legislation. We might as well realize that we are casting the whole of this undertaking into the hands of the organization which will be set up by this bill, and are telling them, "We do not know how you are going to do it. Make your own rules and get on with it." Perhaps that is all we can do, but certainly we are not doing it in a way which would allow anyone to look back and say, "We have done all we can do for you. You can get on with it."

This great project requires the constant supervision of Parliament. This leads me to refer with some emphasis to the undertaking given in the other place by the Deputy Prime Minister, the Honourable Allan MacEachen, whereby he will ask the House of Commons to establish a standing or permanent committee to keep closely in touch with all matters relating to this pipeline. That is some comfort, but it seems to me that it is just as important that this house have some means of keeping in close touch with this great undertaking. It may even be that we have better means, if we choose to use them, for keeping in touch with it. Indeed, I think one could say, without being accused of too much favouritism, that our committee system is certainly at least as good as that of the other place, and it seems to me that we would be remiss indeed if we did not equip ourselves just as well as the other place has arranged to equip itself with the means of keeping close watch upon what is certainly the greatest undertaking of a physical nature that Canada has ever embarked upon.

● (1600)

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I ask your indulgence to add a few words, perhaps somewhat needlessly in view of the enormous amount of work accomplished during the preparation of this bill. This could perhaps be compared to the great development of railroads long ago. This project will also enable the Maritime provinces and Quebec, which are the furthest away from the sources of supply, to obtain all the oil and gas they need.

First of all, the economic consequences are enormous. However, I would like to say a few words about the economic impact and the cost of this project, which may be considered certainly as the greatest in Canadian history, and perhaps also greater than any project in most other countries. We must remember that in addition to working on a very difficult terrain where the most accurate data possible had to be gathered, we had to prepare with the United States arrangements which will last, as Senator Olson said, for about forty years, and also provide for economic growth in the developed sectors and sign treaties with the people concerned, with the natives living in the most affected areas. We also had to obtain the consent of the provinces; this can be found in the schedule of the bill. In my opinion, this deserves the approval of the public which is perhaps waiting impatiently in some cases for natural gas to become available, for instance, in eastern Canada, in the Atlantic provinces and also in Quebec, where there is no natural gas except in Montreal.

I think that the United States got out of enormous difficulties when they most needed it. I have the clear impression that if they are interested in buying our natural gas, they are also very anxious to help us develop our country.

I noted with interest the comments of Senator Olson about the means, which he did not specify but which he says have been studied by the company, that will be used to contribute to pay this enormous debt that Canada will have. If we believe the theory of Keynes, there is no doubt that the more we are in debt, the more prosperous we become, but this will not happen here since we expect satisfactory and regular returns. There is also the matter of taxation which will considerably help Canada.

As for the project itself, I have already had occasion to talk about it in this house. In my opinion, since my appointment to the Senate, this project is among the most likely to help Canada on the road to economic recovery. Of course, it will not be completed for some time. But everything will get under way when we pass this bill. This is why I do not want to go on much longer. I simply wanted to put on the record in my mother tongue and as a citizen of the province of Quebec my appreciation of what we are now doing.

[English]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, before the sponsor closes the debate, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he has considered the undertaking Mr. MacEachen gave in the other place to set up a special committee of that house to which will stand permanently referred all reports, orders, agreements, regulations, directions and approvals mentioned in sections 12, 13, 14, 15 and 22 of the Northern Pipeline bill, provided that the said committee shall report thereon at least three times in every session; and whether the idea to have a joint committee was considered by the government, or whether we should have a committee of this house for the same purpose. I think we have the same interest in this matter as the other place has, and it seems that we have been forgotten once more.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the suggestion to have the present special committee undertake such responsibilities, or, alternatively, the suggestion that some joint committee activity could be undertaken—these and other suggestions have come from a number of honourable senators. I think there is a great deal of merit in the proposals. I would like to discuss initially with the Leader of the Opposition, perhaps on a one-to-one basis, his ideas on this subject.

● (1610)

I listened with interest to the remarks of the honourable Senator Smith (Colchester) a few moments ago, in which he pointed out that the committees we have established here take second place to no committees in the whole of Parliament in their ability to analyze and evaluate legislation and to suggest improvements in bills that come before us.

I believe there would be a very real place for such a committee, whatever its basis. It may well be that the committee we have established should merely maintain itself in existence with some provisions to report at regular intervals.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Olson speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall take only a few moments to comment on the remarks made by those who have participated in the debate. At one point I was going to comment, and had my notes written, on the matter raised by Senator Smith (Colchester) and mentioned specifically by Senator Flynn concerning the monitoring in Parliament of the construction project as it proceeds. This would have the effect, as the Leader of the Government has said, of either continuing the special committee that is already set up, or of re-establishing it in some form.

On the question of whether or not there should be a joint committee, I would suggest that that can be discussed in committee when the bill is referred to it. I can see some advantages in there being a joint committee, but I can also see some advantages in there being a Senate committee. I do not want to spell out the advantages now, but for investigative purposes, dealing with the social-economic impact, and so on, there is some advantage in the Senate's having its own committee to do that kind of work. There seems to be general agreement that we can discuss the matter further in committee and, if it is agreed, we could report back to the house when we report the bill.

Senator Desruisseaux raised a matter concerning gas not being available in large parts of Canada. That is a fact. However, it is not because there are insufficient quantities of gas to distribute to the rest of Canada, particularly from Montreal east. I am also convinced that it is not because there is not the will by pipeline companies to both finance and undertake the work. As a matter of fact, there is an application by an Alberta gas company to extend the pipeline from Montreal east into the maritimes. I can assure the honourable senator that there are adequate supplies of gas in the known fields in western Canada that are already connected to the trans-Canada pipeline to supply all the gas that would be required there. I do not know the technical difficulties that would have to be overcome in order to build a line to serve those people, but certainly there is plenty of gas and, indeed, the will to go forward with building such a line.

I wish to thank honourable senators, including the Leader of the Opposition, for their contribution to the debate. I hope that we can soon refer the bill to committee for consideration in detail.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Olson moved that the bill be referred to the Special Committee of the Senate on a Northern Gas Pipeline.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, April 6, 1978

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of Reports of the Anti-Inflation Board to the Governor in Council, pursuant to section 17(2) of the Anti-Inflation Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada, 1974-75-76, reporting its reference to the Administrator of the said Act of certain proposed changes in compensation plans, as follows:

1. Molson's Brewery (Ontario) Limited and its employees represented by the Canadian Union of United Brewery Workers (B.F.C.S.D.) Local 304 Toronto Plant, Local 306 Barrie Plant and Local 304 Hyatt Transport, dated March 22, 1978.

2. Labatt's Ontario Breweries and its Metro Brewery Workers, represented by the Canadian Union of United Brewery Workers, (B.F.C.S.D.) Local 304, dated March 22, 1978.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Senator Bonnell, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, presented the following report:

Wednesday, April 5, 1978

The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science to which was referred Bill S-10, intituled "An Act respecting the Royal Canadian Legion", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Monday, March 20, 1978, examined the said Bill and now reports the same with the following amendment:

Page 1, Clause 1: Strike out lines 14 to 17 and substitute the following:

"(i) those persons who have served or are serving in Her Majesty's navy, army or air force or any auxiliary force thereof,

(ii) those persons who have served or are serving in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and

(iii) the sons and daughters of any of those persons referred to in subparagraphs (i) and (ii),"

Respectfully submitted,

M. Lorne Bonnell,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move, seconded by Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), that this report be now adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, may I add a brief note of explanation. The bill before us, respecting the Royal Canadian Legion, has been amended by the committee because the original proposed legislation which came before us suggested that membership of the Legion might be expanded so as to include all those who support the purposes and objects of the Legion.

We had as witnesses before the committee the president of the Legion and their legal counsel. It was the feeling of the membership of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science that the proposed amendment was too broad. So, after consultation with the president of the Legion and with their legal counsel, it was felt that the amendment which we proposed would be acceptable to them. We proposed in the amendment to broaden the scope of membership to those people who have served in or who are serving in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and their sons and daughters, as well as the sons and daughters of legionnaires and those at present serving in the various branches of the armed forces. In this way we restricted the membership somewhat. It is a matter that the committee felt strongly about, and I believe that the members of the Legion present, when they realized the implications of the broader term proposed, were quite content to support this amendment.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, as sponsor of the bill perhaps I could add a word by saying that I thought the work done by the committee yesterday was very good indeed. As Senator Bonnell indicated, we had before us the President of the Legion, Mr. McDonald, and the Secretary of the Legion, Mr. Lamy, but in addition we had invaluable help from members of the committee who are members of the Legion. I refer to Senator Macdonald, Senator Donald Smith, Senator Marshall and Senator McElman. They made an impact upon the thinking of the officials of the Legion, and it seems to me as a result of the discussion there the amendments now proposed for adoption by the Senate in this report are amendments that the Legion will not only live with but will profit from.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, the Legion itself is hopeful that there will be expeditious treatment of this bill in the House of Commons. While there are delays to be expected there, in order to give them an opportunity to have a good run at the bill, I hope the Senate will agree to give leave to have third reading now.

[Senator Bonnell.]

Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next, April 10, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, in moving this adjournment motion I have taken into consideration the items before us, the legislation likely to come to us from the other place and the committee meetings already set down for next week.

The Special Committee of the Senate on a Northern Gas Pipeline met last evening to consider Bill C-25, the Northern Pipeline Act. It met again this morning and again at 1.15 this afternoon and it will likely continue its meetings later on this afternoon at about 3.30. It is possible that that committee will be in a position to report the bill by Monday.

It is also quite likely that Bill C-18, to amend the Anti-Inflation Act and guidelines, will have passed the Commons before we return on Monday, and we may even have before us Bill C-29, to amend the Farm Credit Act.

● (1410)

I shall now give the committee schedule as well as I can at this time. On Tuesday the National Finance Committee will consider the main estimates for 1978-79 when the Senate rises, and the Health, Welfare and Science Subcommittee on Childhood Experiences will meet at 4 p.m. or when the Senate rises. There will also be a meeting of the Foreign Affairs Committee on Tuesday with respect to Canada-United States relations, but no time has yet been set for that meeting.

The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee has called a meeting for Wednesday at 9.30 a.m. to continue its study on the subject matter of Bill C-13. The Agriculture Committee will meet on Wednesday when the Senate rises, at which time the Canadian Federation of Agriculture will present its annual brief.

A meeting of the Transport and Communications Committee has been called for Thursday at 9.30 a.m. to consider Bill C-2, respecting the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act. The minister is scheduled to appear before that meeting. Also on Thursday, at 10 a.m., the National Finance Committee will continue its examination of the main estimates for 1978-79.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might be permitted to make a brief comment. The Deputy Leader of the Government gave 9.30 a.m. on Thursday as the time for the meeting of the Transport and Communications Committee, which was in accordance with arrangements. However, within the last few minutes—I forgot to communicate this information to him—the minister's office indicated that the minister will be available at 9 o'clock. So I propose to call the meeting for that time.

Senator Langlois: I thank the honourable senator for the correction.

Motion agreed to.

BUDGET SPEECH

DATE OF PRESENTATION—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government if the Minister of Finance has announced the date of the presentation of his budget; and, if so, would he let us know?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am able to announce to the chamber that the Honourable the Minister of Finance has announced that the budget will be presented at 8 o'clock on Monday evening next, April 10.

Senator Flynn: That means that we may not sit next Thursday.

Senator Grosart: Or Wednesday.

Senator Langlois: We may adjourn.

NATIONAL REVENUE

DEFERRAL OF INCOME TAX ON PROCEEDS OF SALE OF LIVESTOCK HERDS—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I may be permitted to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. Is the government giving favourable consideration to deferring income tax on the proceeds from dispersal sales of livestock so that those proceeds can be used, albeit in a subsequent year, for the repurchase of livestock herds?

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I should first like to say that the reason why I was not present when a question was asked of me yesterday is that I left the chamber about 2.30 p.m. to fulfil my responsibilities as Minister of National Revenue. I hope that honourable senators will recognize the fact that there are important meetings which I must attend from time to time.

In answer to the honourable senator's question, some consideration has been given to that particular point but I cannot provide any details at this moment. I believe the matter is in the hands of the Minister of Finance.

Senator Olson: I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue a supplementary question. Are we entitled, then, to hope that this proposal respecting livestock sales might be in the budget on Monday night?

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I am not in a position to answer that particular question at the moment.

INVESTMENT OF RRSPs IN TRUST FUNDS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Guay: Would honourable senators permit me to reply to the question that the Honourable Leader of the Opposition asked yesterday concerning investment of RRSPs in trust funds? This matter is at present under study by the Minister of Finance. Until that study has been completed, I feel that it would be premature to express myself publicly in favour of one form of investment or another. Any change in the form of investment to be permitted will require Income Tax Act legislation.

MINISTER AS MEMBER OF THE SENATE—QUESTION

Senator Forsey: I wonder if I might ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. Is he aware that he has the distinction of being the first Minister of National Revenue to sit in this house since 1882?

Senator Perrault: It has been too long.

An Hon. Senator: He may be the last.

MIDDLE EAST

PARTICIPATION OF CANADA IN UNITED NATIONS PEACEKEEPING FORCE IN SOUTHERN LEBANON—QUESTION

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, may I address a question to the Leader of the Government arising out of the reply he gave yesterday respecting the United Nations Interim Force in southern Lebanon (UNIFL)? Can the Honourable Leader of the Government inform the Senate as to whether the ceasefire is being observed completely at the present time?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have no recent report on that subject. However, an inquiry will go forward in the next few minutes, and perhaps that information can be brought to the Senate before we rise this afternoon.

Senator Grosart: A supplementary question. Will the Leader of the Government, if he can, also inform the Senate as to what arrangements are being made for participation by the Canadian military authorities in that area in any military decisions as to the deployment of the force in Lebanon?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that supplementary question will be taken as notice.

LIBERAL PARTY OF CANADA

SIGNIFICANCE OF ROSE BOUTONNIÈRES—QUESTION

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I note that some of our senior parliamentarians are wearing a red rose this afternoon. Perhaps the Leader of the Government could tell us why today is so significant that it calls for the wearing of a red rose.

Senator Perrault: I had not anticipated that question, but I am pleased that it was asked. Today marks the tenth anniversary of the election to the leadership of the Liberal Party of Canada of the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

Senator Flynn: Does it mean that only three of you are rejoicing?

Senator Phillips: I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. I wonder if he would consider issuing black armbands to the million and a half unemployed in Canada in commemoration of this anniversary.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there would be more roses worn by government supporters today, but there is a shortage of roses growing in the gardens of Ottawa at this particular time. These are all that could be found.

Senator Grosart: A very, very true statement.

BUDGET SPEECH

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN SENATE GALLERY OF HOUSE OF COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as previously announced, the Minister of Finance will deliver his budget speech in the other place on Monday next, April 10, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

May I be permitted to remind honourable senators that none but senators will be admitted to the Senate gallery of the House of Commons on that occasion. This step is being taken for the purpose of providing accommodation in the gallery for as many senators as possible. In this manner, senators will not be excluded from the gallery on account of many of the places being occupied by relatives and friends of senators.

May I add that such instructions were first issued in 1931 by the then Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable P. E. Blondin, and that this practice has been followed ever since.

● (1420)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, now that it has been announced that the Minister of Finance will commence delivering his budget speech in the other place at 8 o'clock on Monday evening, may I ask the Leader of the Government whether the Senate will still adjourn to 8 o'clock on Monday evening?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in view of the weight of work which appears to be facing us next week, it is felt to be important that we meet at 8 o'clock on Monday evening regardless of the fact that a budget will be presented in the other place at that time.

Senator Flynn: I suppose there would be no problem with a bill such as the pipeline bill being adopted only on Tuesday? How much time do we still have?

Senator Argue: If we adopt it, there will be no problem.

Senator Flynn: Since we will be arriving at 8 o'clock and the committee may have to meet that night, in the event that we cannot report the bill is there any danger that it would die on the order paper?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators have always demonstrated a keen sense of responsibility, and I think they know where their priorities lie regardless of the importance of the budget message which will be presented on Monday evening. It is apparent that the pipeline bill is of major importance to this country, and I do not believe that there is any danger of the kind suggested by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: It would be the responsibility of the government to give us enough time to have royal assent at 6 o'clock on Tuesday, if they want to cut the rope at that time.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not believe that circumstance will arise. The government is aware of the important legislation which must be dealt with before any appeal to the electorate is made.

Senator Flynn: We do not want to be accused of delaying the passage of this bill.

Senator Langlois: You are on a fishing expedition, but you are using the wrong bait.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Alasdair Graham moved the second reading of Bill C-38, to amend the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am very pleased to have the opportunity of moving second reading of Bill C-38 because it relates to an important corporation and important municipalities in my home area of Cape Breton Island.

Bill C-38 is a simple measure, and one that is perhaps long overdue. It is an attempt to regularize the payment of grants in lieu of taxes on all holdings for which taxes would be levied if the corporation were not an agent of Her Majesty. As it now stands, the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act gives authority to make grants in lieu of taxes "in respect of any lands of the corporation". This bill would also provide authority for the corporation to make grants in lieu of taxes for personal property as well. The inclusion of personal property would be of particular benefit to some municipalities in Cape Breton which are, and have been, hard pressed economically for the past number of years.

By way of giving a brief background to what led up to the introduction of this bill, I should point out that the matter was raised on December 2, 1977, in the other place by the member for Calgary Centre. It was also discussed by the member for Winnipeg North Centre and the member for Drummond. Reference is made to the House of Commons Debates, pages 1502, 1503, 1504 and 1505.

In general, the matter related to the propriety of two items included in Supplementary Estimates (A) which were described as $1 items. These items were objected to basically on the ground that they were not purely supply items but, in effect, went beyond the limits of the supply procedure and extended into legislative authority.

Reference, therefore, is made to a ruling made by Mr. Speaker, which can be found on pages 184, 185 and 186 of the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons, dated

[Senator Perrault.]

December 7, 1977. In his summation, Mr. Speaker noted that in all such cases:

I am encouraged by the fact that the dispute by the house was not with the principle or with the approach to be taken with these programs.

In fact, he said:

The house is interested in the programs, particularly with respect to Cape Breton Development Corporation and espouses an extension to the program. Simply, the house wants to see it done in a regular way. Therefore, I would be encouraged by the prospect that if legislation is introduced to regularize this intention through an amendment to the legislation, it will receive speedy consideration by the house at least.

In saying that, Mr. Speaker concluded, "I am drawing upon the arguments made by all members."

Accordingly, honourable senators, Bill C-38, an act to amend the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act, was first read in the other place on April 3. On April 4, it received second and third reading in the other place. I refer to House of Commons Debates at page 4119. I believe that this bill deserves the support of all honourable senators.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I think this is an excellent piece of legislation, and I am very happy to support it.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I think it is not only an excellent piece of legislation, which I am very happy to support, but I am also delighted to see that the admonitions of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance and of the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments have at last been heeded. It is a sign of grace. It is perhaps a case for the government of:

Betwixt the stirrup and the ground

Mercy I askt, mercy I found.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Graham moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

CONFERENCE ON SECURITY AND CO-OPERATION IN EUROPE

VISIT BY PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION TO BELGRADE, YUGOSLAVIA—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the inquiry of Senator Thompson calling the attention of the Senate to his recent visit to the Helsinki Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, as I rise to make my first speech in this chamber, I should like to say how deeply touched I am by the warmth of your welcome, for which I am grateful. Working in the ways and customs for seventeen years of the other house of Parliament, I beg your indulgence as I learn the rules of the Senate.

I should like to pay my respects and offer my devotion to the Speaker of the Senate, who is the embodiment of the dignities and usages of this honourable chamber, and is one of the principal guardians of our Canadian parliamentary institutions, full of symbolism and history, a guarantee of our basic freedoms.

● (1430)

I am particularly happy to come here with a group of fellow appointees whose qualifications are such that I am sure you will welcome them to your labours and deliberations. As a newcomer to this house, but also as an old Ottawa hand, I would offer them my personal congratulations and best wishes.

I hasten to state that I place particular value upon my appointment, having received it at the hands of the present Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, whose personal popularity in the country is unsurpassed and who is recognized as one of the world's great leaders. In thanking him, I wish to offer my congratulations and best wishes on the tenth anniversary of his prime ministership and the leadership of the Liberal Party of Canada, which we celebrate today.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: It is the last.

Senator Haidasz: With many members of this house I have enjoyed a long and useful association. Some of you were my colleagues in the House of Commons. I recall the days when you were blazing the trails, and today I find you in the front seats as elder statesmen. I recognize what a great debt this country owes to you for your dedication and your vision.

However, time and the democratic process have taken their toll. In my 17 years in the House of Commons there were occasions when I needed advice, and I often turned to experienced politicians such as Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) and Senator Croll. But I am saddened by the fact that a distinguished senator is no longer here, and I know we all miss him. I refer to the late Senator Arthur Roebuck, for whom at a very early age I performed my first political chore by working for his election to the Ontario Legislature. I later represented in the House of Commons the federal constituency of Trinity, which he served so well. If one in politics has a father-confessor, then he was mine for a great many years, and I am grateful.

I am, of course, very grateful also to my wife and children, parents and relatives, teachers and friends who have made it possible for me to be here today. Many of them, like millions of immigrants, came here from Poland and many other countries, some even before Confederation, to start a new life and help build a new country. To them I wish to offer a tribute and a prayer by repeating the words of Thomas D'Arcy McGee delivered in a speech in Quebec in 1862:

Dear, most justly dear to every land beneath the sun are the children born in her bosom, and nursed upon her breast; but when the man of another country, wherever born, speaking whatever speech, holding whatever creed, seeks out a country to serve and honour, and cleave to in weal or woe, when he heaves up the anchor of his heart from its old moorings and lays at the feet of the mistress of his choice, his new country, all the hopes of his ripe manhood, he establishes by such devotion a claim for consideration, not second even to that of the children of the soil.

This, honourable senators, brings me to the subject of human rights, one of the great national and international issues which I have espoused and intend to pursue vigorously, for the Senate is no sanctuary, no escape from responsibility and service. We have had our great national dream. We have the great humanitarian story in Canada of the best of health, welfare and environmental protection; we have the great commitment of national unity; but we also have the great national conscience, namely, to stand up for human rights at home and abroad. The Senate of Canada stands upon the threshold of a new era. It can play a much more important role in the field of human rights. If there is wisdom among us, and I believe there is; and if there is the will, as I believe there should be; and if there is experience, as I am sure there is, then these qualities should be welded and employed in the best way to defend and preserve the fundamental principles of human rights.

Canada has made progress in achieving the recognition of human rights and promoting it on the international scene. Our country has signed and implemented the International Conventions on Human Rights, and many other treaties. The government of Prime Minister Trudeau adopted an official policy of multiculturalism which guarantees the preservation and development of the cultures of Canadians. It has also enacted human rights legislation which is now in effect, and the Minister of Justice has announced legislation to establish the office of ombudsman. In the international forum, Canada has taken a prominent place in promoting and negotiating extensive human rights provisions embodied in the Helsinki Final Act, emanating from the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, signed on August 1, 1975.

At the Belgrade review meeting, from October 4, 1977 to March 9, 1978, the Canadian delegation played a persistently bold and effective role in exposing violations of, and demanding compliance with, the commitments made by the signatory countries. I had the opportunity and privilege as a member of the Canadian Parliamentary Helsinki Group to be an observer with the official Canadian delegation headed by Ambassador T. Delworth, who is with us today in Ottawa. I take this opportunity of reporting upon the excellent performance of our diplomats on that delegation, and to express our appreciation for their dedicated work.

As the ground rules of the Belgrade meeting were based on consensus, virtually giving veto power to any one country, the concluding document was a compromise. Although frank exchanges of views were made and many good suggestions proposed in all the committees, the absence of the mention of human rights in the concluding document was a disappointment and a source of frustration to all who worked there for many months. It does not reflect all the vital substantive concerns and constructive efforts so as to make the meeting a total success.

Canada has never had illusions about the obstacles which lie in the way of full implementation of the Final Act, but our concern and commitment has not diminished. We want peace, justice and prosperity today and for the future for ourselves and all peoples of the world. We expect some good to come out of that meeting. We should continue to insist that relations between states cannot remain unaffected where respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms is seen to be deficient. I am gratified that in the other house members adopted unanimously my motion on February 26, 1976, reiterating the Canadian government's commitment on non-recognition of the territorial status quo in Europe, and also adopted motions put by many other members of that house.

Since the signing of the Helsinki Final Act, which raised concern in many people, great interest in others, and struck a responsive chord in many hearts, monitoring groups of the Helsinki Final Act have sprung up in many, many countries. Persistent representations were made in the Parliament of Canada to facilitate the reunification of families. At the Belgrade meeting, the Canadian delegation tried to get acceptance of the need to expedite visits and the reunification of families. Canada also tried to obtain a strong commitment from participating states to respect the fundamental rights of culture and religion. We regret that the meeting did not accept all we asked for, but our efforts were not in vain.

Certainly, Canadian interest in these vital matters will not cease. Our commitments to the goals of human rights, I am sure, will be vigorously pursued. The Canadian spokesman, the Minister of Multiculturalism, Mr. Cafik, at the concluding meeting on March 9, spoke for our government, emphasizing that Canada will persist in underlining the importance of the humanitarian objectives of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe. He said the language of the Helsinki Final Act is clear and its provisions remain an indispensable yardstick against which performance will be measured in the future. At the Madrid review meeting in 1980 we should expect and demand progress in the Helsinki Final Act commitments. To make the best possible use of that instrument to sustain the pursuit of peace, security and justice in Europe is the challenge confronting the signatory countries, their parliaments, and their people.

I urge this house and I urge our government to take up this new challenge with unrelenting determination and perseverance. This will be our greatness as a nation and our contribution to the dignity of man from which will flow peace and justice.

Honourable senators, I have walked through the great corridor from the other house to this one. I face new walls, new faces, new rules, but my hope and perspective remain unchanged. What we do with our will and resources will largely determine our future. We have before us a bright future, if we resolve to make it so.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other senator wishes to participate in the debate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, April 10, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, April 10, 1978

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE SENATE

DELAY IN SITTING

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government if there is any reason why the Senate was called only at a quarter to nine this evening instead of at 8 o'clock. Is there any justification for that?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a request was received from a number of honourable senators that the bell be rung at approximately 8.30, as this would give them an opportunity to hear at least part of the important budget message being delivered in the other place. That is the primary reason.

Senator Flynn: I hope those who made that request are now here.

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-18, to amend the Anti-Inflation Act and guidelines.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-8, to amend the Canada Labour Code.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1978

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-41, to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, and other acts subsequent to 1970.

Bill read first time.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

BELL CANADA—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-1001, respecting Bell Canada.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, this bill is similar to one passed by the Senate in December, 1976. Therefore, with leave, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

NORTHERN PIPELINE BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Olson, Chairman of the Special Committee of the Senate on a Northern Gas Pipeline, presented the following report:

Thursday, April 6, 1978

The Special Committee of the Senate on a Northern Gas Pipeline to which was referred Bill C-25, intituled: "An Act to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto" has, in obedience to the order of reference of Wednesday, April 5, 1978, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Your committee, nevertheless, strongly recommends, on the basis of the evidence heard by it,

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

(1) that the Northern Pipeline Agency to be established by the said Act take steps as soon as is reasonably possible after the coming into force of the Act to have an independent inquiry undertaken to examine the social and economic effects that the construction of the said pipeline might have upon those persons residing in the vicinity of, or adjacent to, the right of way of the pipeline, particularly in those areas where no previous inquiry has been undertaken;

(2) that the terms of reference of the inquiry include a requirement that it be terminated by a fixed date in order that its findings may be made known prior to the final approval of the terms and conditions relating to the construction of the pipeline; and

(3) that a special committee of the Senate be established to inquire into any matter relating to the planning and construction of the said pipeline, to consider in particular all reports, orders, agreements, regulations, directions, recommendations and approvals referred to in the said Act, and to report to the Senate thereon at least once in each session of Parliament during the period of the planning and construction of the pipeline.

Respectfully submitted,

H. A. Olson
Chairman

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, perhaps I may have a few minutes to give you a brief explanation of the recommendations contained in this report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators will have noted that the Special Committee of the Senate on a Northern Gas Pipeline has reported Bill C-25 without amendment. That is not to say that certain matters were not raised by some members of the committee; indeed, there were some suggested amendments.

When the special committee considered its first term of reference, which was the subject matter of Bill C-25, it did not have in its possession the bill itself as amended after the report and third reading stages in the House of Commons. There were, of course, some further changes made there. For example, there was a great deal of discussion and, I might say, concern about the retention of native claims. To put it another way, there was concern that no Indian or native claims rights would be extinguished or, indeed, interfered with in any way by the construction of this pipeline.

There was not unanimous agreement that the amendment made by the other place before we were formally in possession of the bill was substantially different from the one we considered when we had possession of the bill. Therefore, I am not suggesting that there was unanimous agreement, but it was significantly important in the eyes of most of the members of the committee.

A number of other matters were raised also. If honourable senators have not already done so, they may wish to look at the printed proceedings of those committee hearings to acquaint themselves with other important matters raised.

I want to take another few minutes to deal with the three recommendations contained in the report. The first recommendation is that an independent inquiry be undertaken to study the social and economic impact or conditions that may affect the people who live along the right-of-way of the pipeline. You will recall that this study was done by the Lysyk Commission with respect to that section of the pipeline going through the Yukon, but it was not done for any of the other areas where the pipeline right-of-way is located. This is important for all the other areas, but particularly for northern British Columbia where some of the surface conditions and, indeed, the social and economic conditions, are very similar to those pertaining to the Yukon Territory. We believe, therefore, it was only right and proper that an inquiry be made for those purposes in the area where it has not already been done. We have made this distinction to make it clear that we are not asking that there be a repetition of an inquiry where it has already been carried out by the Lysyk Commission.

The main part of the second recommendation is that there be a terminal date on when that inquiry should make its findings and report to the agency, so that it would not interfere unduly with all the other things that have to follow, such as setting the terms and conditions, the financing and, indeed, the construction of the pipeline. The Lysyk Commission did have a terminal date and was able to report what most people now regard as a satisfactory set of recommendations, and we believe that a terminal date for this inquiry would also be appropriate.

The third recommendation is that a special committee of the Senate be established to inquire into all of those matters relating to planning, construction and so on of this pipeline. While the recommendation does not say so, we believe that this committee should be reappointed in each session of Parliament, at least until the pipeline construction is finished and is fully in operation. The other place has set up a similar committee to receive reports from the agency, and so on.

Some consideration was given, and perhaps more will be given, to having a joint committee. I am not able to make that recommendation tonight. It may evolve into a joint committee, but I think honourable senators ought to consider the fact that there are some advantages to having a committee of this place only for the purpose described in the third recommendation. I do not want to go into this very deeply, but whether or not it will eventually evolve into a joint committee with the other place is a matter for future determination. I can suggest this, though, that at the outset the only disadvantage I can see is that whoever makes the reports required under the bill, the reports would have to come to Ottawa, and perhaps have to be done twice. That does not seem to me to be a very large price to pay for some of the advantages of having a special committee of the Senate to look into these things whenever necessary.

Finally, the third recommendation says that this special committee should report to the Senate at least once in each session. I should like honourable senators to take note of the words "at least once", because it is not intended that once should be the maximum. In some years during the construction, perhaps even in the first year, there may be some reason for making inquiries into the terms and conditions, the social economic impact and other things, whereby more than one report from this committee to the Senate would be appropriate, but we think it should be at least once, and that is why that terminology is used.

I wish to conclude by expressing, as chairman of this committee, my appreciation to the members who were so very helpful in completing their study—I was going to say "expeditiously", but certainly the committee conducted an in-depth inquiry into the subject matter and I do not believe it was done expeditiously to the point of excluding a proper surveillance and consideration of the matters before us.

I would also like to express my appreciation to the clerical, reporting, research and legal staffs, who were so helpful to us throughout this period, especially by working long after the normal times of adjournment. All work was done very well and competently.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I am in full agreement with the comments of the Chairman of the Special Committee on a Northern Gas Pipeline as far as the recommendations made in the report, which do not deal with the wording of the bill, are concerned. I am especially in agreement with his comments with respect to the type of committee that should be established, whether it be a committee of the Senate or a joint committee. I believe the committee was generally unanimous with regard to the other recommendations. There was also general agreement with respect to a Lysyk type of inquiry into the part of British Columbia which will be traversed by the pipeline.

The chairman referred to some objections which were made with respect to certain clauses of the bill, especially clause 23.1. This is not the time to discuss them, but I intend to do so at the stage of third reading. However, I would like honourable senators to read the report tonight. It will take approximately two minutes, and it will be helpful to me because when I discuss it tomorrow at third reading stage I will not have to spend too much time in explaining it.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if the chairman of the committee would answer a question? It is a little difficult to discuss the report in these circumstances. The report was not in our hands when the chairman started what, in effect, is a debate on it. However, perhaps he would answer a question arising out of recommendation No. 1 which, as I understand it, is a recommendation that an independent inquiry be undertaken to examine the social and economic effects of the construction of the line, particularly in those areas where no previous inquiries have been undertaken. Would he be good enough to tell us what areas there are in which no previous inquiries have taken place? What are those areas in which there has been no previous inquiry? I ask the question because it is utterly amazing to me that we would be presented with a bill, as we are, and then told that there are areas which may be affected by the social and economic effects but in respect of which there has been no previous inquiry.

Senator Olson: Yes, honourable senators, I shall be very glad to do so. It would concern all the line in Canada, except that portion of it that goes through the Yukon. The reasons for that are very clear. Throughout the rest of northern British Columbia a pipeline is not a new thing. Pipelines have existed in that area in the past. This inquiry deals only with the social and economic impact on the people living along the line.

● (2030)

If I might speak on behalf of all members of the committee, I would say that, especially in northern British Columbia, there are reasons why this ought to be done. There are traplines in that area, and questions dealing with native claims and rights, similar to those in the Yukon, arise. That is why the committee is making this recommendation.

I do not believe an inquiry was undertaken to study the social and economic impacts in any of the other areas. It is only in the extreme northern part of British Columbia where a pipeline is something new. There are many pipelines in the southern portion of the northeast corner of British Columbia. In the southeast corner of British Columbia, the pipeline will almost parallel an existing pipeline. This area has experienced the social and economic impacts that a pipeline would have on an area.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Olson moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

FARM CREDIT ACT

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture on the subject matter of Bill C-29, to amend the Farm Credit Act, I would ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[For text of report see appendix, pp. 553-554]

Senator Argue moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

[Senator Grosart.]

AIR TRANSPORT

CHARTER AIRLINES WITHIN CANADA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on March 16 a question was asked by Senator Benidickson concerning charter airlines within Canada. I am able to inform the chamber that the Air Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission announced on March 17 that it approved applications by various Canadian air carriers for permission to operate Advance Booking Charters, known in the industry as ABC's, between city pairs within Canada, on behalf of various charterers.

The approvals provide for the operation of 871 round trip flights with a total capacity of 111,576 passenger round trips. There are 67,984 passenger round trips to be offered between Montreal or Toronto, on the one hand, and Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton, or Vancouver on the other.

In addition, 100 round trip flights will be operated between Toronto or Montreal, on the one hand, and St. John's, Charlottetown or Halifax, on the other, with a capacity of 11,300 round trip passengers; and 276 round trip flights between Vancouver and Calgary, or Edmonton, with a capacity of 32,292 passenger round trips.

As of March 16, 1976, there were no further applications pending before the committee, although I understand that Transair is interested in 44 flights.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION FUND—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Olson with respect to an interim payment out of the Western Grain Stabilization Fund. There is a rather lengthy release on that subject from the office of the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, the Honourable Otto Lang. Rather than getting into excessive detail, perhaps the news release itself could form part of the record of today's proceedings.

Very briefly, may I say that the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board announced that the Western Grain Stabilization Fund will make a partial payment of $60 million for the calendar year 1977 to participating prairie grain producers.

The partial payment of $60 million means that producers who contributed the maximum levies in each of 1976 and 1977 will receive an individual payment in excess of $1,100 each. The complete text of the minister's release, with the assent of honourable senators, could perhaps be included in the record of today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: It should have been a written question and a written answer.

[Text of news release follows:]

WINNIPEG, April 5, 1978—Otto Lang, Minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board today announced that the Western Grain Stabilization Plan will make a partial payment of $60 million for the calendar year 1977 to participating Prairie grain producers.

Mr. Lang said that this announcement was concrete proof of the benefit of the program on which he has been working for several years. The Western Grain Stabilization Plan now offers a level of effective protection for the incomes of grain producers—protection which was lacking prior to 1976 when the W.G.S.P. came into effect.

The partial payment of $60 million will mean that producers who contributed the maximum levies in each of 1976 and 1977 would receive an individual payment in excess of $1,100 each.

"This payment," the Minister emphasized, "was only part of the total payout which farmers would receive on account of the 1977 calendar year," Mr. Lang said.

Recognizing the fact that producers' cash requirements are highest just before spring seeding, it has been the intention since this program was first conceived that payment should be made prior to seeding.

Payment in full cannot be made at this time because the necessary information to determine the precise final payment is not yet complete. In fact, Statistics Canada field staff are currently visiting 9,000 farmers across the Prairie provinces to obtain some of the information necessary for the final calculations.

On the basis of production cost estimates for 1976 and 1977, it was determined that a payout would be required under the W.G.S.P. for 1977. Allowing for the fact that some of the figures will be refined later this year, it was felt prudent to make a partial payment now of only $60 million. The remainder of the payout—which is likely to be substantial—will be based on precise final figures available in the summer and fall.

Mr. Lang said that the information necessary to determine the payout was complex, and since the W.G.S.P. is a new program, the system to handle it is not fully developed yet. This year, even total receipts were not complete until after March 15. The Minister stated that his objective is to work towards making a single payout when there is to be one, and making it in April.

Mr. Lang said that he expected producers would be receiving their cheques in the mail around the end of April and concluded by saying that he and Agriculture Minister Eugene Whelan, whose department administers the program, were pleased at the success of the Western Grain Stabilization Plan. Prairie grain producers are sure to benefit substantially from it in the future, the Ministers said.

THE BUDGET

DISTRIBUTION OF MINISTER'S SPEECH—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask a question of the Leader of the Government. It may be that there is a simple answer, but where do we get a copy of the budget speech tonight. Will it be delivered to our offices or mail boxes?

I have just had a copy put on my desk, but I was wondering where I would get one in the event that a copy was not delivered to my mail box or my office tonight.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I should think there will be rather widespread distribution of this very important budget speech and the accompanying documentation tomorrow morning.

I have an extra copy in my possession which I would be most pleased to make available to the Leader of the Opposition, or to any other member of this house.

Senator Flynn: No, I want to have a good sleep tonight.
[Translation]

REDUCTION IN PROVINCIAL SALES TAX—QUESTION

Senator Asselin: In the budget speech delivered tonight, one of the great acts of generosity of the government is its announcement that the provincial sales tax would be lowered in cooperation with the provinces. It mentioned this tax would be cut for only six months.

Is this treat supposed to last only as long as the electoral campaign?

Senator Flynn: The answer is yes!

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, electoral considerations are far removed from the mind of the government at this time. The main concern is to instill in the economy the ingredients necessary for the kind of growth which Canada needs.

Senator Asselin: You should have thought of that before.

Senator Flynn: The kind of ingredients necessary to go through an election period.

Senator Denis: If you don't sleep, it is because it hurts.

Senator Flynn: Everything you do hurts. There is no doubt about that.

[Later:]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in reply to the earlier question posed with respect to the reduction of the retail sales tax, may I say that this measure was of course done in conjunction and in co-ordination with the various ministers of finance of the provinces of Canada.

Senator Asselin: For six months only.

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Senator Asselin: That is ridiculous.

Senator Perrault: Well, a consensus was achieved and an agreement was arrived at with respect to the operative period. It may well be that after the agreed period has elapsed the provinces, in conjunction with the federal government of that day, will wish to review the situation and perhaps continue the agreement in some form.

Senator Flynn: Ha! That is well put.

Senator Langlois: Well, we have no wild dreams such as you have.

NATIONAL REVENUE

DEFERRAL OF INCOME TAX ON PROCEEDS OF SALE OF LIVESTOCK HERDS—FURTHER QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Minister of National Revenue whether he can now answer the question I put to him on Thursday last regarding the deferral of income tax on the proceeds of sale of livestock.

The minister at that time seemed reluctant to say whether or not it would be in the budget speech. I have not yet had an opportunity to determine whether there is any such provision included in the budget. Perhaps the minister could tell us whether there is or not.

Senator Guay: I recall the question, but I am not in a position to give a specific answer at the moment.

MIDDLE EAST

PARTICIPATION OF CANADA IN UNITED NATIONS PEACEKEEPING FORCE IN SOUTHERN LEBANON

Senator Grosart: May I ask the Leader of the Government if it is his intention to reply to the question I asked at the last sitting regarding the ceasefire in that part of Lebanon in which the United Nations force is now established? At that time he said he might give the answer before the end of the sitting. I wonder if he is in a position to answer the question now.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have as yet received no further information on the subject. However, I will make further inquiries.

Senator Grosart: Does that mean that the government is not aware whether there is a ceasefire in that area? That is all the question was. Is there a ceasefire? I am surprised at the answer of the Leader of the Government that the government does not know; I am surprised in view of the fact that there are Canadian troops involved.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not have a current report at my desk which can be released, and for me to speculate on whether in fact a ceasefire is in existence in the area would be irresponsible without further reference to the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

QUEEN'S PRIVY COUNCIL FOR CANADA

INSTRUMENT OF ADVICE FOR SUMMONING A PERSON— QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 3—By Senator Forsey:

What are the precise terms of the Instrument of Advice for the summoning of a person to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada?

[Senator Perrault.]

Answer:

Privy Councillors are appointed by the Governor General on the recommendation of the Prime Minister by instrument of advice which reads as follows:

Your Excellency:

The undersigned submits for Your Excellency's pleasure that . . . . . be chosen and summoned to be a Member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada.

Respectfully submitted,

Prime Minister,

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Graham moved the third reading of Bill C-38, to amend the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Henry D. Hicks moved the second reading of Bill C-18, to amend the Anti-Inflation Act and guidelines.

He said: Honourable senators, for the most part this bill contains amendments of a technical nature and amendments required for an orderly decontrol process.

It must be obvious that wage and price controls were not intended as a permanent feature of our economy. The government does not believe in excessive intervention in the marketplace. On October 20, 1977, the Minister of Finance announced the procedures for phasing out controls, and established April 14 as the starting date for the phase-out. The phased approach, together with the April 14 starting date, was chosen to give maximum effectiveness and equity to the final stages of the control program.

The behaviour of prices over the past year may have led some people to question the contribution of the program, but this surely represents a misreading of the evidence. The high rates of increase in the cost of living have resulted mainly from food price increases and from the depreciation of the exchange rate—items which cannot be controlled by Canada alone. The worst of the impact of these changes is now behind us and the rate of inflation has begun a downward trend. There are some favourable signs appearing in the anti-inflation program: wage increases are being submitted at reasonable levels and only moderate price increases are being received under the pre-notification program.

The program itself has had a significant impact on public expectations. Goals and priorities are better understood, especially the difficulties faced in maintaining a competitive trading position. It is more generally recognized that we cannot expect the large increases in real income which we were able to obtain in the relatively easy times of the 1960s and early 1970s.

As we move toward the decontrol phase, prospects are good with regard to labour costs. Last year we experienced a sizable decrease in the number of work days lost owing to strikes. In fact, in 1977 the number of man-days lost in strikes in Canada was only 30 per cent of the number of man-days lost in strikes in 1976.

Senator Flynn: They should have done something about it two years before.

Senator Hicks: Well, that is a matter of speculation, but in any event I suggest that the performance of 1977 is one in which Canadians can take some satisfaction, although I am not happy at Canada's position among the developed nations of the world in respect of the number of man-days lost in strikes. But to have cut it to more than one-third from 1976 to 1977 is, I submit, a fact in which Canadians can take some real satisfaction.

Senator Flynn: If that had been done in 1974 it would have been much better for 1975. But the government did not have the courage. It was an election year.

Senator Hicks: I certainly do not have the data with which to debate this point with my honourable friend the Leader of the Opposition, but I suspect that his is an exercise in generalizations which cannot be analysed or proven very accurately.

Senator Flynn: I have some facts for you, my friend.

Senator Hicks: Perhaps we will hear from you later in this debate, then.

Union leaders have indicated that wage demands will be reasonable after April 14. Responsible persons, both in labour and in management, are aware that unrealistic demands will only reduce job creation or cause the disappearance of existing jobs.

It should be remembered that the controls are only one part of the anti-inflation program. Governments at all levels are exercising restraint. At the First Ministers' Conference in February, it was agreed that the growth of their expenditures should be limited to less than the growth in the gross national product. With regard to monetary policy, the Bank of Canada has set targets for the growth in the money supply which will lead to continued deceleration of the inflation rate while accommodating a reasonable rate of real growth.

As a matter of fact, the Bank of Canada contemplates that the money growth rate in the year facing us will be only between 7 and 11 per cent, substantially less than we have experienced in some recent years.

● (2050)

As we approach the end of controls, steps have been taken to ensure that the government, as an employer, will not provoke the private sector into a wage-price spiral. I hope that this may prove to be true. In February, the first ministers agreed to the principle that public sector compensation should follow rather than lead in the private sector. I hope that this may also prove to be true.

At the First Ministers' Conference, it was also agreed that the Economic Council of Canada should be asked whether it was feasible for it to assume responsibility for monitoring incomes, prices and productivity as controls are removed. The objective would be to help ensure that all groups remain aware of the harm caused by inflation, but to do so in a way that leads to minimal increases in the bureaucracy and imposes no additional demands on firms for information. On March 15 the Prime Minister wrote to the chairman of the council to formally make the request. While the specific plans have not yet been settled, the council has agreed in principle.

Let me now turn to the amendments. First, I would like to deal with those of a technical nature. An order in council which brought under mandatory controls various groups that bargain in association would be back-dated to December 16, 1975 from April 15, 1976. This action is being taken to remedy uncertainty resulting from a procedural error. This is the substance of clauses 1 and 8 of the bill, and the procedural error is, I believe, of particular interest to members of this chamber. The minister is required to make the announcement in the House of Commons. He actually made it before a Senate committee, and hence legislative changes are required to validate that change.

A time limit would be imposed for parties referring a matter to the administrator. That is clause 2 of the bill. The authority of the administrator to deal with past or current contraventions of the guidelines would be clarified. This is clause 3 of the bill. Cabinet would be given adequate time to deal with petitions from parties affected by an order of the administrator and the definition of compensation plans would be clarified. This is covered by clauses 4 and 7 of the bill.

There are then two amendments relating to the decontrol process. Under clause 6, compensation plans would be deemed amended in line with a recommendation of the Anti-Inflation Board or an order of the administrator. Without this amendment, groups would probably be entitled to the negotiated level of wages as soon as controls ceased to apply.

The remaining amendment deals with administration in the transition period and prevents the use of the so-called AIB clauses. As the act presently stands, there are no provisions to take action against those firms or groups who have not reported early enough to allow the administrator to issue a binding order before December 31, 1978 when the legislation expires. This situation is clearly unsatisfactory and inequitable. This amendment would ensure that the required information would be filed for the period covered by controls and allow the AIB, the administrator and the Anti-Inflation Appeal Tribunal to remain in office so long as necessary to enforce compliance in respect of the controls period.

Turning now to the AIB clauses, the amendment will prevent the use of clauses which call for a higher entitlement to compensation as soon as the group is no longer covered by controls. It is designed to build in further restraint against a wage bulge. I should like to point out that there is no specific clause in the bill to begin the lifting of controls on April 14. This starting date for phased decontrol has been established through changes to the regulations.

Honourable senators, those are the main comments that I wish to make with regard to the bill. If honourable senators wish, I can comment in detail on each of the clauses of the bill, but I have chosen to do so only in a general way. As honourable senators know, the legislation has to take effect from April 14 and there is some urgency that we deal with the bill, and pass it so that it can receive royal assent before Friday of this week. I commend the legislation to the favourable consideration of the house.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment of the debate, may I ask the sponsor of the bill one question? If I understood him correctly, he stated that there was no clause in the bill stipulating the date of April 14, yet he finished his comments with the plea that the bill be passed and become effective by April 14. Could he explain the difference in his statements?

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I do not think it is a matter of there being a difference. I must admit that I am one who, throughout the whole of his legislative experience, has been skeptical of doing through regulations what should be done through statutes. In fact, this is provided for in the regulations and not in the statute which we are considering this evening.

Senator Flynn: Are you sure that the regulation is intra vires?

Senator Hicks: I beg the honourable senator's pardon?

Senator Flynn: This is a bill enabling the government to establish by regulation that the controls will end on April 14. Has the honourable senator checked that?

Senator Hicks: I am afraid that I cannot attest to that. I presume that is so, but I have not made a personal inquiry which I am prepared to stand behind.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, if I may be permitted to ask another question of the sponsor of the bill, did I understand him to say that it was important that the bill be passed by Friday of this week?

Senator Hicks: Yes.

Senator Phillips: The obvious follow-up to that is: Why?

Senator Hicks: Because April 14 is the date on which the decontrol process was announced to begin by the minister last fall. Honourable senators may question whether or not the minister should have chosen that date, but that is the date that he did choose, and it is the date on which many agencies in the country, presumably both employers and employees, have based their assumptions as to what would happen when the AIB regulations began to be phased out.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if I might ask the sponsor of the bill, if authority to start the phasing out is claimed to be under the regulations, what has that to do with the passing of the bill?

Senator Flynn: What will be the consequence of not passing the bill?

Senator Hicks: It is a good question, and I cannot answer it. I will have to take that question as notice.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, may I say that it is very difficult to discuss the bill when the sponsor cannot explain its urgency. I find his answer to the question as to why we need the bill difficult to follow, if the authority to proceed with the phasing out on April 14 by regulation is valid. Surely we should have an answer to that question before we are even asked to discuss the bill.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators cannot get the answer from me tonight. I will see what I can do about it.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I wish Senator Hicks pleasant dreams, and move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Hicks: I doubt that I shall dream about it at all.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

BELL CANADA—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets moved the second reading of Bill C-1001, respecting Bell Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, my presentation will not extend beyond five minutes.

• (2100)

Bill C-1001 is an act respecting Bell Canada, and corresponds to Bill S-2, which, if I remember correctly, passed the Senate in December, 1976. It received first reading in the House of Commons at the end of December, 1976, but did not receive second or third reading in that house before the end of the last session. The present bill was introduced in the Commons in October, 1977, in exactly the same form as Bill S-2, but was subsequently amended at the committee stage.

I do not think it is necessary for me at this stage to review the bill in detail, or to comment on the company in question, as I did in 1976 when speaking to Bill S-2. In order to refresh your memories, however, I propose to deal very briefly with the two main objectives of the bill as it now stands before us.

The first such objective is to increase the authorized capital stock of Bell Canada from $1.75 billion to a new limit of $5 billion. This is urgently needed in order to assist the company in financing its new construction and equipment program over the next ten years or so. The capital stock of the company was last increased to its present limit in 1968.

The second principal objective of the bill is to improve and modernize the financial powers of the company so that it can enjoy the same financial flexibility as its competitors in the financial marketplace. I may mention here that without the passage of this bill the company will not be able to borrow under the authority of the general borrowing bylaw, neither will it be able to split shares or pay dividends in kind. All the provisions of this bill relate to these two objectives, and are to a large degree lifted from the Canada Corporations Act, and are similar to charter amendments granted to British Columbia Telephone Company through Bill S-11, assented to in the Senate in December, 1974.

For the benefit of honourable senators who have been appointed to this chamber since my speech on Bill S-2, I should like to point out that this bill has nothing whatsoever to do with the rates charged by the company for its services; and after this bill is passed the company will continue to be regulated by the CRTC.

The bill presently before us is a reincarnation of a bill that was passed by this house in December, 1976, having been discussed at the second and third reading stages and examined by the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, at which time we had a detailed explanation by the president of the company. The only changes made in the version passed by the Senate are deletions, not additions or substitutions, since at the committee stage in the Commons it was felt that there were two or three clauses which appeared to them to be contentious. The clauses in question were deleted and there were no additions, and so we are now faced with a bill that the Senate passed in 1976, and I hope that quick passage will be given to this legislation which has been before Parliament for the last 17 months.

In these circumstances, honourable senators, if this bill receives second reading, unless you insist, I do not think it should be referred to a standing Senate committee; but I leave this in your hands.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I rise just to correct something which was said involuntarily, I am sure, by the honourable sponsor of this bill. When he said the CRTC, he meant the CTC. This was certainly a lapsus linguae.

Senator Grosart: In view of the fact that this bill was passed by the Senate but has subsequently been amended in the Commons, would the sponsor of the bill indicate what those amendments were, and if possible give the reasons for the Commons amending the bill after this chamber and a Senate committee had approved it in its original form?

Senator Deschatelets: I hope that I can do this briefly, and that I can satisfactorily answer the point raised by Senator Grosart.

Three clauses were amended in the committee stage of the bill's passage in the House of Commons. The proposed new sections 5.2 and 5.3 contained in clause 2 were deleted; clause 4 was deleted, and clause 6 was amended by deleting the words "sections 1 and 2 of chapter" in line 6 on page 9, and substituting therefor the words "section 1 of chapter".

The first charter of Bell Canada was granted by a special act of Parliament, so that it is impossible for Bell Canada to amend its charter without proceeding by way of a private bill. The company has to submit any changes in its powers to Parliament.

I must remind honourable senators that two or three years ago Bell Canada wished to increase the number of its directors by one or two. This had to be done by way of a private bill, and this process took about 16 months.

The main point in the original bill was to take the company partially out of the "tutelle" of Parliament. I think Senator Grosart will remember this.

I must say that the principle of Bill S-2, which we passed here previously, was the right of the company to modify its charter by letters patent while still remaining under the control of Parliament, but using a form other than that which is provided by the charter in its present form. The committee of the House of Commons felt that it did not wish to grant this special power at this time. What is left, therefore, is the request by Bell Canada to have some changes made to their powers in order that they may be able to go forward with their program of expansion in which they will spend about $5 billion over the next ten years.

● (2110)

The amendments I have given you, Senator Grosart, were some of the amendments that you will remember we discussed in committee. The purpose was to put Bell Canada in the same position as Telesat, for instance. Because of important financial problems, it was felt by Bell Canada that they needed all the power originally provided by our Bill S-2 of the last session in order to be more flexible in reaching the foreign market where they will be able to do their financing through sales of shares. Since we are in this present situation today, the company will be satisfied with the passage of this bill, at least for the time being.

Senator Grosart: Supplementary to that question and explanation, I wonder if, just for clarification, the sponsor of the bill would agree that the effect of the amendments made by the Commons was to deny Bell Telephone the main benefits that they sought in Bill S-2 of the last session?

Senator Deschatelets: I would have to agree with that.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, is it true that the amendments which the sponsor of the bill has referred to were made by agreement in the other place? The opposition of the NDP and the Social Credit Party to the clauses that have now been deleted was so strong that the sponsor of the bill there introduced the amendments and they were passed without dissent, as far as I can recall from the committee proceedings.

Senator Deschatelets: This is perfectly right.

Senator Flynn: Compromise.

Senator Langlois: Negotiation.

Senator Grosart: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Langlois: Did you move the adjournment of the debate?

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, it was my intention to move that the debate be adjourned.

Senator Langlois: That is what I thought.

Senator Grosart: I merely asked the honourable senator two or three questions.

Motion agreed to.

CONFERENCE ON ALTERNATIVES CANADA*PROPOSALS CONCERNING THE SENATE—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I wonder if I may be excused if I make a short statement on the inquiry standing in the name of Senator Buckwold?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: It seems rather inconsistent that a senator should give notice of an inquiry and someone else should speak on it first.

Senator Argue: If honourable senators do not wish to hear me, that is perfectly all right. However, may I just explain the situation? Senator Buckwold placed this inquiry on the order paper. He was at the Conference on Alternatives Canada, which was sponsored by the Canada West Foundation, as I was, but unfortunately he is away this week. We all know the events that may take place this week, and Senator Buckwold felt, after discussing it with me, that it would be well if there could be some discussion of this question in the Senate this week. I am in the hands of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Give notice that tomorrow you will call the attention of the Senate to this matter.

Senator Argue: With leave of the Senate I give notice that I will call the attention of the Senate to the subject matter of this inquiry tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

FARM CREDIT ACT

REPORT OF AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

MONDAY, April 10, 1978

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture which was "authorized to examine and report upon the subject-matter of Bill C-29, intituled: "An Act to amend the Farm Credit Act", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto," has in obedience to the order of reference of Wednesday, March 22, 1978, examined the said subject-matter and now reports upon the same.

Your Committee met on Wednesday, April 5, 1978, and heard from the Chairman of the Farm Credit Corporation, Dr. Roland Poirier, and from other officials of the Corporation. Your Committee met a second time, today, to discuss further its order of reference and to prepare its report.

Your Committee considers the amendments to the Farm Credit Act that are put forth in Bill C-29 to be important amendments, first, because they are good and necessary, and secondly, because they implement and in some cases go beyond the recommendations made by your Committee to the Senate on Thursday, April 24, 1975, when Bill C-34, "An Act to amend the Farm Credit Act", was reported upon. In that report your Committee proposed an amendment to the bill and made two recommendations. The proposed Bill C-29 implements both those recommendations.

In 1975, your Committee's first recommendation was that:

... the Government consider the advisability of increasing the capital of the Farm Credit Corporation from one hundred million to one hundred and twenty-five million dollars.

Bill C-29 amends the Farm Credit Act to raise the capital of the Corporation to one hundred and fifty million dollars. Your Committee wishes to note, however, that there is considerable urgency associated with this particular amendment since we were informed by Dr. Poirier that without an immediate infusion of capital the Farm Credit Corporation would exhaust its lending capability either later this month or during the month of May. Your Committee welcomes this increase in the Corporation's capital as it will assist the Corporation in vigorously expanding its provision of credit to farmers for the development of agricultural production in Canada.

The second recommendation made by your Committee in its report on Bill C-34 was that:

... the Government consider the advisability of increasing the ceilings on loans made under Parts III and IV to new and young farmers from one hundred and fifty thousand dollars to two hundred thousand dollars and of increasing the ceiling on loans made under Part II to older and established farmers from one hundred thousand to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Your Committee made that recommendation because it was ... concerned that the current upward trend in the price of land and other farm capital will continue and that the loan ceilings under the Act may soon become inadequate for the needs of both new and established farmers.

The trend did continue. Evidence presented by the Farm Credit Corporation shows that since 1975 land values in Canada have increased by twenty-five percent and that since 1971 the average capital value of Canadian farms having sales of farm products of ten thousand dollars or more has doubled, reaching the sum of 238,600 dollars. Your Committee fully expects this trend, arising as it does out of the need for farm consolidation, the greater substitution of capital for labour, and the increase in competition for agricultural land from non-agricultural uses, will continue.

Your Committee appreciates that the amendments will increase the loan ceiling for both new, young farmers and older or established farmers to two hundred thousand dollars.

Your Committee wishes to point out that the proposed loan ceiling, because of the continuing upward trend in land values, is already inadequate especially for the establishment of new, young farmers in those regions of Canada where land values and productivity are highest. Your Committee believes that a ceiling of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars would have been more appropriate at this time and for the near future. Therefore, your Committee recommends that the adequacy of the ceilings be carefully monitored and that legislation providing for their amendment be introduced as soon as they are found to be inadequate.

The proposed amendments to the Farm Credit Act would make other changes as well. They would remove the interest penalty on arrears and by so doing bring the practice under the Act into conformity with general practice and with the spirit of the Interest Act. They would increase the flexibility of the Farm Credit Corporation in the provision of advisory services to borrowers and eliminate the mandatory supervision fee of twenty-five dollars. The amendments would also permit the use of "market value" as a basis for the appraisal of farm land, once again increasing the flexibility of the administrators of the Act. Your Committee considers that these amendments are in all cases well advised either because current practices are outdated or because they are in conflict with other legislation.

Your Committee's order of reference authorized it to examine and report on the subject-matter of the bill or on any matter relating thereto. During the discussions in committee, two related subjects were raised upon which your Committee wishes to comment now.

The first of these was the cost of legal services arising out of loans granted by the Farm Credit Corporation. The cost of these services is paid by the borrower and it is believed by many borrowers that the services are excessively expensive. Your Committee recognizes that transactions of the magnitude permitted under the Act must be properly and carefully carried out and that there are variations from province to province in land registration systems and procedures. However, your Committee is of the opinion that the costs involved could be substantially reduced and that fees charged should be clearly based on the services rendered not on the value of the land being mortgaged. Thus, your Committee has asked the Chairman of the Farm Credit Corporation to study this problem and to report to it on steps which could be taken to bring about a reduction in these costs.

The second related subject that was discussed and about which your Committee wishes to comment is the use of Appropriation Acts to amend other statutes. The amendments proposed in Bill C-29 would authorize the increasing of the capital of the Corporation under an Appropriation Act. Your Committee is concerned about this amendment and the practice in general, especially as it affects the overseeing of those matters by the appropriate Standing Senate Committee. This use of Appropriation Acts is a matter of importance which has been raised by other Committees in the past, notably in the Second Report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments and in various reports of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. Your Committee is of the opinion that the wording of Clause 3 should have referred to a Committee of Parliament rather than a Committee of the House of Commons and recommends that the Senate should give consideration to the problems that arise out of the use of Appropriation Acts for these purposes to insure that the Senate's effective consideration of legislation is not impaired.

In conclusion, your Committee wishes to express its continued support for the objectives of the Farm Credit Act. The provision of long-term agricultural credit under this Act is necessary for the continued development of Canada's agricultural potential and for the facilitation of the transfer of agricultural resources to succeeding generations of farmers. The amendments that are proposed in Bill C-29 will greatly assist in the achievement of these objectives.

Respectfully submitted,

HAZEN ARGUE,
Chairman.

THE ESTIMATES

DOCUMENT ENTITLED "FEDERAL SPENDING PLANS, 1978-79"— QUESTION

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning a piece of paper, which I was honoured by having delivered to me today headed "Federal Spending Plans, 1978-79. Estimates show restraint." Some other misinformation is also included in it.

I am wondering if this document is published at public expense and, if so, by whose authority. What is its circulation, and what is its cost?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is very probably issued by an enthusiastic citizens' group, but I would be pleased to receive a copy of the publication so that I can ascertain whether it has any remote connection with the government.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Well, I would be glad to send a copy over to the honourable leader, and I would ask him if he would look at the very first words at the top of the first page. Perhaps he would ascertain if they read, "Treasury Board," and whether they bear the emblem of a maple leaf and bar alongside it, as customarily used to identify government publications. I would be glad to send it over to him now. After he has identified this, and ascertained whether it is likely to be printed as a private publication, perhaps he would be prepared to answer my question.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in the meantime, as I await a copy of what appears from this distance to be a rather substantial body of very relevant and useful information headed, "Federal Spending Plans for 1978-79" may I—

Senator Grosart: It is an election document, is it?

Senator Perrault:—briefly state that I am now in a position to provide information with respect to the important questions asked by the Honourable Senator Grosart in recent days with respect to peacekeeping forces in Lebanon.

MIDDLE EAST

PARTICIPATION OF CANADA IN UNITED NATIONS
PEACEKEEPING FORCE IN SOUTHERN LEBANON—QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with regard to the participation of Canada in peacekeeping in southern Lebanon, I now have some authorized information which may be given to the house.

To the question as to whether the ceasefire is being observed completely at the present time, the answer is as follows. The United Nations Secretary General reported to the Security Council Saturday that the situation in southern Lebanon has remained generally quiet with certain local exceptions. There have been occasional exchanges of fire in the western, or so-called French area, and the eastern or so-called Norwegian sector, of UNIFL's area of operations. The Secretary-General's representative, General Ensio Sulasvuori of Finland, has been in contact with all parties concerning both the implementation of the ceasefire and the withdrawal of Israeli forces.

To the question as to what arrangements are being made for the participation by the Canadian military authorities in that area in any military decisions as to the deployment of the force in Lebanon, the answer is as follows:

Decisions concerning UNIFL are being taken by General E. A. Erskine of Ghana, the Interim Force Commander, in consultation with the UN Secretary General, who in turn reports to the Security Council of which Canada is a member.

General Erskine's advisers include military observers with the UN Truce Supervision Organization, four of whom are Canadians.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I wonder if I might ask a supplementary to that question. I am wondering if the report to which the Leader of the Government refers as having been made Saturday last is the most recent report the Government of Canada has on the matter.

Senator Perrault: There are indications that United Nations officials are desirous of involving Canadian troops in the operation of Lebanon in a more direct way. I cannot provide any further information with respect to that. The information which I have provided now is the latest available.

With respect to the earlier inquiry from Senator Smith—

Senator Grosart: Before the Leader of the Government leaves this question, I wonder if he would consider giving a more precise answer by informing the Senate as to whether any units of any description in the southern Lebanon area are continuing to fire on areas occupied by the United Nations force of which Canada is a member.

Senator Perrault: I have no information which would indicate that is the case, honourable senators, but another inquiry will be undertaken this afternoon to see whether or not any hostilities of the kind mentioned have occurred in the last 24 hours.

DOCUMENT ENTITLED "FEDERAL SPENDING PLANS, 1978-79"— QUESTION

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with respect to the observations made by honourable Senator Smith, the document which he has provided for me clearly appears to be a document issued by the Treasury Board. It is entitled, "Federal Spending Plans". May I inform honourable senators that we will have an opportunity to discuss fiscal, financial and budget proposals in this chamber in the next few days, and I know Senator Smith will wish to bring to that debate his usual cogent observations with respect to the government's financial and fiscal policies.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I have no doubt that the honourable gentleman's prophecy is correct. In the meantime, I would like to have my question answered if he is able to provide the answer.

Senator Perrault: With respect to the estimates and whether restraint is being demonstrated or not?

Senator Smith (Colchester): Hansard will correct me if I am wrong, but I think the substance of my questions were as follows: who authorized this; what was its distribution; what did it cost the public purse, and was it entirely financed by the public purse? In order to get the exact substance of my question, reference will have to be made to Hansard. But that is my recollection at the moment.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must take that question as notice. It really follows the well-established tradition of both provincial and federal governments to make certain that taxpayers are fully aware of the manner in which their affairs are being conducted.

Senator Flynn: I was surprised by the comment of the Leader of the Government that we are going to discuss the budget in the next few days. Is that a new practice that the Leader of the Government intends to introduce in this chamber? Are we going to have a debate on the budget?

Senator Perrault: I was going to suggest that in the next few days honourable senators will have many opportunities to discuss fiscal and financial policies of this government, and if the honourable senator wishes to initiate a discussion he may so do. It would not be a formal budget debate.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I wonder if the Leader of the Government would return to me the document which was so generously offered to me earlier by his confrères.

Senator Perrault: I am heartened to note that the honourable senator wishes to go over the contents again very carefully.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Yes. I find it extremely interesting. I feel I will be able to make a few good speeches on this matter.

THE ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER RULE 46(G) TO CONSIDER MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, pursuant to rule 46(g), I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Asselin:

That the Senate do now adjourn for the purpose of considering a matter of urgent public importance; namely, the increasing levels of unemployment and the failure of the government to take adequate action to relieve the problem of unemployment.

● (1410)

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, if I may deal for a moment with the motion—

Some Hon. Senators: Order.

Senator Perrault: The question was put.

Senator Flynn: That is not the position you took on two previous occasions.

Senator Phillips: I am rather surprised that honourable senators opposite take such a different attitude today to the one they took on March 7 when—

Senator McElman: Order.

Senator Phillips: At that time I believe Senator Molgat was able to—

Senator McElman: On a point of order. It is not debatable.

Senator Flynn: When we objected it was debated on two previous occasions.

Senator Smith (Colchester): At great length.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps I might ask, on that point of order, what authority is suggested for the statement at this time that the motion is not debatable? I hope it will not be the old story that a motion to adjourn is not debatable, because the authorities make it clear that that does not refer to this particular motion. It has always been debated when it has been raised in the past. I would suggest, honourable senators, that on the point of order we have an immediate ruling from the Speaker that it is debatable.

Senator McElman: The point of order is raised not on the motion but on whether leave was given, and leave was not given.

Senator Flynn: Leave is not required.

Senator McElman: It is.

Senator Flynn: You don't need leave.

Senator Smith (Colchester): No leave is required.

Senator McElman: Leave is required for the motion.

Senator Flynn: Where do you find that leave is required?

Senator McElman: Leave is required.

Senator Flynn: Where is it? State the rule.

Senator Grosart: No leave is required.

Senator McElman: It is.

Senator Phillips: Senator McElman has kept his record intact. For the ten or so years that he has been a member of this chamber he has never discussed unemployment, and he is going to maintain that record.

Erskine May sets out certain conditions for a motion of this type. First, the motion must be very specific. I maintain that my motion is specific. It does not mention all the failures of the government. It is specific; it mentions unemployment. It does not mention inflation, high interest rates, national disunity or any of the other problems. It mentions unemployment.

Secondly, the problem must be national; that is, it does not apply to one specific area of Canada. Every province, every geographical area of Canada, and every senatorial area of Canada, has large numbers of unemployed. Therefore the motion is in order in that respect.

As to the urgency of debate, the latest unemployment figures were released this morning. For the third consecutive month there have been over one million unemployed, and for the third consecutive month the numbers have continued to climb. Surely that must convey some sort of sense of urgency to honourable senators opposite. The measures contained in the mini-budget announced last October failed to check the climb in unemployment figures. Indeed, one of the programs mentioned in the mini-budget has expired and the other, the tax incentive, is bogged down in a bureaucratic bungle. Therefore, I suggest that this motion—

Senator Perrault: You need a notice of inquiry. This is not a debate now.

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators, on a point of order. Is the speech which the honourable member is now making in order? I would ask Your Honour to rule on that.

Senator Grosart: Might I suggest that it is not a point of order for any honourable senator to rise and ask if it is in order. Surely the honourable senator is sufficiently aware of the rules of procedure in a legislature to know that if he has a point of order he must speak to that point of order and not ask if it is in order.

Senator Rowe: Permission was not given to the honourable senator to make this speech. Am I now to understand that at any point during the tenure of the Senate any honourable senator may rise to suggest a resolution and then proceed to make a speech with respect to it without approval?

Senator Grosart: You should have been here when that was decided.

An Hon. Senator: It was not decided.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, no one in this chamber rejects the idea of discussing the subject of unemployment. It is certainly in order for the honourable senator to give notice of inquiry—

Senator Grosart: No, it is not notice of inquiry at all.

Senator Perrault: No, but the honourable senator can initiate an inquiry here and can initiate a full discussion of the question of unemployment.

Senator Flynn: Let us hear from Senator Argue.

Senator Perrault: If the Leader of the Opposition would permit me and extend the courtesy of listening, I have a brief observation to make.

Senator Flynn: With great pleasure and respect.

Senator Perrault: I make reference to rule 46(g) on page 12 of our rules, which reads as follows:

for the adjournment of the Senate for the purposes of raising a matter of urgent public importance (which the mover shall state on rising to speak) before the House proceeds to the orders of the day;

Now, the honourable senator had his opportunity to state the nature of this matter of urgent public importance, which he did. It was then appropriate to move to have a vote taken on that particular matter of urgency. However, there are alternative ways in which the honourable senator could proceed to have a debate on the subject if he so desires, just as the Honourable Senator Smith (Colchester), if he wishes to discuss economics, fiscal and financial policies, can. But it seems to me that to use rule 46 as a blind or cover to get off a speech on the subject of unemployment is really quite unfair.

Senator Flynn: That is what I said on two previous occasions and you would not listen to me. You proceeded with debating the question of beef because it was of interest to Senator Argue. Also, on other occasions Senator McElman and Senator Michaud used that device. Now, if the Leader of the Government wishes to have a ruling by the Chair that such a motion requires unanimous consent, I do not mind. Let the Chair rule on it and we will abide by that ruling so that we will be prevented in the future from events such as those provoked by Senator Argue, Senator McElman and others on your side.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I regret the reference made by the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition to the instance of Senator Michaud. I apologized to the house for my responsibility in that. I was wrong, Senator Michaud was not. It was a matter of, as I said—

• (1420)

Senator Flynn: You said you inspired him.

Senator McElman: No, I did not inspire him.

Senator Asselin: You said it before.

Senator McElman: At that time I suggested it was due to my inexperience and my naïveté.

Senator Flynn: After the fact.

Senator McElman: Please. As the honourable senator will recall, I was sitting beside him speaking with him as this matter arose, and at the first opportunity I arose and apologized to the house for my inexperience and my naïveté.

So, I do deplore that he raised the matter of Senator Michaud's intervention at that time. I agree with him that it was a matter of wrong timing.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, may I venture to point out that the whole purpose of rule 46(g) is to provide for debate on a subject like this. The procedure is well known in the other place, and I think the procedure is analogous here. Surely, there is no point at all in having rule 46(g) in here if there is not to be debate. Merely to give the opportunity for someone to rise and announce that he thinks the Senate should adjourn for the purpose of raising a matter of urgent public importance—well, there is no use raising it unless you can say something about it. The whole purpose of the thing is to debate it. It is, in my judgment, ridiculous to suggest that this is put in here merely to allow someone like the Honourable Senator Phillips to get up and say, "I want to raise the question of unemployment. I move the Senate do now adjourn." If that is the purpose of the rule, you might as well wipe it out forthwith. It becomes a complete superfluity and surplus verbiage.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, on a point of order, if I might say a word or two. I think when Senator Phillips raised this matter he referred to May. He also, I believe it is fair to say, tried to draw an analogy from what is in the reference book to the practice which takes place in the other house. That practice is, of course, that a member may rise and adjourn the proceedings and orders that are before that place for a matter of urgency. That is provided for in Standing Order No. 26 in the other house. But, immediately that that is done, the speaker is required to make a ruling as to whether the urgency is there. Furthermore, it is not on the urgency of the matter; it is on the urgency of debating the matter.

Senator Grosart: Of course. He said that. He made that clear.

Senator Olson: That is right. We get to the impasse when we talk about whether or not it is automatic that you proceed with it without having a ruling.

I am relatively new here, but I understand that determinations of rulings are somewhat different in this chamber from what they are in the other place. In the other place, the Speaker does make a ruling that is binding on all members of that chamber. To make a ruling of that nature in the Senate, the question is put to the senators present. They decide whether or not there is the matter of urgency of debate. This has to be established in the minds of people before the debate proceeds.

Therefore, I suggest that if you are going to search through the authorities and precedents with respect to moving the adjournment of all other business for a matter of urgency—that is, urgency of debate—then you must have a ruling from someone.

In our case the practice is slightly different from that in the House of Commons. It may be that there is a majority present who believe that the subject matter requires urgency of debate now, meaning that that debate will move ahead of all other business on the order paper, no matter how important that business is.

If the majority of honourable senators agree with Senator Phillips, the debate should proceed; but we should at least determine whether or not a majority here feel that the urgency of debate on unemployment is so great that it shall take precedence over every other matter that has been set down under all the other rules that we have.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, on the point of order just raised, the honourable senator says he is new here and he has just proven it. He has suggested that the rule in the Senate is that the majority of senators will decide a point of order. That is a completely new concept as far as I am concerned. Surely it is the Speaker, in a final analysis, who will decide on any point of order raised.

I am in complete agreement with Senator Olson when he says that the issue in this instance is the urgency of debate, not the urgency of unemployment, and Senator Phillips, in moving this motion, made it clear that it was the urgency of debate because of the latest unemployment figures, which makes it urgent at this particular time. He was precise in that respect, and he brought it completely within the rules.

I agree that if a ruling is to be made as to whether urgency of debate at this point comes within the rules, it is a decision for the Speaker.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, unless the rules have been changed substantially in the other place since I served there, usually there must be unanimous consent from the members of that place before—

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Senator Perrault: —before a debate may proceed on a matter of urgent public importance.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Senator Phillips: No wonder you didn't last there very long.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I dislike, as always, to differ with the Leader of the Government as vigorously as I have to now. I would far rather agree with him. It makes for more congenial association. However, I shall have to give priority to stating what I believe to be the true situation.

I do not believe for a moment, with all due respect to him, that he is anywhere near right when he says there must be unanimous consent in the other place before a debate can proceed on a matter of urgent public importance.

The Leader of the Government may remember that on the occasion of the "urgency" concerning cattle being withheld from the market, I pointed out to him that once the matter is stated in the other place, the Speaker rules whether or not it is in order and comes within the particular rule which deals with matters of urgent public importance. If the Speaker so rules, a certain number of members may stand, in which event the debate takes place. There is no unanimity at all.

I also read to him on that occasion rule 1 of the Rules of the Senate, which reads as follows:

In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as practicable, be followed in the Senate or any committee thereof.

On that occasion the honourable gentleman and some of his colleagues decided not to pay any attention to that rule and no attention to the customs and usages of the other house, notwithstanding that those matters were plainly put before them. Instead, they decided that the withholding of cattle from the market by farmers in certain provinces of Canada was sufficiently urgent to set aside all other business of the Senate and proceed with a debate on that matter.

Perhaps they were right, although I thought differently at the time and I think differently now. We then offered them the same opportunity that they now offer Senator Phillips, that being that we would give leave later in the day to proceed with such a debate. They rejected that out of hand. They took the position that they were within the rule and they were going to enforce that rule—"Say what you like about the Rules of the House of Commons, or what May says, we are within the rule and we are going to enforce it."

I do not profess to quote them precisely, but that was the general gist of the attitude they then took and pronounced.

Senator Flynn: The matter of cattle being withheld from the market is more important than a million unemployed for this government.

Senator Smith (Colchester): It seems to me that if the subject of cattle being withheld from the market for a time in some provinces of Canada is sufficiently urgent to debate under this rule, surely the same holds true for the fact that over one million Canadians are unable to find employment.

Senator Guay: It is the urgency of debate.

Senator Smith (Colchester): The honourable gentleman has not been out of work lately, otherwise he would know how urgent it is to be out of work. He would know the urgency felt by one million Canadians.

● (1430)

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, some doubts have been expressed with respect to the rules on the other side, and I can clarify the matter very easily.

Senator Flynn: Oh, yes, the authority! Just imagine!

Senator Guay: Yes, I can. I made reference to the rule in the other place, not in this place. I would like to agree with Senator Forsey with regard to its being a time-consuming matter and one involving a loss of time with respect to rule 46 whether it is in this house or in the other place.

Senator Marshall: It is rule 26 there.

Senator Guay: The reason I say that is that a period of 15 minutes is allowed in every Question Period in the House of Commons for a motion of an urgent nature, under rule 46, on a daily basis. In other words, to my way of thinking, we lose 15 minutes every day under that rule because many members bring in matters which they consider to be of great urgency, and it is a question of getting unanimous consent on each of the questions before they can be discussed. That is the rule in the other house, and to prove my point I am getting my copy of the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, and I shall quote you the rule and the manner in which it is implemented. I am told it is rule 43 instead of rule 46, but it is similar to the rule 46 that you have here.

Senator Grosart: In no way.

Senator Guay: And in any case, you have to have unanimous consent.

Senator Flynn: That does not apply here.

Senator Guay: If honourable senators would only give someone a chance to express an opinion instead of yelling we could probably get somewhere. I would humbly suggest to all honourable senators that if it is a matter of great urgency—and I would agree that it is—then we ought to take a vote on it to clarify the situation immediately, and then we will know whether we proceed to a discussion of this important matter or leave it alone. I would suggest that we take a vote in this particular instance and get it over with.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, perhaps I could be helpful—and I certainly hope I can—on the procedures in the other place.

Senator Flynn: You can do better than Senator Guay.

Senator McIlraith: In the other place there is rule 43, a comparatively recent rule, that requires unanimous consent before a member can open debate on a matter of urgent importance. That is not relevant to what is being sought to be done here at all. What is relevant in the other place is the procedure under rule 26 of that place, and that is the right to debate a matter of urgent public importance. The procedure on that is quite clear and quite well established. An honourable member wishing to propose such a debate must rise in his place at a certain point in the day's proceedings, and state the proposition he wishes to have debated. Then he must immediately proceed to demonstrate the urgency of the debate, whereupon the Speaker must make a ruling not only as to whether the subject matter is of national importance but also and more particularly—because it usually is a subject of major national importance—whether there is urgency of debate. If there is such a decision by the Speaker, another paragraph requires that before the proceedings of the House can be set aside and the matter debated, 20 honourable members must rise—

Senator Grosart: But that is not here. What are you talking about?

Senator Perrault: He is outlining the procedure in the other place.

Senator McIlraith: If I may just finish what I am seeking to put forward, I think it may be helpful in the matter. Here we do not have the details set out at length, but we have rule 1, referred to by Senator Smith (Colchester), which provides that where there is silence in the rules we shall, so far as practicable, follow the usages in the other place. Having that, it is clear that we must have the decision of the Speaker that there is urgency of debate. Then, having that, there is a question open to argument as to whether or not we need the consent of the majority or some number of senators before the matter can be debated.

Senator Grosart: That is nonsense, utter nonsense.

Senator McIlraith: That is open for argument, but certainly in no circumstances is there any such thing as unanimous consent required or contemplated by the rule.

Senator Rowe: May I ask the honourable senator a question? He says that the mover has the right to demonstrate the urgency of the matter. How much time can he take to do that? Can he make a 45-minute speech on it, for example?

Senator Grosart: Two hours; two days!

Senator McIlraith: I do not know how long he can take. I would not make a hypothetical decision for the Speakers, but the point is that that debate, like debate on all other subjects, must be relevant to the point at issue, and the point at issue is the urgency of debate and he would be held to that. We have always found in practice that there is not too much time involved.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, rule 26 of the other place, subrule (3), says:

[Senator Flynn.]

—the Member shall rise in his place and present without argument the statement referred to in section (2) of this Order.

That is, the statement of what the whole thing is all about.

Senator Flynn: That is what he did.

Senator Forsey: He will present it without argument.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, in speaking to the point of order, I do not agree with those who claim that there is ample authority under our rule 46 to proceed with such a debate without first obtaining a decision from the Speaker of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Very good!

Senator Langlois: All that rule 46 says is this:

46. No notice is required of the following motions:

Then you have a series of motions and you come to (g), which is:

(g) for the adjournment of the Senate for the purposes of raising a matter of urgent public importance (which the mover shall state on rising to speak) before the House proceeds to the orders of the day;

This rule, to my mind, is quite insufficient to give the Senate authority to proceed without some decision from the Chair.

Reference has been made to the rules of the other place. I am in agreement with Senator Smith (Colchester) when he refers us to our rule 1, which reads:

In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

So now let us see what does exist in the other place. Rule 43 of the Standing Orders of the House of Commons reads as follows:

A motion may, in case of urgent and pressing necessity previously explained by the mover, be made by unanimous consent of the House without notice having been given under Standing Order 42.

Senator Asselin: What rule of theirs are you reading?

Senator Langlois: Rule 43.

Furthermore, I have an example of the application of this rule by the Speaker of the other place. On March 22, 1978, as reported at page 4016 of House of Commons Debates, there was a motion made by Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill), seconded by the member for Annapolis Valley, Mr. Nowlan, which read as follows:

That the Minister of Finance not use his office to influence the preferential placements of students from his constituency in Flin Flon this summer.

I am quoting from Hansard:

● (1440)

MR. SPEAKER: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some members agreed and some said no, and the motion was not carried. So this, I think settles the whole situation. Therefore—

Senator Flynn: No, no. Senator McIlraith was right.

Senator Langlois: —I am respectfully asking that we have a ruling on this, in order that we do not have a debate similar to that which we had the other day, which lasted the whole afternoon—

Senator Flynn: Because of you.

Senator Langlois: —and was completely out of order.

Senator Flynn: If you had not intervened the other day, we would not have the debate today.

Senator Langlois: You were the first one to suggest—

Senator Flynn: To object.

Senator Langlois: —unanimous consent. You even went so far the other day—

Senator Flynn: I did not mention unanimous consent. I objected.

Senator Langlois: You had better check what you said on that day. I do not want to get into an argument with the Leader of the Opposition. I am making a request that Madam Speaker give a ruling on this matter. This matter should be settled once and for all; otherwise the wording of rule 46 will have to be referred to the Rules Committee for interpretation, or change, if necessary.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, Senator Phillips, in justifying the adjournment of the house in order to discuss a matter of public importance, referred to the rate of unemployment and the failure of this government to come to grips with the situation. I wish to address myself to the latter part of his comment. This government last night brought in a budget—

Senator Flynn: Order.

Senator Bosa: The budget resolutions will come before the Senate, and there will be ample opportunity—

Senator Grosart: You are out of order.

Senator Bosa: Madam Speaker, may I complete my remarks?

Senator Grosart: You are out of order.

Senator Bosa: I said that the budget was brought in. The budget resolutions are not before the Senate. They will come before this chamber very shortly. At that time there will be ample opportunity to debate Senator Phillips' motion, as to whether or not this government has come to grips with the problem of unemployment.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, there is—

Senator Perrault: Let us have a ruling.

Senator Grosart: —a very important point here. Many references have been made to the procedure in other places. I would like to suggest to honourable senators that there is no necessity whatsoever to refer to a procedure in any other place, because our rule is very clear. As quoted, our rule 46 says that no notice is required—and Senator Phillips has not given notice—for the adjournment of the Senate—which was his motion—for the purpose of raising a matter of urgent public importance. We do not have to look at what is done anywhere else. Senator Phillips has relied entirely on the rules of the Senate. He is perfectly entitled to make this motion.

The question may arise at any time as to whether the motion is in order. This would apply to any single motion raised by any senator. At any time a point of order can be raised. If honourable senators on the other side wish to raise a point of order as to whether or not Senator Phillips can move the motion and proceed to discuss it, that is another matter. In that case, a decision would be made by Her Honour on whether the motion is in order. But there is not the slightest doubt in the world under our rules that Senator Phillips is perfectly and completely entitled without notice to make the motion he has made; and that is all that has happened.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I regret but I must insist that we have a ruling on this question.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Langlois that we should have a ruling but, with the greatest deference to him, I believe we should have the ruling on the right rule. With the greatest respect for his long experience and wisdom, I suggest that in addition to reading rule 43 of the other place, which I suggest is not applicable to the case, he might very well turn to page 18 of their rule book, rule 26, which deals exactly with this very situation: the adjournment to debate a matter of urgent public importance.

Senator Flynn: That is right.

Senator Smith (Colchester): That rule is found on page 18 of the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, October 1969, as amended October 14, 1971, page 18, rule 26:

Leave to make a motion—

I suggest that honourable senators should look at these words; and, at the same time, at our rule 46(g):

—for the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration—

I submit that that is the rule of the House of Commons which has to do with the same sort of situation as is found under rule 46(g) of our own rules. That is the rule exactly as Senator McIlraith enunciated it. I believe I had the pleasure of agreeing with him on the last occasion that we discussed this.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I hope that we can have a ruling from Madam Speaker on the subject. Certainly, in every parliamentary forum when a member rises on a matter of urgent public importance, or on what he or she perceives to be a matter of urgent public importance, there is some method whereby the consent of the members of that chamber can and must be obtained before a debate on the matter of the alleged urgency can move ahead. This is what we are talking about. There is no attempt here to restrict debate on the subject of unemployment. It is an important subject—

Senator Flynn: Don't go out on a limb.

Senator Perrault:—and I do not think the opposition should be unduly sensitive about the fact that precedents in the other place have been cited in view of the obvious lack of procedural information and codification which exists here. Every assembly must have a device whereby debate can move ahead on urgent matters, but such debate must be supported by members of the assembly before the debate can take place. That is the essence.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, in my opinion, the Honourable Senator Phillips is allowed to go on speaking on his motion, and honourable senators will then decide whether or not it is a matter of urgent public importance. Please continue.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, if I interpret Madam Speaker's ruling correctly, I am allowed to complete my argument for presenting this motion, an argument which Senator Perrault interrupted on rather a facetious point of order, and was then kind enough to tell me that I was through when I was not. I would point out to honourable senators that it has been suggested—indeed, it was suggested by the Leader of the Government—that I could give notice of an inquiry. Honourable senators will recall—

Senator Perrault: If you want a full-fledged debate on it, yes.

Senator Phillips:—that I moved such an inquiry last June. The debate was then adjourned, and it stood on the order paper for over a month before one Grit opposition spoke on it, and it died on the order paper. Therefore, to prevent this happening, rule 46(g) has to apply. Senator Olson then suggested that we should have a look at the precedents for this motion. I did, Senator Olson. I looked at the proceedings of March 7, and I have followed exactly the procedure used on that occasion. I challenge anyone to show me where I have deviated from the precedent set on March 7. If it was in order on March 7, I say it must be in order on April 11.

Senator Grosart: Hear, hear!

Senator Phillips: A number of honourable senators mentioned the rules in the other place. We are a separate chamber. We have our own rules and we follow those rules. If anyone is so enamoured with the rules of the other place, I would suggest there will be an election writ issued shortly and they will have every opportunity to follow those rules.

● (1450)

Honourable senators, I have no objection to Her Honour the Speaker making a ruling in this case, and I will accept her ruling. However, I think I have seen enough of this Senate to realize that the general attitude is against the principle of this motion and a discussion of the unfortunate situation of the unemployed.

[Senator Perrault.]

MOTION NEGATIVED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that a debate should take place at this time on Senator Phillips' motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it, but it is up to the honourable senators to decide.

NORTHERN PIPELINE BILL

MOTION FOR THIRD READING

Senator Olson moved the third reading of Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto.

An Hon. Senator: Carried.

Senator Flynn: Who said "carried"?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have no further comments to make. I made them at the report stage. I therefore yield the floor to Senator Flynn.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I was worried about the honourable member who said "carried," even before Her Honour the Speaker had finished putting the question. I can understand the desire for haste on the part of some honourable senators, but I do not share it.

Honourable senators, there have been many debates about a variety of aspects of the northern gas pipeline, the most important one being the economic value of its construction and, eventually, operation, not only to the areas concerned but to the rest of Canada.

One of the problems discussed in the other place, and discussed also in our committee, was that of native claims as they are affected by the construction of this pipeline. Two amendments directly related to the problem of native claims were brought forward at committee stage in the other place.

The first amendment relates to subclause (c) of clause 3, which sets out the objects of the bill. Subclause (c) reads:

(c) to facilitate the efficient and expeditious planning and construction of the pipeline taking into account local and regional interests, the interests of the residents, particularly the native people, and recognizing the responsibility ties of the Government of Canada and other governments, as appropriate, to ensure that any native claim related—I emphasize the word “related”.

—to the land on which the pipeline is to be situated is dealt with in a just and equitable manner;

I draw your attention to the fact that this was an amendment made in the other place, and it indicates the concern of their members for the rights of native people as they are affected by the pipeline.

Later on another amendment was introduced in committee, concerning clause 23.1, entitled, “Native claims unaffected.” It reads:

23.1 Notwithstanding this Act, any native claim, right, title or interest that the native people of Canada may have had prior to the coming into force of this Act in and to the land on which the pipeline will be situated continues to exist until a settlement in respect of any such claim, right, title or interest is effected.

I draw attention to the fact that before these amendments were brought in at committee stage in the other place there was no reference in the bill to native claims. This does not mean, in my opinion, that native claims were to be ignored eventually, any more than were the claims of any other person affected by the construction of the pipeline.

Remember that Senator Hays, in committee, was very worried about the rights of farmers.

Senator Hays: Hear, hear.

Senator Steuart: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Senator Steuart was, also; however, he was not as loquacious, although he was perhaps more sensible and sensitive—

Senator Langlois: Anyway, we are all natives.

Senator Flynn: —with regard to the rights of the other people affected by this bill. However, it was decided in the other place that some reference should be specifically made to the claims of the native people, and in my view it is the duty of the other place, it is the duty of Parliament, and it is the duty especially of the Senate, to avoid including in the bill something that may take away rights that the native people may have had even before these amendments were made. There is no reference in this bill to the rights of other residents affected by the pipeline. My understanding is that they will have the right to compensation under the expropriation clause applicable in this particular case, which I think is that provided under the Railways Act. What we had in mind, however, with respect to the native people, was something more than the property title to those places where the pipeline is going to be laid. And the immediate consequential damages that are always compensated for when land is expropriated were something of a different nature. Native claims are not recognized by means of a property title. Native claims are inherited. They are based on history, on customs and usages, which is quite different.

What do we have here? In clause 3, as I mentioned, there is a reference to native claims “related” to the land. “Related”, in the expression, “native claims related to the land,” has a rather broad meaning, and I would say that it includes whatever consequences may flow from their title. That is not too bad. When we come, however, to clause 23.1, all we have is “in and to the land on which the pipeline will be situated.”

I would say that in clause 23.1 we are restricting these native claims. I would say that we are doing worse than if we had not adopted clause 23.1 at all. If it had not been there they could have justified their claims under the ordinary law, or by whatever means they have at their disposal as far as the Government of Canada is concerned. Nobody could have told the native groups, “Your rights have been defined in this act as being applicable only in and to the land on which the pipeline will be situated,” which is very restrictive indeed.

● (1500)

When we discussed that in committee, I, with the support of my colleague, Senator Smith (Colchester), moved an amendment which would have taken out the words, “in and to the land on which the pipeline will be situated” and substituted, “all the claims and all the rights that may be affected by the pipeline.” This would have covered the whole spectrum of claims by native people. This amendment was defeated.

Senator Langlois mentioned the difference in the wording between clause 23.1 and paragraph (c) of clause 3 where you will remember I mentioned they use the words “related to the land”, which wording is certainly wider than “in and to”. Senator Langlois also moved a second amendment which would have used in clause 23.1 the same wording as in paragraph (c) of clause 3 which is wider than the language contained in clause 23.1. It was also defeated.

Of course, it may be said that because this Parliament is going to be dissolved pretty soon, we should not dare amend this kind of legislation. It was suggested by some members of the committee that we should never take that risk. But where is the risk if we feel we are doing the right thing? As I mentioned in committee, in the other place an amendment for the same purposes, but not at the same place, was moved on behalf of the NDP by Mr. Symes and Mr. Knowles, which is a guarantee that any amendment of the kind I suggest to you would be received with favour in the other place.

Clause 23.1 was moved by a Conservative member, and I know that it was the result of some kind of compromise. They could not have all they wanted. So they settled for something less—something being better than nothing. They were fooled, I suggest to you, because in fact what they got was less than nothing. I suggest that if we approve it, they would be happy to receive the amendment. To my way of thinking, clause 23.1 if it is not amended, should be deleted because it is restrictive.

The courts will not take the word of the minister as Senators Steuart, Hays and even Senator Lucier were happy to do in committee when the minister said, “My interpretation of clause 23.1 is that it will not be restricted to the land on which the pipeline is situated." The judge will have to read the words as they are in the bill.

There is no doubt that we are only speaking here in this bill, as it is, of the rights to the land on which the pipeline is situated and not to areas that may be miles away but which will, nevertheless, be affected by the pipeline. I therefore feel that this is a great occasion for us, because the amendment which I propose would, I'm sure, be welcomed and accepted in no time in the other place.

We have a great opportunity to clarify what I consider to be the major clause on the rights that we want to see protected—that the other place wanted to see protected and which they sought to protect by introducing these amendments of which I have been speaking.

The Senate has the role, although we do not always carry it out, of protecting minorities and individual citizens by acting as ombudsman. We always boast that anyone who has something to complain about may appear before a committee of the Senate and he will be heard. I say that we have this opportunity of making clear what we mean by that role.

Therefore, I move, seconded by Senator Smith (Colchester), that the bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended as follows:

Page 12, line 43: Strike out the words "in and" and substitute the word "related".

If honourable senators care to look at page 12 they can very simply delete the words "in and" in the last line and replace them with the word "related". I feel that in doing so we will improve the bill.

Senator Croll: Replace them with what word?

Senator Flynn: "Related". I feel that my first suggested amendment in committee was better than that, but there is some logic to this one since it relates to the wording in clause 3, paragraph (c), as was pointed out by Senator Langlois. I would very much hope that the Senate would not hesitate to adopt that amendment. However, if anyone wishes to move something better, he may rest assured that he will have my support.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): May I ask Senator Flynn one question before he concludes? I wonder if the amendment he proposes in the English version would have a corresponding amendment in the French version.

Senator Flynn: Oh yes. I do not mind suggesting something. [Translation]

In this regard, the wording may be better in French. But I would say rather:

se rapportant au terrain

In my opinion, the words "biens fonds" are more specific than the word "land".

The text would then be:

qui se rapporte au territoire sur lequel passera le pipe-line.

[Senator Flynn.]

We could use the word "territoire" or something similar. I believe that the appropriate word would be "territoire". I think that we should say:

sur le territoire sur lequel passerait le pipe-line.

However, if we agree on the English version, we can perhaps come to an agreement as easily about the French version.

[English]

MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Marchand, P.C., that this bill be now read the third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Grosart, that this bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended at page 12, line 43, by striking out the words "in and" and substituting the word "related".

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I wish to say a few words in connection with this motion by Senator Flynn. I would open my remarks by saying that in committee I supported his amendments.

Here we are dealing with two amendments which were made in committee, as Senator Flynn has mentioned, and we are now correlating those amendments to the other clauses of the bill. My first remarks concerning these amendments, in relation to clauses 3(c) and 23.1, were to the effect that we were not using the same language in both clauses. I never like it when you are dealing with a particular subject and you change the wording in succeeding clauses. There is a strong principle of interpretation by our courts that the legislature never speaks for nothing. We are putting a question mark in the mind of the tribunal right away: "Why have they changed the wording from one clause to another? There must be a reason for it." We are opening the door to various interpretations of the clauses in question.

● (1510)

In this respect I must point out that in clause 3(c) we speak of "native claims," whereas in clause 23.1 we speak of "native claims, right, title or interest that the native people of Canada may have". We are adding new words to the subject matter. We change the words "related to" for the words "in and to".

As I said, to my mind this is very likely due to speedy consideration of the drafting of a clause in committee without too much thought to the effect of the amendment that this amended clause could bring to the rest of the bill. I think that in the past both houses have followed the bad practice of accepting amendments in a speedy manner without correlating them to the balance of the legislation under consideration.

I went further than this in committee and compared the English text with the French text. In clause 3(c) the French text referring to native claims reads:

portant sur les terres que traversera le pipe-line.

This is pretty close to "related to." To my mind, it goes even further than "related to," which we wanted to use in the English text. In clause 23.1 the French text reads:

en ce qui concerne des biens fonds.

This means, "concerning the land," to give a loose translation of the French wording. There again, we are coming closer to "claims, right, title or interest related to the land" when we say "concerning the land". I also think it has a broader meaning than that of the present wording. My sole consolation when I saw these two amendments defeated in committee was that, since both texts are of equal value, in my opinion as a lawyer I would choose the French text if I ever had occasion to go to court in connection with this bill. It is up to anybody to do that. Those are the only remarks I wish to make at this stage.

Senator Flynn: As you mentioned, the words in the French text in clause 3(c) are "les terres", which is much wider than "biens fonds". That is why I think even the French text of clause 23.1 is restrictive.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I think the persuasive remarks of my leader carried conviction to all who listened and followed, and consequently I do not want to take any risk of confusing the impression that I am sure he created. However, there is just one point I should like to add.

It is clear, as Senator Langlois has pointed out, that some attention ought to be paid to this difficulty. There is no doubt in my mind—and I find it difficult to think there could be any great doubt in anybody's mind—but that these words "in and to the land on which the pipeline will be situated," which are now in the text, confine the effect of clause 23.1 to the very land on which the pipeline is built, and they affect no other land. I may say that when I put this interpretation to the witness who appeared before the committee as the person in charge of drafting, it was in his mind the correct one.

Then we get to the point that it seems pretty clear that at any rate this house, and I think the other place as well, would wish to make sure that nothing done under this bill, or nothing in the bill itself, adversely affects the native claims in the whole area, not merely on the sixty feet, or whatever it may be, of the width of the land on which the pipeline may stand. It therefore seems to me that if we want to carry out what appears to be the perfectly clear object of this clause we ought to make sure that the words are adjusted so that they achieve that object. From what I heard in committee, and from what Senator Langlois has said both in committee and here, I think there would be very little contention about the object. I think everybody felt that there should be something in the statute to make sure that it and things done under it did not have any adverse effect on the rights of the native peoples.

If I am correct in believing that is not in contention, I do not have much hesitation in suggesting that we should try to find some words that would make sure this common objective is achieved. With the admission of the chief draftsman that the words do not achieve that, but affect only the lands on which the pipeline is built, I believe we could probably also agree, without much dispute, that the objective is not achieved by these words.

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, I would like to suggest some wording to Senator Smith to see what he thinks about it. Suppose we used the words, "arising by reason of the ownership of these lands." That is in the broadest terms, if you are concerned about any words of limitation, is it not?

Senator Smith (Colchester): Except for the word "ownership." I see exactly what Senator Hayden is suggesting. If we were dealing with lands in respect of which there was registered title or registered ownership, I would certainly accept what he says as an excellent solution. However, I heard in committee the argument, which I think is pretty strongly held by some people—I do not pass any judgment on it—that really we are not dealing with land to which the ordinary concept of ownership as we understand it applies. For that reason I have some reservation about quick agreement with Senator Hayden's suggestion, although it is the kind of suggestion that I believe would help solve the general nature of the problem.

Senator Hayden: Would my friend think in terms of using the word "rights" instead of "ownership"?

Senator Smith (Colchester): I would indeed. My answer would be very quick to that. Yes.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, this afternoon I can do little more than reiterate what I said in committee, just as the Leader of the Opposition has reiterated the argument he put forward in committee.

I would suggest it is important to keep in mind that this is not a bill dealing with Indian land claims. It is not even a bill dealing with compensation for the taking of property, whether it be native or other peoples' property.

• (1520)

The objects set forth in clause 3(c) clearly spell out that the bill is "to facilitate the efficient and expeditious planning and construction of the pipeline". Then it goes on to say—and you might also add the word "naturally"—"taking into account local and regional interests, the interests of the residents, particularly the native people", and so on. We then go through the bill clause by clause and see that at no point does it then deal in any way with Indian land claims. In no way does the bill state that it impinges on Indian land claims or, for that matter, on other people's claims to their own land.

I might say that this particular bill, unlike some statutes of this nature which contain their own provisions for expropriation procedures, leaves the procedures as to compensation and expropriation of private land to other statutes already in existence, one being the Railway Act, I believe. So the bill would stand on its own feet quite reasonably without the inclusion of clause 23.1 at all.

Senator Flynn: Let us delete it.

Senator van Roggen: The point I am making is that if this were an expropriation act, if it were an act dealing with compensation, then, indeed, we would require not only clause 23.1, but that clause would require to be more broadly and carefully worded than it is now because this would be the section under which determination would be made of the quantum and nature of the compensation being given on the expropriation being authorized. That is not the case. This is not a compensation act, and this is not a compensation section of this act. This is not an expropriation section, but simply a saving clause in case someone might stretch their mind so far as to divine that some other provisions of this legislation, which are not even pointed out or suggested, might be interpreted at some point by some court as impinging on native land claims that now exist.

It has, therefore, been made clear that this legislation is not to be interpreted as impinging on native land claims, which land claims are to be settled by negotiation of the government with the native peoples concerned as an act which is quite extraneous and separate to the statute. So on that reasoning, honourable senators, I would suggest to you that this clause has been included in the legislation to simply make it abundantly clear that it does not deal with native land claims. It makes that abundantly clear and is sufficient in its present form.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, in support of the motion made by the Leader of the Opposition I would like to make this comment, that it seems to me to be a very reasonable and necessary amendment to the bill. I listened with interest to what Senator van Roggen just said, and was very surprised when he said this legislation does not deal with native land claims when, in fact, it does. There is a clause headed "Native Claims" and it deals with native claims, particularly the objectives in addition to this particular clause.

Senator van Roggen also suggested that this is not a bill dealing with expropriation. Of course it is not. Expropriation would be completely incidental to the bill and would, in effect, indicate a failure of the objects of the bill. To suggest that it is not an expropriation bill—and, therefore, there should not be clauses in the bill which would protect those who might be expropriated under a federal expropriation act—does not seem to me to be relevant to the amendment suggested by Senator Flynn.

It seems to me quite obvious that the conflict is just a matter of wording, or semantics. However, semantics are very important when there is a difference between the intention indicated by the government, which we find in clause 3(c), and the actual enactment under clause 23.1. In the one case, clause 3(c) expands the protection of native rights, it seems to me, very widely. It says "any native claim related to the land", which does not mean a claim with respect to that specific piece of land, but a claim related in any way to the land.

However, as Senator Flynn has pointed out, when we come down to the operative clause it says "in and to", which would make it quite specific, it seems to me. So that the effect of clause 23.1 is actually restrictive of native rights, and I believe that is the basis of Senator Flynn's amendment, that we do not wish to include in a bill such as this anything that would appear to be, as it does appear to be from the wording—which may be only a mistake in the wording—a restriction of native rights in respect to the objectives.

I would agree entirely with the objective as provided in clause 3(c) that there should be protection of native rights, and that any claim—a claim is not necessarily a right. The provision is as follows:

—that any native claim related to the land on which the pipeline is to be situated is dealt with in a just and equitable manner;

However, when we read clause 23.1, there is a definite restriction of this. For that reason I entirely support the amendment proposed by Senator Flynn, which, in my opinion, would be in line with the general approach of the Senate to the question of minority groups in Canada.

Although I was not present at the committee hearings, I read very briefly the discussion which took place there and was delighted to know of the attitude taken by Senator Langlois. I hope he has not changed his mind, and I am sure that he has not. Therefore, I support the amendment and hope that it will have the support of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: I wish to say one word now, after having listened to Senator van Roggen. In committee the legal adviser or draftsman for the government, Mr. Garneau, said that by this amendment we would be enlarging, and the minister also—not Mr. MacEachen, but Mr. Faulkner—refused the amendment because he said that we would be adding something. Therefore, I suggest to the Senate that this attitude bears out my contention that this text is restrictive. Even if it is not the object of the bill to protect the rights, it may incidentally restrict them, and that is what we wish to make sure we are not going to do. If you think we are going too far with this amendment, I would like you to tell me that we are going too far. If you think we should not be doing this because the session is ending, I would like you to tell me that the house would refuse an amendment such as that which we propose.

Senator van Roggen: Senator Flynn, I have no idea what the house would do. I can only say, in so far as the comments of the minister are concerned, that at the time he made it clear that he is not a lawyer. I cannot add anything to the argument I made a few minutes ago relative to this clause.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator Flynn has not closed the debate—I was unfortunately called out for a moment or two—I should like to express my entire concurrence with the amendment which he has proposed, and my belief that the Senate has no higher duty and can perform no finer task than to do everything possible to protect the rights of the native peoples of this country. Once before, on the James Bay Agreement bill, some of us tried, under the leadership on that occasion also of Senator Flynn, to provide some further safeguard for those rights. I think that on this occasion we should follow the same path and I therefore support unreservedly and strongly the amendment moved by Senator Flynn.

● (1530)

Senator Steuart: I should like to add a few words. I, too, was a member of the committee. The committee was very concerned about the rights of not only native peoples but of other peoples as well. In fact, as a result of this concern, it was recommended that the rights of those native peoples in British Columbia, the farmers in Alberta and Saskatchewan, about which the bill was silent, be the concern of an ongoing committee which would be established to protect these rights.

That recommendation was accepted by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who appeared before the committee on behalf of the Honourable Allan MacEachen. I also recall that a law officer from the Department of Justice accepted this recommendation. This would, in fact, guarantee their rights.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Steuart: That is my recollection. I attended all the meetings of the committee. The Honourable Allan MacEachen was responsible for piloting the bill through the House of Commons and negotiating with the Americans. He did a great deal of work on this bill.

I agree with the Leader of the Opposition when he says that "it won't hold any water in the courts," but neither will the utterances of the Leader of the Opposition or other people speaking in favour of this amendment.

I take second place to no one in this chamber, and no member of the committee, when it comes to concern for the rights of native peoples or any other groups who might be affected by this pipeline.

While this bill deals specifically with the right-of-way, I point out that the government is, in fact, carrying on negotiations, and has been doing so for some time, with respect to the general rights and claims of native peoples in those areas, including the Yukon Territory.

I do not think the amendment is necessary. I think it will unnecessarily impede passage of this bill. I do not think it is necessary to say this, but I want to make it perfectly clear. The rest of us are just as concerned about the rights of native peoples as are the members of the opposition.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I wonder whether the honourable senator would permit a question. I should like to ask him whether Mr. Garneau did not agree that the only protection which would be extended to native claims by clause 23.1 related to the very land on which the pipeline was built?

Senator Steuart: I do not recall, but he may have said that. I do recall that one other law officer from the Department of Justice, when asked whether, in his opinion, it protected native rights, said that he thought it did.

Senator Flynn: You have a convenient memory.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Would the honourable senator permit a further question? Does he agree that, although the minister may have the very best intentions in the world, his views, in the final analysis, will carry no more weight with the courts than the views of the members of this house, unless there are words in the statute which reflect those views.

Senator Steuart: Of course I agree with that. I said that in my remarks. I believe the minister who piloted this through all its stages, the Honourable Allan MacEachen; the minister who appeared before us, the Honourable Hugh Faulkner, and the law officer from the Department of Justice took that stand. I am prepared to state that their words will have no more weight with the courts than yours will. It is a matter of opinion. I happen to follow their opinion.

Senator Grosart: A vote with the government, for sure.

Senator Williams: Honourable senators, there are a few things which concern me deeply with regard to this matter. Not being a lawyer, it is difficult for me to understand the laws of this country with respect to land claims. Indian reserve lands are crown lands vested in Her Majesty and are for the use and benefit of Indians. As far as I am concerned, this means the final stages of negotiation must be done with the government and not with the Indians, because the Indian has nothing which would be in any way equivalent to the farmer's deed. It bothers me greatly as to where the final negotiations will rest.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt Senator Flynn's motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it.
And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment lost. The question is now on the main motion.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might say a few words before the question is put on the motion for third reading of this bill. It may be relevant that I take this opportunity, on behalf of the government, to comment on the recommendation of the Special Committee of the Senate on a Northern Gas Pipeline that an independent inquiry be undertaken to examine the social and economic effects of the project on those living within the vicinity of the pipeline route, and I do not do so by way of any criticism.

● (1550)

I think we all share in the great appreciation we feel toward members of that committee—particularly the chairman, Senator Olson—who have done such an excellent job on this important bill. But the information that I have may serve to clarify some of the government's intentions with respect to the protection of the rights of the people who may be affected by the construction of the line. Whatever may be involved in the terms of reference of the suggested independent inquiry and whatever the scope of such an inquiry, as the recommendation is worded it would seem that such an inquiry would apply over the approximately 2,000 miles that the main pipeline system would extend throughout Canada, which, as honourable senators will appreciate, would be an enormous undertaking.

As members of the Senate are aware, an examination of the socio-economic impact of the pipeline on the Yukon was undertaken last year by an inquiry headed by Dean Kenneth Lysyk. This special inquiry was undertaken in the Territory at the initiative of the federal government, because of its special responsibility for the Yukon and the exceptional impact that such a huge project could have on its small population and its relatively limited infrastructure.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Many honourable senators, I know, are particularly concerned about the impact of the pipeline project not only on the Yukon, but also on the sparsely settled areas of the northeastern part of British Columbia through which the pipeline will pass, but it has always been the view of the federal government that the undertaking of any special inquiry in British Columbia similar to that conducted by Dean Lysyk would require the active co-operation, if not the initiative, of the provincial government.

The special committee has recommended that an independent inquiry be undertaken into the social and economic impact of the pipeline. The motivation for such a proposal is very commendable and very understandable. However, I think it is important for members of the Senate to be aware that in his report Dean Lysyk himself recommended that further examination of this question in the case of the Yukon be undertaken by the regulatory agency which he proposed should be established to oversee planning and construction of the system. The Lysyk report made it clear that the primary objective of this further examination should be to develop the specific terms and conditions governing the planning and construction of the pipeline that would maximize the social and economic benefits of the project for the people along its route, and at the same time minimize its adverse effects.

In the hearings before the special committee, as well as in statements in the other place, I believe it has been made clear by the government that every opportunity will be provided for those affected by the pipeline to have an input into the development of those terms and conditions so as to ensure that the benefits of the project are maximized, and its detrimental effects are held to the lowest possible level.

Even before the passage of this legislation and the establishment of the Northern Pipeline Agency, work has been going forward in developing draft social, economic and environmental terms and conditions by interdepartmental committees under the direction of the office of the Northern Pipeline Commissioner. The minister responsible for piloting this legislation through Parliament, the Honourable Allan MacEachen, and the pipeline commissioner, Mr. Robinson, have indicated that it is the intention to have a draft of these detailed terms and conditions governing construction of the pipeline completed within 30 days and submitted to all provincial and local governments, native organizations and other public groups which have a particular interest in the project, for their comment. This is a commitment which I want to give on behalf of the government.

The proposed terms and conditions will subsequently be redrafted to take full account of these initial submissions. Subsequently, a revised draft will be produced by the Northern Pipeline Agency to form the basis for a series of public hearings this coming summer in communities affected by construction of the pipeline system. That is another commitment which I want to state and reiterate.

I have no doubt that as a result of these hearings the detailed terms and conditions will be further refined to take account of the views of the public before they are finally adopted by the agency.

Honourable senators, if this immense project which promises so much benefit to the whole of Canada is to proceed expeditiously, it is important that we should act with all reasonable dispatch to establish the detailed terms and conditions which the company will be required to comply with in proceeding with the building of the system. There is, I must say, some concern about the proposal to establish an independent inquiry into the social and economic effects of the pipeline throughout its length in Canada. The feeling is that this could create enormous problems and certainly no such inquiry could be undertaken without the consent and approval of the provincial governments concerned. It is obvious that to undertake such an inquiry with any reasonable degree of thoroughness could take a considerable period of time, and in turn, could seriously impede the development of the project. In saying this, we all understand that this is merely a suggestion from the committee, but there are some difficulties of a practical nature from the standpoint of the government.

Senator Grosart: You are rejecting it.

Senator Perrault: No, senator, we do not reject the report at all. We think it is excellent, but these are some of the concerns felt with respect to the establishment of a full-fledged independent inquiry.

Senator Grosart: You are rejecting the recommendation.

Senator Perrault: But perhaps most critical of all would be the immense confusion that might be created if an inquiry of this nature were under way at the same time as the Northern Pipeline Agency was proceeding to obtain widespread input from provincial governments, municipalities, local communities and the various public interest groups involved in finalizing the detailed terms and conditions which, in the final analysis, will be the main determinant of the project's impact on people and the environment.

● (1600)

Before I conclude, I should note on behalf of the government that some honourable senators expressed concern that native people in the northeastern part of British Columbia might find difficulty in formulating their views on the proposed terms and conditions because of a lack of expert help. This misgiving might be met by the assurance, which has been given by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, that he is actively exploring means of providing native groups with sufficient funding to assist them in the process of developing terms and conditions which will provide the greatest possible degree of protection for their interests.

Hon. George I. Smith: Honourable senators, I am both pleased and, at the same time, slightly disappointed in the firm statement just made by the Leader of the Government. At least, to my mind it was a firm statement. I can see what he means by his reference to the whole length of the pipeline, and I agree that the wording of the recommendation justifies that comment. But the essence of the interests of the members of the committee in the inquiry is more accurately pinpointed by the words "particularly in those areas where no previous inquiry has been undertaken."

I think I can explain the appearance of those words quite well by referring briefly to some of the comments made by the witnesses before the committee. Their evidence, I believe, was accepted—in any event, I heard no contradiction of it—and it was to the effect that in the northeastern part of British Columbia, for instance, no independent inquiry of any kind has heretofore been made. This was a matter of considerable concern to those witnesses who spoke on behalf of the people of that part of the province, and it is of concern, I think, to all members of the committee. It is not of concern to just one or two members, but to all members of the committee.

It seemed to some of us, at least, and I suspect pretty much to most members of the committee, that, if it were at all possible, the people who live in the area ought to have as much attention in the way of an inquiry to see how their lives would be affected as was focused on the people of the Yukon by the Lysyk inquiry. That, I think, was the real moving influence behind the view that there should be some independent type of inquiry.

It is quite true that the evidence before the committee was to the effect that the agency, or some government instrument at any rate, was to draft terms and conditions which would have to be followed by those involved in the construction and operation of the pipeline. Those terms and conditions would relate to the way the whole enterprise affected the lives and well-being of the people who live there. I will not say it was justified, but there was clearly a feeling on the part of some of the people who were speaking for those who live there that it was one thing, as one alternative, to have an agency of government come and give them a draft of what would be good for them, without their having any particular input into it, and it was quite another thing, as another alternative, to have a Lysyk-type of inquiry to be made by an independent person, without the natural inclinations of government of any kind. In the second alternative, an independent inquiry in the first instance would ensure that the people there themselves would have some type of information which they could be prepared to regard as relatively independent, unbiased and free from the compelling desire to get on with the work. That is something they should have before being confronted with draft terms and conditions.

Senator Perrault: That was done.

Senator Smith (Colchester): It does seem to me—and this was repeated to us more than once by witnesses representing the pipeline and/or agencies of the government—that the present intention is that, without any particular consultation with the people in the northeastern part of British Columbia, members of the public service, or people in similar positions, will sit down and draft a set of terms and conditions which they will then present to the people who live there and about which they will then ask, "What do you think of these terms and conditions?" It seems to me that that is a different proposition from going to those same people in the first place and saying, "Well, now, let us see what the problems are that you will have to face. What is there that we can do to help pinpoint your views on these problems and get them over to us?"

I think, too, it is a situation that is properly referred to in terms of the old saying, well known to people in public life and in the law, that it is not only necessary to do justice but it is necessary to make sure that all of the people concerned with the particular matter understand that justice is being done. They must see that justice is being done. It seems to me that that is an important factor which has to be kept in mind.

I said I was pleased to hear the leader's commitment that certainly substantial efforts will be made to submit these draft plans, draft terms and conditions, to the people concerned, and then account taken of their views in altering the draft plans. I am pleased. That is certainly a great deal better than not making any efforts. But I am sure the Leader of the Government, having been both on the outside looking in and on the inside looking out, will understand perfectly well that it is one thing to go to a government representative, or a government group, and say, "Well, now, this is what we would like you to do; here is our proposition", and it is quite another thing to go to the same people and say, "Look, we do not like this plan you have made your mind up on." Those are two entirely different propositions.

I suggest that in the long run it would be more helpful to all concerned, including those who will be involved in the construction and operation of the pipeline as well as the representatives of all of the governments concerned, if the first type of alternative were followed.

I do not think it need take any great length of time, either. I do not profess any particular knowledge, except that I know that it did not take Dean Lysyk any great length of time to cover a large expanse of territory to do the same sort of thing we are talking about. And I would be greatly surprised if an inquiry in British Columbia that took as long as Dean Lysyk took resulted in any serious delay in any aspect of the pipeline.

Without departing for a moment from the view that I think the pipeline ought to be built and supported, I think it is not unreasonable to say that perhaps it is worth some time and some effort to do all that can be done to create a good feeling, or to avoid the creation of bad feeling, among the people who are going to be affected. I recognize, of course, the validity of the leader's comment that inquiries to be carried out in territories in the jurisdictions of other governments must be carried out with their co-operation and, indeed, with their consent. I accept that as being a valid problem, but it does not seem that it is likely to be one that is too difficult to overcome. So I hope that the difficulties which the leader has enumerated with regard to conducting an inquiry will be possible to overcome, because it does seem to me that the value which could result from something seen to be fairly done is worth some effort, trouble and time.

● (1610)

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I must confess that I am disappointed that the government did not accept the spirit, at least, of the recommendation of the committee, allowing for the possibility that it was drafted in such terms as to cover rather more physical territory than I think the members of the committee had in mind, judging from what I heard of the proceedings.

I am afraid that I am unable to understand the point the leader made, with which Senator Smith (Colchester), rather to my surprise, agreed, that an inquiry would require the consent and co-operation of the provincial government of British Columbia and, if I heard correctly, the municipalities. I don't see why this should be so. No doubt an inquiry is easier if you have the co-operation of the provincial government, easier still if you have the co-operation of the municipalities, and no doubt easier still if you have the co-operation of the chambers of commerce, the trades unions and a variety of other people. But I can't see why an inquiry of this sort in any part of the country, on a matter of this enormous and, as we have been told repeatedly, national importance, should not be carried out even if the province or the municipalities fail to co-operate; and I find it extremely difficult to believe that either the province or the municipalities would, in fact, attempt to block an inquiry of this sort, and I find it very hard to comprehend why the government feels so nervous about an inquiry of this kind on those grounds.

Senator Perrault: If I may endeavour to reply, honourable senators have spoken very highly this afternoon about Dean Lysyk. He is held in high esteem by all. Dean Lysyk himself recommended that further examination of this question in the case of the Yukon be undertaken by the regulatory agency which he proposed should be established. That was a recommendation of Dean Lysyk himself.

Secondly, the statement that I have made on behalf of the government does not run contrary to the spirit of the excellent recommendation made by the committee. It would have been quite simple for the government merely to have accepted the report without comment. My purpose this afternoon was to add comment on behalf of the government to give specifically the assurance—I believe it bears repeating—that a full account will be made of the submissions that are received from all those affected by this pipeline, irrespective of whether they may be municipalities, provincial representatives, minority group interests, farmers—indeed all the people affected by the line.

There will be a series of public hearings this summer in communities affected by construction of the pipeline system. Those hearings will be held with full access to the media. There will be no in camera sessions held where the government will be in a position to issue ultimatums to anyone. The government further commits itself to refining the terms and conditions to take account of the views of the public before they are finally adopted by the agency. So the full light of public scrutiny will be on those hearings.

I want to provide the assurance that while the government may not necessarily accept the idea of an independent commission—it may not necessarily accept that recommendation—the government at the same time is fully in accord with the spirit of that recommendation, and within the time context, and the practical limitations of what can be done, the government will certainly co-operate fully to ensure that every interest along that pipeline route is protected—

Senator Grosart: It was not an independent commission; it was an independent inquiry.

Senator Perrault: —and I have been at pains this afternoon to make that very clear. The statement I made today speaks in terms of “widespread input from provincial governments, municipalities, local communities and the various public interest groups involved in finalizing the detailed terms and conditions which, in the final analysis, will be the main determinant of the project’s impact on people and the environment.”

Honourable senators, it may well be that there is some technical power possessed by the federal government which will enable it to proceed unilaterally to initiate the investigation in any fashion it wishes, but I hardly think that course of action would be within the spirit of co-operative federalism that we have all endeavoured to promote in recent months.

The budget proposals last night were an example of where the federal government, for the first time in history, discussed with the provincial ministers of finance a joint course of action which might benefit the whole of Canada. This is the spirit in which we should undertake this project, the largest of its kind ever undertaken in the history of North America.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, perhaps I may be permitted to make a comment which will clear up an impression which I obviously left in the mind of Senator Forsey, and very likely in the minds of many others. I did not intend for one moment to suggest that the federal government did not have the constitutional right to make an inquiry within the territorial boundaries of British Columbia or any other province in a matter which clearly comes within federal jurisdiction. I was merely pointing out—or thought I was—what the Leader of the Opposition now makes me want to get angry about, which is that it is better to move along in co-operation and goodwill with provinces when we are doing something so very important and of such great compass as this. It is my belief, for what it is worth—it is worth no more than my belief to the contrary, I suppose—that the constitutional authority does rest within the Government of Canada; but sometimes it is not always in the long term best interests of a government which possesses the authority to exercise it. That is my only comment on that point.

I wish the Leader of the Government had not tempted me with his excursion into budgetary co-operation, because it makes it very hard to resist finding some very vigorous remarks with which would take issue with him on that point. However, there is no need for me to be irrelevant just because he was, so perhaps I will deny myself that pleasure for the time being.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, if I speak now, I presume I will close the debate on third reading?

The Hon. the Speaker: No. The honourable senator will not be closing the debate.

Senator Grosart: Why not?

Senator Olson: I simply wish to express my appreciation to all those honourable senators who have participated in the third reading debate, including those who spoke on the amendments that were discussed previously in committee. I certainly do not agree with all the interpretations or arguments that were made on a number of the points raised, but I certainly do accept the sincerity with which they were put.

I should like to say also that I both understand and appreciate the comments made by the Leader of the Government with respect to the matter of the independent inquiry. That probably adds even more weight to the argument and support to the motion that I shall move tomorrow in keeping with the recommendations of the committee, that there be a special committee of the Senate to watch over and inquire into any matter that appears to be going against some of the people involved. I hope that that is an indication that the motion I shall move tomorrow will be adopted. If it is, we will have an on-going mechanism for making sure that all the commitments made by the government, the agency, the company, and everyone else involved affecting people along the right-of-way will, in fact, be fulfilled.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion for the third reading of Bill C-25?

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FARM CREDIT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-29, to amend the Farm Credit Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault, with leave of the Senate, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Hicks for the second reading of Bill C-18, to amend the Anti-Inflation Act and guidelines.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators—

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, perhaps, before Senator Phillips proceeds with the debate on this bill, I might be permitted to answer more completely and properly the question put to me last evening by Senator Phillips and Senator Grosart.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hicks: This question arose out of my observation that Bill C-18 did not mention the date April 14, which is the date when the decontrol process commences, but that the date was prescribed by regulations under the present legislation. This prompted Senator Grosart to ask, very properly, why then did I assert that it was urgent that this bill be passed so as to become effective on April 14. Aside from the general desirability of having all the laws relating to the decontrol process consistent from its inception, there is one paramount reason why this bill should be in force by April 14. This has to do with clause 5 of the bill. Were it not for the provisions contained in clause 5 of the bill, all those agreements between employers and employees where the Anti-Inflation Board had rolled back the agreed level of wages could automatically go back to the negotiated amounts on April 14. Under the provisions of the bill, the Anti-Inflation Board roll-back decisions will obtain, or the decisions of the administrator will obtain, during the lifetime of the agreement, with certain exceptions that may be renegotiated.

Senator Grosart: Thank you.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I have become accustomed to getting annual reports from various departments which enable one to review, as it were, the activities of the departments in question for the past year. I enjoyed very much receiving the second year report from the Anti-Inflation Board. The tone of this report was simply to the effect that if it were not for inflation the anti-inflation legislation and the Anti-Inflation Board could be considered successful; but we did have inflation, and therefore its effectiveness is somewhat dubious.

The sponsor of the bill, last evening, spoke of various improvements in the economy. I rather had the feeling that he was preaching for a call to replace the Minister of Finance, since I do not think even the Minister of Finance was as optimistic as that last evening.

The record of Canada in dealing with inflation has been a disaster, and this despite all the various slogans that we have had: "Kick the habit," "Beat inflation," and so on. I often wonder if the government read their own slogans, and if they do why they do not practise what they preach. When the Anti-Inflation Board was established, the inflation rate was 10 per cent. Today it is 9.5 per cent. That is hardly a sensational reduction. A baseball player with a batting average like that would be shipped out to the minor leagues. I was going to suggest that the government should be returned to the minor leagues, but then I reviewed the situation and decided that they never left the minor leagues.

When we consider the fact that the government have really never explained to Parliament why inflation is so rampant in Canada, we can only come to the conclusion that they do not understand the problem. They still seem to adhere to the Prime Minister's statement that inflation is licked, but if Muhammed Ali had bounced back from his licking the way inflation bounced back, he would be world champion today.

The Liberal Party came into power in 1963 with the aid of the late Mr. Raoul Caouette and the Social Credit Party. Obviously, it was part of the agreement that the government, the Liberal Party, would adopt certain Social Credit doctrines. As honourable senators know, we quite often refer to the Social Credit philosophy as "funny money." The federal government seems to have adopted the idea of turning the printing presses. The money supply between 1968 and 1977 was increased 156 per cent. At the same time our real growth in production was 55 per cent, and the total inflation was 100 points. It is rather interesting that the amount of inflation equals the amount of surplus money printed. The Bank of Canada has printed money to supply one-third of the federal expenditure in the last five years.

The love of spending by this government is as great as its love of unemployment and national disunity.

● (1630)

When the legislation was introduced, the government gave every indication that the figures in federal spending would be limited to the guidelines set out in the anti-inflation legislation. Federal spending has increased by 28 per cent in two years and has far exceeded the guidelines set out in the legislation. During the same two years the government's operating cost has increased by 37 per cent. The result is an unnecessary expenditure of $2 billion.

Honourable senators are familiar with the fact that various micro-organisms enter the blood stream and settle in the weakest part of the body and set up various types of infections. The inflationary element entered the blood stream of the Liberal Party and circulated throughout it and then settled on the weakest point in the Liberal Party, which is the Prime Minister and the Cabinet. As a result, we have had a case of infectious inflation ever since. The government has used many excuses to justify our large rate of inflation. Everybody is out of step except our Prime Minister and, of course, he is not moving very much. He is like the Canadian dollar—sliding downhill.

Let us look at the international picture as it relates to control of inflation. Naturally, we look first to the United States because of our nearness to that great nation. In the United States the inflation in 1977 was 6.6 per cent; in Canada it was 9.5 per cent. In Japan, in the same 12-month period, inflation was 4.9 per cent and in Canada 9.5 per cent. In Germany the inflationary rate 3.9 and again, I repeat, ours was 9.5. Therefore, I find it rather difficult to understand the government's argument that inflationary forces outside this country are causing inflation.

The government also blames pressure on the so-called "floating dollar." I am not exactly certain that the dollar is floating; in my opinion, it is beginning to drown. The Governor of the Bank of Canada stated, on April 3:

The government expenditures to rescue the drowning dollar over a short period would not be helpful in restoring the international trust in our dollar.

In other words, the drowning dollar has become caught in an undertow.

We have had as many ministers of finance as we have had postmasters general. Despite all of the illustrious failures that we have had over the last few years, we now have a part-time Minister of Finance. At a time when the finances of this country need a great deal of attention, most of his efforts are spent elsewhere.

Certain events are anticipated, so I will shorten my criticism of the government's abject failure in dealing with inflation, and turn to the administration of the Anti-Inflation Board.

The first administrator was hardly settled in his office when he was removed to become Co-Chairman of the National Unity Commission. The next chairman, Mr. Tansley, had hardly found his office when he was made Chairman of the Fisheries Research Board and Associate Deputy Minister of Fisheries. This raises a rather interesting question: Did we have a fisherman in charge of the Anti-Inflation Board or do we have an accountant in charge of the Fisheries Research Board?

During the introduction of the legislation establishing the Anti-Inflation Board, the government said they would need approximately 200 temporary employees to operate the board. We now have over 700 employees and the government has guaranteed those personnel that they will not have to take a drop in pay or lose their positions. In fact, one young individual on the board informed me that he wanted to return to university this fall to obtain his Masters degree in Business Administration. He had rather a rough time retaining his position until September. The board wanted him to resign now so that it could replace him. I find this rather strange when the board is supposed to be winding down. I think the government has deliberately created this impression with certain approaching events in mind.

Let us have a look at the facts. The Chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board, before a committee of the other place, stated that in October of this year 70 per cent of the labour force would be covered by the regulations; 75 per cent of the professionals would be covered; and 80 per cent of the companies. This does not sound like a very urgent winding down of the board, Senator Hicks.

There are a number of amendments proposed in the bill before us. I fail to see why some of the powers have to be extended, especially when the government can, if it wishes, ask Parliament by resolution to provide for an extension of the powers. The so-called "ghost clauses", I feel, are a very dangerous principle to establish, and we should take care that those do not return to haunt us in the time ahead.

Last evening Senator Hicks mentioned that the Economic Council of Canada would probably assume the monitoring of wage and price settlements in the future. I hope that they will be far more successful than the Prices and Incomes Commission.

In reading the minutes of the committee meeting in the other place, I was disturbed to find that three draft bills were presented before the committee. They were three draft bills that no one seemed to know anything about. No one assumed paternity of those three draft bills, yet they carry extensive powers. I ended up by being rather suspicious that the government is holding something back, hoping that they will have an opportunity to introduce them in the fall. I can only say I will do my best to make sure that they do not have that opportunity.

● (1640)

I hope the Minister of Finance will appear before the committee and explain why we still have a 9.5 per cent inflationary rate when the program called for 4 per cent. I believe last evening Senator Hicks was saying that there was no need for this bill to go to a committee. I should like to see it go to a committee and have the Minister of Finance give his explanation. I believe earlier today Senator Perrault stated that there would be lots of opportunity to debate the budget in this chamber, so I presume that we have time to send this bill to a committee.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

BELL CANADA—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Deschatelets for second reading of Bill C-1001, respecting Bell Canada.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, the bill before us was introduced by Senator Deschatelets, who gave us a very interesting account of the provisions in the bill. But I am sure he will not mind my saying that I wish he had given some further explanation of the fate of the original bill, Bill S-2, as it was passed by the Senate, and why the bill now before us is a mere shadow and skeleton of the bill approved by the Senate after exhaustive examination in committee. I think it important that some attention be called to the great changes that have been made, and that perhaps there should be some consideration of the reasons why those changes appear to have been made.

I should say first of all, however, that a question was raised by Senator Langlois, which perhaps should be cleared up now, about the "authority" which now has a certain regulatory power in respect of the affairs of Bell Canada. My recollection is that Senator Deschatelets said the regulatory authority that is now effective is the CRTC, and Senator Langlois suggested that that was a slip of the tongue, that it might be the CTC, the Canadian Transport Commission. I believe Senator Deschatelets was right. I think the regulatory authority referred to in this bill is the CRTC. Perhaps Senator Deschatelets would like to confirm or further explain that, because I think it is relevant to the bill.

Senator Deschatelets: I think the misunderstanding arose because of the fact that up until, I believe, November of 1976 the CTC had jurisdiction over the company, Bell Canada, and at that time this jurisdiction was transferred to the CRTC. I understand that in the past Senator Langlois had much to do with the CTC when Bell Canada was involved. However, the jurisdiction has changed. Since about 1976 the CTC has had no jurisdiction over Bell Canada. It is now the CRTC. Under its jurisdiction, the CRTC has to approve the rates and also the capital stock of the company. I think that answers the question.

Senator Grosart: Thank you, Senator Deschatelets. This is, perhaps, of some interest, because the role of the CRTC in certain aspects of controlling the affairs of Bell Canada is relevant to the history of the bill and the changes that have taken place between the consideration of the original Bill S-2 and the present bill, Bill C-1001.

Somebody has said that the title of this bill, which is a private bill introduced in the House of Commons, raises memory of "The Arabian Night", the "One Thousand and One Nights", and there seems relevance in that comparison, because what happened was that the Senate considered Bill S-2, which would have provided Bell Canada with some changes in the present regulations respecting its method of operations in some aspects of its business in four major categories, which I will indicate in a moment. This bill now before us is reduced to a request for perhaps one and a half of those major categories, but no more.

The sponsor of the new bill in the other place withdrew Bell Canada's request for certain provisions in the bill. The bill that was introduced in the House of Commons was in the exact form of the original Bill S-2. What is, of course, of interest to honourable senators is why the House of Commons, in its wisdom, decided to make fundamental changes in the decision made by the Senate, and why Bell Canada apparently, and I would think obviously, agreed to the withdrawal of some of the provisions it requested in Bill S-2, and originally in Bill C-1001. The answer is quite simple.

• (1650)

What happened was, Senator Forsey made a reference to it, perhaps accurate but not an entirely complete reference, when he said in his wisdom the other parties in the other house—I think his phrase was—raised such strong opposition. Well, I do not think they raised such very strong opposition.

Senator Forsey: They moved the six months' hoist.

Senator Grosart: I was about to enlarge on your comment. What happened was that they talked the bill out over successive sessions of the private members' hour, running over a long period of time, so that it was quite impossible for any other private members' bills to be discussed in that committee. Now, I am not saying that they did not have the right. One would have some doubts as to whether this was an abuse of the procedures; in my opinion it was. As Senator Forsey says, they did move a six months' hoist. In one particular case, in fact in the particular case of the six months' hoist, the purpose of moving the six months' hoist, as clearly explained at the time by Mr. Knowles, was that one member, Mr. Peters, who was then speaking, had run out of his time, had sought permission to proceed and had been refused by the House of Commons. Then Mr. Knowles made the motion for the six months' hoist which, of course, allowed Mr. Peters to continue his obstruction to the passage of the bill.

I only say that because I do not believe for one minute that the changes that have been made between Bills S-2 and C-1001 represent in any way the judgment of the majority in the House of Commons. What surprises me is that no one on the government side, no minister rose to defend the provisions of the bill as presented to the House of Commons, in spite of the fact that we had evidence in our committee, clear evidence that the major provisions of this bill had been approved and accepted by the government. I am not saying all, or that we had a statement, but we had evidence to that effect. It was on that basis, as far as I am concerned at least, because I was in attendance in the committee, that I was prepared to vote to give the Bell Telephone the powers that it requests. I do not know why the government did not stand behind this. It had been clear that the government understood why these provisions were important to Bell Telephone and important, perhaps, to the economy of Canada in some respects. However, I leave it at that. There was no voice from the government other than that, of course, of the sponsor of the bill, who was a former cabinet minister, but in that capacity was not speaking for the government. He was the one who finally proposed the amendments which would, in effect, be a withdrawal of the request of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

Perhaps I should say at this point that I have no brief for the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. I have many reasons to quarrel with it from time to time. It annoys me, it upsets me and charges me more money than I think I should pay at times. However, that in no way affects the view I have at this time that it is unfortunate that this original bill, the Senate Bill S-2, has been watered down to the extent it has. To give a rough indication, there were four major requests, which I believe is the proper word, because the bill was a petition originally, from Bell Telephone. One was to increase the maximum authorized capital of the company from $1.75 billion to $5 billion, on the grounds that by the end of this year Bell Telephone would run out of money for capital expansion, and the $1.75 billion would, in effect, so far as they could judge be used up at the end of the year. The request was for an increase to $5 billion which, in the evidence that they gave our committee, they believed would be adequate for the decade from that time. In my opinion, it would be important to ask the officials of Bell Telephone whether that $5 billion which this bill would grant them will be adequate now.

The second request was for the same general range of financing options in the financial markets of Canada and elsewhere as those that were available to their competitors. They asked, for example, which would seem to be a reasonable request, that they should be able to proceed to normal borrowing if they had a general by-law of their shareholders and that they should not be restricted, as they were and are, to a specific meeting of shareholders every time they want to borrow, which is the type of situation with which most companies would find it very, very difficult to live. They asked then, which is why I raise this other matter, to be able to issue capital stock without CRTC approval. Now, they were not asking to be completely out and away from any control by the CRTC. They were merely asking that once there was an approval by Parliament for them to raise capital they should then be allowed to go ahead and make these individual issues without having to go back each time to the CRTC. They were prepared to admit that the CRTC should still have some control over the amount, the terms and the conditions, but not of the actual normal business of raising that capital on the market. There was a reason for that specific control many years ago, because at that time the tendency was to look at the number of shareholders of Bell Telephone and apply this to the income, much of which, of course, would come from their rates. There was a fear at one time that the uncontrolled issue of shares would in time affect the rates to consumers. This no longer applies, because at the present time the CRTC assessment, if that is the right word, is based not on the number of shareholders but on their income with respect to the investment in the company.

The third request was that they be treated as any other new company starting up in the communications business, which today would apply for letters patent through the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. If they had changes that they wished to make as time went on, they would apply to make these changes by letters patent instead of the present requirement, which is still in existence, that Bell Telephone, because it is incorporated under a special act, must come to Parliament every time it wishes to make certain changes. In the normal course of business it seems to make no sense for them to have to come to Parliament when, for example, as I say, in the matter of increasing the number of directors they may have to wait eight months, ten months, or a year and a half before this matter can come before Parliament by means of a private bill.

• (1700)

They also asked, as any other company would, to have the right to invest in a subsidiary in their general line of business. They are restricted now to a rather limited range of businesses. This would exclude them from—and this is a problem to them—a company in the computer software business as a subsidiary. Bell Canada has developed a tremendous expertise in this field and would like to sell that expertise. It certainly would be to the benefit of the Canadian economy, and to the benefit of Canada generally, if they were permitted to sell this expertise and other similar types of sophisticated technology which they have developed on their own and through existing subsidiaries.

The final and fourth request was that they be permitted to alter their capital structure, objects, powers and share capital by letters patent. This was similar to the request that they be brought under section 16(a) of the Canada Corporations Act.

This particular request has been kicked around and misinterpreted. Over and over again it has been said in the debates in the other place that Bell Canada wants to get out from under parliamentary control. I raised that question when the matter came before the Senate. I indicated that Bell Canada, after all, was a monopoly, and that that seemed to be a good reason why Parliament should maintain a high level of scrutiny of the affairs of Bell Canada. Representatives from Bell Canada agreed with that. Their proposal was that while they would still be permitted to change their objects, powers and share capital by letters patent under one or the other of the companies acts, any change granted by letters patent would be subject to negative resolution in the House of Commons or the Senate. Because of what happened in the other place, and because of the failure of the government to stand by changes that it seemed to have approved—and I should add that the evidence seems to be that all of these things were approved by various cabinet ministers—we now have this skeleton.

In effect, what this means is that they have the power to increase their authorized capital from $1.75 billion to $5 billion with the approval of the shareholders. Perhaps they have part of the second request. This bill will grant them the right to split shares. The request to come under section 16(a) of the Canada Corporations Act is out, and their request to maintain their responsibility to Parliament, only via the negative resolution route, is denied.

The Senate is in the position of having agreed before that it was a good bill. Now the Commons sends us another bill, with which Bell Canada apparently agrees, which would indicate that they think the Senate was wrong and that it went too far. However, I do not believe it did.

I believe that Bell Canada, in this case, was obviously put into an impossible position. I should say that I have not spoken with any representatives of Bell Canada. I was advised only yesterday that this bill was being assigned to me.

As I say, it seems to me that Bell Canada was put into an impossible position. Apparently, they had to have this increase in capital. Their testimony was that they would run out of funds by the end of the year, and that they could not wait to fight for what they believed to be correct, and no one in government would fight for them. Without protest from any of the parties, the House of Commons gave in to this kind of—well, I won't call it "blackmail," but it does seem to me to be an abuse of the rules when others are denied the use of the time of Parliament.

If honourable senators are wondering why I make this objection, all they have to do is read the House of Commons Hansard. They will find that members of the House of Commons arose one after the other saying exactly the same thing. It was a sheer case of stalling. I, as a member of the Senate, and one who took some time with others to decide that the original bill was a good one, resent the fact that it is coming back before us in this emasculated form for the reasons I indicated. However, I have no option but to support it.

I would be very interested in hearing from representatives from Bell Canada as to where they are now. They did make a case that they urgently needed all of these provisions. Do they? Will they be able to carry on in their computer software programs? Have they been unduly restricted in terms of the contribution they can make to the economy? I do not know the answers to those questions.

I am not going to insist that the bill be referred to committee, but I would ask the sponsor to consider the suggestions I made, because I believe that the Senate might still make a contribution to the solution of what I consider to be an important problem in relations between Parliament, the business community and the customers of the business community.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Deschatelets speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, first of all, I should like to thank Senator Grosart for his thoughtful remarks. I can agree with three-quarters of them, and I wish to answer as briefly as possible some of the points he raised.

Last evening Senator Grosart asked me a supplementary question, which is reported at page 551 of Hansard as follows:

SENATOR GROSART: Supplementary to that question and explanation, I wonder if, just for clarification, the sponsor of the bill would agree that the effect of the amendments made by the Commons was to deny Bell Telephone the main benefits that they sought in Bill S-2 of the last session?

SENATOR DESCHATELETS: I would have to agree with that.

● (1710)

I must make a distinction here, if I am so permitted, to say that I have expressed a personal opinion which is not the opinion of the officers of the company. I still believe—and here I join with Senator Grosart, I think—that in the long run the original powers asked by Bell Canada will be found to be fundamental to the best interests of the company. However, I must say that the officers of the company at this time are more interested in the short term benefits of the bill as it now stands, because it will permit them to proceed with their expansion program. In their view, the amendments made by the Commons do not deny the company the main benefits sought in Bill S-2 of the last session. I want to make that point very clear, because the company, as I have explained on a few occasions, has a very large expansion program and the important thing for them is to have the power they seek to get on with the job. This means an increase in the authorized capital from $1.75 billion to $5 billion.

Honourable senators, I should tell you that since 1945 the company has come to Parliament seeking the passage of a private bill approximately every 10 years or so for the primary purpose of increasing its authorized capital. The last time this happened was in 1967-68.

[Senator Grosart.]

I should like to make one other point very clear, and that is that we have passed Bill S-2. That bill was referred to the Transport and Communications Committee, and the president of the company appeared as a witness. I think we have done a very good job in examining in depth the problems facing the company. Bill S-2 was not amended in any way, and I want to make that clear to all honourable senators. It was talked out in the House of Commons. Then, when Bill C-1001 was introduced and referred to committee, some honourable members thought that some of the provisions were more or less contentious, and that they were not essential at this time for the company to go ahead with its expansion program. That is why there was a compromise and we received Bill C-1001 with those powers deleted.

Now I should like to tackle the last point raised by Senator Grosart. Of course, he has raised so many—

Senator Grosart: Before you leave that last point, and so that there will be no confusion, would you not agree that originally Bill C-1001 was in exactly the same terms as Bill S-2? Would you not also agree that it was introduced and amended, and the amendments were agreed to only at the very last minute?

Senator Deschatelets: Of course, I agree absolutely; it was in the same terms without an iota of change.

Another point Senator Grosart raised was that he felt that somewhere along the hard road travelled by this bill in the Commons the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs might have become involved in it. We must not forget that we are dealing with a private bill which here, as well as in the House of Commons, had to be introduced by a private member, and it was left to the responsibility of the members to deal with the bill as we dealt with it here in the Senate.

So, honourable senators, as Senator Grosart has said, this bill comes back as a skeleton of the bill we had originally, but I do not have to stress that the company is satisfied with it even with the amendments which were made. They are satisfied that with this bill they can go ahead with their expansion program which will mean a great deal for the Canadian economy. This is why I ask you to support the motion for second reading.

Senator Grosart: May I ask the honourable senator a question? He says that the Bell Canada company officials are satisfied, and I am delighted, but would he not—

Senator Deschatelets: If you will permit me to interrupt at this stage, I want to make it clear, because it is very important to make it clear, that they are satisfied for the time being.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

SUSPENSION OF RULE 93

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, here we are dealing with a private bill and, unless you insist, I ask that it not be referred to a committee, because we have already examined it thoroughly and in depth.

So I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I that rule 93 whereby a private bill, after its second reading, shall be referred to a committee, be suspended with respect to Bill C-1001, intituled: "An act respecting Bell Canada."

Senator Grosart: Before leave is granted, may I ask the honourable senator if that means his intention is not to send it to committee?

Senator Deschatelets: We are dealing with a private bill and under rule 93 a private bill must go to a committee, but here I am asking that rule 93 be suspended in relation to this bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Deschatelets, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN LABOUR CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean Marchand moved the second reading of Bill C-8, to amend the Canada Labour Code.

He said: Honourable senators, on Friday, April 7 last, Bill C-8, to amend the Canada Labour Code, reached third reading. I am now pleased to submit it for your consideration and hopefully your approval.

The bill is based on some principles in which the government believes and to which it gives its support, the most important being that the worker is entitled to the best working conditions which the economy can provide. That principle is without any doubt approved by all senators now in this house.

The bill affects workers in the private sector who come under the federal authority, and whose number is estimated at some 550,000, in activities such as railways, airlines, banks, trucking, radio and television, grain handling, communications and ports.

The amendments are mainly aimed at increasing protection for workers, especially non-unionized workers; at giving greater satisfaction at work and thus improve productivity, management and labour relations and devotion to work; and also at reducing conflicts in labour relations.

I imagine you are already familiar with the provisions of the bill since it has been the subject of considerable literature, great publicity and an in-depth study. It would therefore be useless, I am sure, to review it in its every aspect and detail. I shall, however, summarize its main points.

Part III of the Code legislates provisions dealing with the protection of the employee with regard to hours of work, paid holidays, termination benefits, overtime, etc. First of all the bill will extend the application of all provisions, with the exception of those dealing with hours of work, to managers and specialists, thus granting them for the first time statutory rights on such basics as paid annual leave, paid holidays, etc.

Second, it will forbid the employer from laying off or dismissing an employee solely on grounds of pregnancy. Present standards allow an employer to fire a pregnant worker with less than 12-months' seniority.

Third, it will grant bereavement leave in the event of the death of a member of the immediate family of a qualified employee.

Four, it will protect the job of a worker who is absent because of a lengthy illness.

Five, it will give the right to appeal in the case of unjust dismissal, except at management levels.

Six, it will require the payment of wages owed the employee within a reasonable period.

Seven, it will increase to nine the number of general holidays; in short, Boxing Day is being added.

[English]

Part IV: This part of the Code provides comprehensive measures for protecting the safety and health of workers. The bill would:

(a) enable the establishment of employer-employee safety and health committees. These committees would identify and ensure the correction of work hazards. They would also provide employees with a voice in matters related to safe working conditions.

(b) give workers the right to withdraw, without loss of pay, from work situations which they consider pose imminent personal danger. This would be a mechanism by which individual employees could exercise a responsibility, and right, to remove themselves from work situations which they judge threaten serious injury to themselves.

Part V: This part of the Code provides a legal framework for regulating the system of industrial relations. The bill's amendments to part V are intended to:

(a) reinforce the collective bargaining system in order to reduce tensions between labour and management.

(b) improve the grievance arbitration system in order to reduce tensions between employer and employee.

(c) reduce tensions arising out of the relationships between the individual employee-union member and the bargaining parties, employer and unions, by increasing the protection of the rights of the individual.

(d) reduce the impact of the adversarial nature of the labour relations system upon the public by affording greater protection of the public interest, and to improve the administration of Part V.

(e) reduce the number of unnecessary delays and procedures in the administration of the collective bargaining process.

The bill would:

(a) require unions to furnish members with financial statements.

(b) give the Canada Labour Relations Board more discretion to order representation votes.

(c) remove administrative obstacles to certification of councils of trade unions so as to facilitate the creation of broader-based bargaining units.

(d) require that unions fairly represent members of the bargaining unit.

(e) ensure fair and objective referral procedures by union hiring halls.

(f) authorize the CLRB to establish the terms of a first agreement, on referral from the minister.

On that last point I should mention that it is understood that the minister would have the power to settle the terms and conditions of a first collective agreement between a union and an employer because, of course, experience proves that when it is a first agreement the parties very often do not agree because they are unused to bargaining. Also there are a number of grievances, and it is very difficult to reach a first agreement. That is the philosophy behind it. Of course, I know there is another philosophy which says that if there is recourse to the minister who has the authority to decide the parties may not make an effort to solve the matter themselves. They say, "Why take the responsibility? Someone else can do it." There is, therefore, a different aspect to this problem. I know that it has been discussed in committee, and I presume that honourable senators may have different opinions on the matter. Certainly I have my own opinion, but this is not the time to express it.

As honourable senators are aware, the bill has been carefully examined by the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, which also considered some 13 presentations by groups principally affected by its content, including employers and employees. These submissions were given full consideration and are duly reflected in the bill now before us.

● (1730)

In conclusion, I respectfully move the second reading of this bill. I know that all senators will be aware of the timeliness, indeed, the urgency, of its passage.

Senator Macdonald: On behalf of Senator Bélisle, I move the adjournment of this debate.

Hon. David Gordon Steuart: I wonder, honourable senators, if I may make a brief interjection before the debate is adjourned.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Senator Marchand]

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, while there are a great many aspects of this amending bill that I agree with, there are some changes proposed that I think should be looked at very closely. Senator Marchand referred to one of them, and that is the imposition of the first contract by the minister under certain conditions.

I believe some of the amendments are unnecessary and will add to the cost of doing business in some cases, and, in fact, to the friction that already exists between some labour units and some employers, without really accomplishing anything concrete either for the employees or the employers. Let me cite one example. I cannot see the purpose of establishing this additional administrative obligation for employers in respect of the present situation where, under certain circumstances, employers can require employees to work longer than a 40-hour week. This is now being changed. The bill requires that a permit be applied for and obtained before the lengthening of the work week can take place. I believe the present section of the code is working well in most cases, and I am concerned that the permit system will merely increase employers' operating costs and result in another layer of bureaucracy which will be required to administer the permit applications.

If the rationale for the introduction of permits is to allow the department to intervene in situations where an employer is resorting to an averaging program when it is not entitled to do so, I believe that the appropriate remedy might be a more vigorous enforcement of the current provisions of the Canada Labour Code.

Section 69 of the Canada Labour Code now provides that every person who violates any provision of Part III is guilty of an offence and liable to a fine and/or imprisonment. The remedy which the department requires to deal with those few employers who might abuse the averaging program is, I think, already available.

I am also concerned about the right which is retained by the minister under the proposed subsection 29.1(3) to cancel permits where "the circumstances prescribed by the Governor in Council (the cabinet) that existed at the time the permit was issued no longer exist." I think this kind of legislation is objectionable, and it raises questions. For example, what circumstances will be prescribed by the Governor in Council? My concern is that this not only allows the Governor in Council to determine what circumstances shall entitle the employer to the issuance of a permit, but also to determine arbitrarily and unilaterally when those circumstances no longer exist.

In summary, the proposal with respect to averaging will alter a system which is currently functioning well by superimposing a costly administrative procedure and by allowing the creation of a new and as yet unknown guideline governing the entitlement of the averaging program.

I am going to use the example of the elevator system in western Canada. I think honourable senators will recognize that there are times of the year when the elevator system is hardly used—in the winter, for example. During those times the employees are allowed to take a great deal of time off.

Later on, perhaps in the fall or at some other time of the year, when the farmers' quotas are open and the farmers want to use the elevator system for long periods of the day—perhaps 10 or 12 hours—and it might run five and six days a week. In those circumstances the averaging provision now under the Canada Labour Code is made full use of.

This may not be denied. I do not suggest the amendments contained in this bill will deny the elevator operators the use of averaging, but if every elevator operator has to get a permit, and that permit can be cancelled arbitrarily, then we all recognize it will not be done by the cabinet or by the Governor in Council; it will be done by a civil servant in the Department of Labour. The people operating the elevator systems are afraid that it will add another bureaucratic impediment to the normal operations of the elevator system. What is true of the elevator system is true of a great many other small businesses.

I remind honourable senators that small towns across this country, but especially in the prairies, are having a difficult time. Hundreds of them are disappearing and hundreds more are threatened. The elevator, in all cases, is important to the small town. If it disappears, it may well be the straw that breaks the camel's back.

In recent years we have seen the number of country elevators decline from something over 5,000 to somewhere around 3,000. Therefore, any move that will hasten the closure of elevators, and place an added burden on many of our small rural communities and hasten their demise, I think, must be looked at very closely. I am not saying this necessarily will happen, but a good many of the people involved in the elevator system feel it might happen, and could well happen.

Let me also point out that in the years I have been involved in moving around Saskatchewan I have yet to hear a complaint from an elevator operator—that is, an employee—about the averaging of his work week; about the fact that some weeks he may work 60 or 70 hours, and this is averaged out in other weeks when he may work far fewer hours. Most of them recognize that this is the nature of the work and they fully subscribe to it. In fact, in order to give the service to the farmers, who they know work the same kind of hours, they are more than ready to comply. I just hope that by passing this bill, and giving this new power to people in the Department of Labour who may mean well but who may not have knowledge of conditions in the elevator system, we do not work a great deal of harm.

Many provisions of this bill have been supported by employer groups, but a great many have not been supported. As Senator Marchand pointed out, many employee and employer associations, made representations when this bill was in the committee of the other place.

I recently became aware of the fact that the Canadian Trucking Association, for example, took strong exception to one clause that they maintained was amended after the hearings. I will just read what they have to say in this regard.

We also wish to go on record objecting strenuously to the last-minute addition of a provision giving retroactive application to the imposition of a first agreement.

The truckers claim that the introduction of such an amendment after the hearing stage before committee is a serious abuse of the parliamentary process. Whether they are right or wrong, I think that giving the minister this kind of power and making it retroactive has very serious implications.

In view of this and other representations that have been made, I hope that the Senate will give this bill serious but not too rapid consideration. I know there is a desire in the other place to see this bill passed fairly rapidly. However, in view of the representations that have been made, I hope that we will proceed with some caution so that we, in an effort to improve relations between employers and employees, do not, in fact, do the opposite.

● (1740)

Senator Flynn: If Senator Goldenberg wishes to speak for a few minutes we are prepared to yield.

Senator Goldenberg: It is not with respect to this bill.

Senator Langlois: It is with respect to the next order.

On motion of Senator Macdonald for Senator Bélisle, debate adjourned.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1978

SECOND READING

Hon. Carl Goldenberg moved the second reading of Bill C-41, to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, and other acts subsequent to 1970.

He said: Honourable senators, my remarks will take less than five minutes.

Senator Grosart: We do not believe you.

An Hon. Senator: We have heard that before.

Senator Goldenberg: I will ask Senator Grosart to time me, and if I take more than five minutes it will be because of questions he will put to me.

Honourable senators, this is the bill version of the proposals to correct anomalies, inconsistencies and so on, which were tabled in the Senate on February 2, and subsequently examined by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, whose report was tabled on February 21 and adopted on February 22. The bill contains three very minor deviations from the report of the Senate committee, which I will mention.

There were certain proposals with respect to the appointment of auditors of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which the department had sponsored and then decided to withdraw. There was a proposal to amend the Citizenship Act which would empower the Lieutenant Governor in Council in a province by regulation to control or prohibit the sale of land to non-Canadians. This was withdrawn because it was understood, when these proposals were submitted to the Senate and to the House of Commons, that there would have to be unanimity. There was not unanimity in the other place. The only remaining change is with respect to the Tax Review Board, where for the pronoun "he" one of the lady members of the other place insisted that the word "person" be substituted. That is the only change there.

Senator Flynn: That is rather controversial.

Senator Goldenberg: It is very controversial, because she was complaining of male domination.

These are the only changes, and in all other respects the bill reflects the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I hope, honourable senators, that in the light of what I have said we can dispose of this measure now.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, with the assurance that has been given to us by the sponsor, and also in view of its nature, I believe this bill need not be referred to committee. It is my understanding that it is not the intention of the sponsor to move that it be so referred, and I see no objection to the bill's receiving second reading today and third reading tomorrow.

Senators Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I am not rising to object in any way to the motion to which we are about to agree—in fact, I suppose some will say it has already been agreed to—but I wonder if the committee to which the sponsor made reference, which I have no doubt did its work very well indeed, ascertained how these 12 pages of errors came about and if, in ascertaining that, it increased their confidence in the draftsmanship to which we are constantly subject?

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Flynn: At the next sitting, and you can prepare your answers.

Senator Goldenberg moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it being 6 o'clock, pursuant to rule 12, I will now leave the Chair until 8 o'clock this evening, unless the Senate by unanimous consent decides to complete today's business now. What is the feeling of the house?

Senator Flynn: We are at the end of the Order Paper.

Senator Langlois: It is complete.

Senator Flynn: All the remaining items stand.

NATIONAL FINANCE

CANCELLATION OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Senator Langlois: Before moving the adjournment of the Senate, honourable senators, I would like to inform you that the meeting of the National Finance Committee scheduled for this afternoon has been cancelled.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, April 12, 1978

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

April 12, 1978

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Wishart F. Spence, O.B.E., Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 12th day of April, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a message has been received from the House of Commons to return Bill S-10, respecting the Royal Canadian Legion, and to acquaint the Senate that they have passed this bill without amendment.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1977, pursuant to section 8 of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce Act, Chapter I-11, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce under the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act (Part I, Corporations) for the fiscal periods ended in 1975, pursuant to section 18(1) of the said Act, Chapter C-31, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of Petro-Canada, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditors, for the year ended December 31, 1977, pursuant to sections 75(3) and 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of Eldorado Nuclear Limited and its subsidiary, Eldorado Aviation Limited, including their accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the year ended December 31, 1977, pursuant to sections 75(3) and 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of Reports of the Anti-Inflation Board to the Governor in Council, pursuant to section 17(2) of the Anti-Inflation Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada, 1974-75-76, reporting its reference to the Administrator of the said Act of certain proposed changes in compensation plans, as follows:

1. Domtar Chemical Limited, Sifto Salt Division and their mine employees at Goderich, Ontario, represented by the Canadian Chemical Workers Union, Local 16, dated April 10, 1978.
2. Borough of Etobicoke and its public health nurses group, represented by the Ontario Nurses Association, Local 29, dated April 6, 1978.
3. Coca-Cola Limited and its Regina plant personnel, represented by the Canadian Union of United Brewery, Flour, Cereal, Soft Drink and Distillery Workers, Local 319, dated March 28, 1978.
4. Oland's Breweries (1971) Limited and its Halifax, Nova Scotia plant personnel, represented by the Canadian Union of United Brewery Workers, Local 361, dated April 6, 1978.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, perhaps a brief explanation would be in order before the question is put. Contrary to the notice of meeting that went out, this committee will sit at 3.30 p.m. and not when the Senate rises. That is the reason for this motion.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Langlois: Before the question is put, I understand that the chairman of the committee at whose request I have made this motion has an explanation to offer.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, for some time now we have had this committee meeting arranged to hear the annual presentation to the Parliament of Canada by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. They have followed the practice in recent years of presenting to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture their submission to the government and to Parliament, and this is the last time they can appear before our committee because they are leaving Ottawa later this afternoon. So I think we should be able to hear them this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: That is too bad, but I can understand their wanting to leave Ottawa.

Motion agreed to.

PROVINCIAL SALES TAX—QUESTIONS

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Revenue, our new colleague, Senator Guay.

I think this is the first time since the last world war that we see the federal government directly or indirectly appropriate, with or without the consent of the provinces, some strictly provincial sources of revenue in lieu of direct payments.

[Senator Langlois.]

I would like to ask the minister whether, to his knowledge, there have been other occasions since the war when the federal budget proposed strictly provincial tax reductions and whether the decision or the government proposal in the budget of Monday last is an attempt to return to that time when the federal government determined the provincial tax rates and even replaced them? Is that the government's intention?

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, rather than asking such information of the Minister of National Revenue, I think this question should be directed to the Minister of Finance who could provide better explanations and state his ideas.

As you know, I am only the collector. The Department of Finance moves the legislation and presents the budget while I only collect the funds.

Senator Flynn: There is at least one part of my question you could answer.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I would still like to take the question as notice, and I shall give a more definite answer tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: There is at least one part of my question the Minister of National Revenue can answer, namely whether it is the first time since the previous war that we have had such a proposal, because I am sure the minister knows exactly how federal taxes are levied and how deductions are granted.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I mentioned that I shall be in a position to give a more definite answer tomorrow.

NATIONAL UNITY

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO QUEBEC ORGANIZATIONS SUPPORTING FEDERALISM—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. In view of the negative reaction among most of the Quebec groups organized to defend federalism in the future referendum in Quebec, could the leader please tell us if the federal government is planning to reconsider its position with regard to providing financial aid to these organizations?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must take that question as notice. I know that all honourable senators are deeply concerned with the issue of preserving the unity of this country. Naturally, we want those efforts to flow in the most constructive channels possible.

RULES OF THE SENATE

RULE 46(G)—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Chairman of the Rules Committee, my good friend Senator Molson.

Senator Molson: I may not be such a good friend afterwards.

Senator Flynn: In view of the confusion with which we were faced yesterday when Senator Phillips moved the adjournment of the house under rule 46(g), and because confusion also arose on previous occasions when similar motions were moved: once by Senator Molgat and once as a result of the inspiration of Senator McElman, and in view of the obvious conclusion that it is not too clear just what rule 46(g) really means and how it should be applied, may I ask the chairman if his committee intends to review the situation so as to clarify the rule or bring forth a new rule, in order to avoid in future what has happened in the recent past?

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, in replying to my honourable friend, I find myself in the happy position—and I think perhaps it is the first time I have ever been in such a position—of being able to say that I have already taken action in the direction he suggests.

Senator Flynn: Bravo!

Senator Molson: I have suggested to the Law Clerk that we consider this matter and deal with it as soon as we can after an appropriate delay.

NATIONAL UNITY

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT GRANT TO UNITY CANADA—QUESTION

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question, perhaps supplementary to the one Senator Flynn has put to Senator Perrault, dealing with federal government contributions to certain organizations concerned with the defence of a united Canada.

Is the government leader aware that yesterday all parties in the Quebec National Assembly, including his colleagues in the Liberal Party, unanimously adopted a motion requesting the federal government to withdraw the $265,000 contribution which had initially been granted to the Unity Canada Committee through its president, Mr. Maurice Sauvé?

Senator Marchand: The Honourable Maurice Sauvé.

Senator Asselin: Yes, the Honourable Maurice Sauvé, the husband of the Honourable Jeanne Sauvé who sits in the other place.

Given that action, will the government leader ask his cabinet colleagues to request the Honourable Marc Lalonde to withdraw that amount of $265,000 to allow Quebecers to settle freely their problems between themselves in the interest of Quebec as a whole?

Senator Côté: That should be the Secretary of State.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have not been provided with a text of the resolution referred to by the honourable senator. For that reason I am unable to comment on the nature of the resolution or initiative in the Province of Quebec. However, the honourable senator's comments will be carefully noted and his views transmitted to the appropriate sources in the government.

THE ESTIMATES

DOCUMENT ENTITLED "FEDERAL SPENDING PLANS, 1978-79"— QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, yesterday the Honourable Senator Smith (Colchester) stated that he had been honoured by the delivery to him of a document entitled "Federal Spending Plans, 1978-79." He stated that the estimates show restraint. He wanted some information about the nature of the publication, and he asked under whose authority the document was published.

The document entitled "Federal Spending Plans, 1978-79" really constitutes an earnest attempt by the government to communicate useful information to the people of Canada. It was published at public expense under the authority of the President of the Treasury Board.

I am pleased to be able to inform honourable senators that copies, in both official languages, are being placed on display in federal buildings, post offices and some railway stations. Approximately 200,000 copies are available to the public in this way.

I want to assure the honourable senator that additional copies are available to him and to other honourable senators for distribution should they desire them.

Some schools and universities make use of this tabloid in their classrooms, usually in the fall of the year, to inform the students about how tax dollars are allocated in this country. A total of 300,000 copies were printed; typesetting costs were $7,000; printing costs, $33,000. The estimated total production cost is $44,000.

I should say that this represents an attempt by the government to demonstrate its own sense of restraint—

Senator Flynn: It takes a lot of money to do that.

Senator Perrault: —because the tabloid replaces the substantially more expensive booklet "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent," which was printed last year at substantially higher cost. Distribution of this publication was by the same method. Reaction to it was so favourable last year that it was felt a similar document should be printed this year in greater number; but an attempt has been made to reduce the cost by making a less expensive format.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government if the document to which he referred as having been distributed previously, namely, "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent", is not very different, in its attempt to deliver propaganda to those who need it, from this document with which I honoured him yesterday?

Senator Perrault: The publication "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent" has, of course, been used by members of committees. It is usually regarded as a very authoritative source. The publication "Federal Spending Plans, 1978-79" follows very closely in the path of that splendid publication last year.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government if it is correct to infer from his reference to the publication "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent", as being "something that happened in previous years," that its publication is being discontinued?

Senator Perrault: I have received no information that there will be an edition this year of that publication in the form in which it appeared last year.

NATIONAL REVENUE

NEGOTIATIONS RE CANADIAN CO-OPERATIVE IMPLEMENTS LTD.—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question which I should like to direct to the Minister of National Revenue. It relates to a matter that is extremely important to the whole of the prairie region of Canada. I ask this question because there are a number of deadlines, or proposed deadlines, that have already passed. My question is: Is there any progress to report respecting negotiations and discussions between the federal government, the provincial governments of the three prairie provinces, and Canadian Co-Operative Implements Ltd., so that that company does not have to close its doors, as they indicated, because of certain deadlines that are now behind us?

● (1420)

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, the Minister of Agriculture is announcing in the other place today that funds will be provided in co-operation with the prairie provinces to make sure that this fantastic industry, which started in 1940 and which provides over 3,000 jobs, can carry on in the manner in which they have carried on over the years. The commitment is undertaken in co-operation with the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. The federal government is to provide a total of $8 million, interest free, for 10 years, the provinces guaranteeing the remaining $7 million among them.

I believe the four governments involved have decided to provide this support to avert the possibility that the co-operative might fail. The assistance in question would make sure that this would not occur, thus maintaining a sound economy in this sector of industry in the prairie provinces, and ensuring that there would be no unemployment in that area.

Senator Olson: Have the governments of the prairie provinces agreed to participate in this commitment and these guarantees?

Senator Guay: As I understand it the three prairie provinces are participating in it as such.

THE CONSTITUTION

REPORT OF ONTARIO ROYAL COMMISSION ON CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM—QUESTION

Senator Olson: May I ask the Leader of the Government if the government has received a copy of, or been apprised of, the report of the Ontario Royal Commission on Constitutional Reform? If so, does the federal government intend to respond to this report, especially regarding those recommendations dealing with certain important federal institutions such as the Supreme Court and the Senate of Canada?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am not able to provide information on that subject at this time. I will take the question as notice.

PRIVATE BILL

BELL CANADA—THIRD READING

Senator Deschatelets moved the third reading of Bill C-1001, respecting Bell Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1978

THIRD READING

Senator Goldenberg moved the third reading of Bill C-41, to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, and other Acts subsequent to 1970.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Goldenberg would comment on the statement made by Senator Smith (Colchester) yesterday.

Senator Goldenberg: I would be glad to.

Senator Smith wanted to know who was responsible for the errors which have to be corrected. I believe I am right in that. I will draw Senator Smith's attention to the fact that the statute deals with anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors. Anomalies and inconsistencies will naturally arise because of subsequent legislation. So far as the errors are concerned, Senator Smith has brought this answer on himself. The laws are drafted by lawyers and interpreted by judges, and this statute proves that neither are infallible.

Senator Flynn: I would say "nor is Parliament."

Senator Forsey: Nor is the Department of Justice.

Senator Perrault: That is right.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I would think it also demonstrates very clearly that it is no longer safe to entrust complete and utter faith in the draftsmen whose works we are continually being asked to scrutinize. This is a pretty good illustration of the necessity for continuing that very careful scrutiny in the future.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, this is exactly what the present government has introduced. This is the second Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act. It had never been done before, but this is what is being done now.

Senator Flynn: I hope we will not hear in this house too often, as we have heard in the past, that because the Department of Justice says something is all right—and I heard it yesterday from Senator van Roggen—and the government says it is all right, then we should accept it.

Senator Goldenberg: As far as I am concerned, I did not say that the Department of Justice is infallible, but when I referred to lawyers and judges I included the Department of Justice.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Hicks for the second reading of Bill C-18, to amend the Anti-Inflation Act and guidelines.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise very reluctantly, to discuss this bill, and I am not entirely sure whether I should go ahead at this particular time.

The Leader of the Government may be able to help me if he decides to listen to what is going on in the chamber at the moment.

The problem that faces me, of course, is that this is April 14. We have been told that it is necessary for this house to pass this bill so that the order in council beginning the phasing out of the Anti-Inflation Act can commence on Friday. I would ask him if, in his view, that is a correct assumption of this intolerable situation.

● (1430)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I think it would be more appropriate that the sponsor of this bill (Senator Hicks) provide a reply to that question. It is his bill. I may participate later in this debate, but that is a question more properly put to the sponsor of the bill.

Senator Hicks: Except that Senator Grosart was mistaken in saying that this is April 14—this is April 12, as a matter of fact—his interpretation is correct, that the bill should enable the regulations and transitory processes to commence on Friday, April 14.

Senator Grosart: This is April 12.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Marshall: It should be April 1.

Senator Denis: What year?

Senator Grosart: Senator Denis asks what year. That is an excellent question, as I will demonstrate as I go along, because there is clear evidence that in presenting this bill the government is not sure when they intended it to become completely operative. I will make that point as I go along. I say it is an excellent question, because I am quite sure the government does not know the year in which they intend the phasing out of controls or their complete removal.

I said this is an intolerable situation. Of course it is. Presumably the Leader of the Government will seek royal assent some time before midnight tomorrow night. Here is a bill, if ever there was one, that should go to committee and stay there until the committee is satisfied about certain questions. I do not think there was ever a bill, in my time here, that needed more thorough scrutiny than this bill. I go further and say I do not believe I can recall a single bill in my time here, which is sixteen years now, that has been more ineptly handled by the government, and particularly by the ministers who had some responsibility for it. The fact of the matter is that the Prime Minister, followed by the Minister of Finance, announced in October that April 14 was to be the phasing out date. We are now told that that cannot be done in an orderly fashion unless we rush through this bill as has been suggested. I say this is a bill that certainly raises more questions than it answers, such as: When will the act expire? We are told that certain clauses are necessary to protect wage levels. We are told that the phasing out will not affect the majority of groups, firms and employees until the end of the year. Yet we are told that this is urgent.

I have asked—and I hope the sponsor of the bill will be able to answer the question in due course, or that it will be answered in committee—for the actual authority of the phasing out on April 14, next Friday. There is no mention of it in the bill, a fact which was mentioned by Senator Hicks. It is to be done by order in council but there is no mention of the order in council, no description of it, and no indication of what it says has been put before the Senate or, indeed, the House of Commons, if I have correctly read all the proceedings, which were lengthy proceedings, that went on there. This is relevant to the very good question asked by Senator Denis—will controls expire at the end of the year, the statutory date? We are told they will expire, but we are also told that the AIB will continue, that the administrator will continue and that the tribunal will continue. Very well, part of the statement is that this will be just to clear up. However, the statements of the minister make it entirely inconclusive as to whether that is the situation.

The minister was asked about monitoring. When this bill was before the committee in the other place an attempt was made to obtain some information as to the level, the degree and the authority of the monitoring. The chairman of the committee—who was obviously in sympathy with the position of the minister rather than that of those who were asking questions—said he did not see that monitoring has anything to do with this bill. This is the atmosphere in which we are discussing it, having the chairman of that committee say that monitoring has nothing to do with the bill. Well, surely it has. We are told that phasing out will begin, that there will be monitoring, that the monitoring will be done, if anyone can believe this, by the Economic Council of Canada, a council which has never had any such role, which for years has been regarded as a completely independent agency advising the government. It is quite true that it has given the government some advice at times which the government did not like, which suggests to me that this may be the reason it is now being converted into a control agency. Why? No explanation. I have sought the explanation, I have read the terms of reference sent by the Prime Minister, and it is clear that the chairman, chairwoman, chairperson, of the Economic Council does not understand the terms of reference. That is the situation in which we find ourselves.

We are also facing a situation in which the controls are being phased out at a time when the utter failure of the whole AIB controls is so evident. They were introduced in April 1975 and the situation with regard to inflation and unemployment in Canada is worse today, or it is certainly no better, than it was at that time. Maybe that is a good reason for phasing out the controls. Senator Phillips indicated the dimensions of the utter failure. I can only reiterate that the evidence is there that it has failed completely. The best that the government has been able to say is that it did affect inflation expectations. I will not deny that; maybe it did, but it has not affected in any measurable way the level of inflation in Canada which today, according to the latest OECD report, is away above the average of other comparable countries; that is, western industrial countries with which we trade. Canada's inflation level is, unfortunately, far ahead of the inflation level experienced in the United States, which is our largest trading partner. That is the atmosphere in which we are asked to rush this bill through.

The Minister, the Honourable Jean Chrétien, on several occasions said that the end of controls means we will be back to the free market era. There is no question about that.

This government, as the Honourable Senator Hicks stated in his remarks introducing this bill, does not believe in intervention in the market. Perhaps I can quote some statements made by the Minister of Finance to indicate the doubt which arises in my mind and, perhaps, in the minds of many others as to whether there is any validity in these pious statements made by the minister. The minister said on one occasion—and, if I am taking a moment or two to find my references, I can only say in excuse that I have not had much time to prepare to discuss the bill. The minister said:

With this agency—

And he is talking about the monitoring agency that will succeed the Anti-Inflation Board.

—we want to monitor price development.

That is hardly a free market. He then states:

One of the problems in the free-market system is this; they—

Meaning those who have reason to set prices.

—tell the agency to go to hell and everybody else. That is what you call a free market.

This, apparently, is the official attitude of the Government of Canada towards the market and the free enterprise system. The minister took great pains to assure everybody, on the eve of a general election, that the government is really dedicated to the concept of free enterprise in the market. He went even further than that. He said:

We are going to keep on monitoring these prices.

He does not say what he means, but he does say—and these are his words:

[Senator Grosart.]

Unless you want us back in control.

These are the words of the minister describing the situation which would arise under this bill, or what will happen if this bill is passed. He said:

Unless you want us back in control.

That is the minister's statement.

Perhaps the most horrendous clauses in this bill are those which provide for the retroactive denial of the validity of collective bargaining. It may startle some senators to know that this is exactly the impact of clauses 1 and 8 of this bill.

Early last summer the Anti-Inflation Board began to be worried about the effect of the lifting of wage and price controls at some point in the future. Officials from the Anti-Inflation Board advised the government of their concern and suggested to the government certain amendments to the act. As I said, this was last summer, and nothing was done. A bill was introduced by the government during the summer but was allowed to die on the order paper. This was the bill which would have brought into effect the clauses which I am about to discuss. We are rushed now, within about 36 hours, on a matter on which the government was advised last summer but on which they failed to act. That is the position which we are in.

These clauses create a situation where it will be illegal—and that is the word used by the minister—for any employer or employee to carry out the terms and conditions of a contract solemnly agreed to between the parties. There is no question that that is the impact of it.

The official statement is:

These clauses deem the compensation plans—

Those are the contracts. The bill and the discussions held on the government side always carefully avoid the word "contract" or even "labour agreement". They now call these "compensation plans." The statement continues:

These clauses deem the compensation plans to be amended in line with the recommendations of the AIB Administrator. Without this amendment groups would probably be entitled to the negotiated level of wages as soon as the controls ceased to apply.

I believe a further examination of the situation made it clear that it was not a question of their probably having the right. Of course, they would negotiate contracts and agree that certain things would happen when controls were lifted.

This is an amazing statement as far as I am concerned.

The minister was given examples of specific contracts and he said in effect:

No. If they negotiated at any time for any compensation after the controls are over, we won't allow it. I don't care what they negotiated. I don't care what they agreed. I don't care if they are solemn contracts. I don't care about collective bargaining. What we are saying here is no.

This is an extraordinary statement. The minister was asked if the contract provided that in the case of a roll-back the full negotiated rates would apply as soon as legally permitted after the elimination of controls, and his answer was: "It is illegal..."

I will go back over that. The minister was asked if, in the case of a roll-back, the full negotiated rates would apply as soon as legally permitted, and his answer was: "It is illegal..." That quote can be found at page 8:8 in the proceedings of the House of Commons Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs dated February 7, 1978.

This is the bill we are asked to rush through. We are told that if something is done legally it is illegal. That is the clear statement. There is no getting away from that. I have given the reference so that senators may read it to make sure that I am not just quoting words out of context. There was considerable questioning leading up to this statement, and the minister said that he didn't care, that it was illegal.

This is the way this government runs this country, and this is the kind of bill we are asked to rush through, not giving the normal consideration to this bill.

● (1450)

The so-called compensation clauses represent, to my recollection, the worst case of retroactivity in my time in the Senate. I would be delighted if any honourable senator with a better memory than mine could tell me of a worse case of retroactive legislation than legislation which says a contract is not a contract and cannot be enforced, and it is illegal if one tries to carry out the terms of the contract. That is what we are faced with.

It is fair to say that the government has a reason for protecting the general wage levels in the decontrols period, and I agree with that. All I say is that this is not the way. There are better ways. There could be better ways, and I think there would be better ways, if the opportunity were given to the Senate to give the consideration to this bill that it deserves.

I am aware of the time limit that is imposed on us, but there are many other aspects of the bill to which the attention of honourable senators should be drawn. Naturally, in this kind of situation we get the old word "deemed." In respect of these compensation clauses we are asked to "deem" these contracts never to have been made.

I am not going to vote for the bill, and I cannot understand why any honourable senator would.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Hicks speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion of second reading of this bill.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Grosart and Senator Phillips for their contributions to the debate on this controversial bill. I am well aware that the whole subject of anti-inflation controls, as instituted in Canada and carried out, is a controversial one, and one on which it is possible for well-intentioned people to have sharply differing opinions. I would merely say, however, that whether the anti-inflation legislation has worked as well as we had hoped, it seems to me there can be little doubt that it has helped the situation, which would otherwise have been worse in Canada. I think it has had some beneficial effect.

I agree also that one could debate whether April 14 or December 31 next is the correct time for the phasing out of the anti-inflation controls and the discontinuance of the legislation. The government, in its discretion, has decided that this timing is right.

Mind you, the government has been very careful in its statements, even those concerning government intervention in the marketplace. The statement I made in my opening address was that the government does not believe in excessive intervention in the marketplace. Perhaps some members of the government are aware of the necessity of saving their position, even in relation to this matter.

Senator Grosart: You mean saving their position in an election?

Senator Hicks: No, I do not think it has anything to do with the election.

There is one other reference that Senator Grosart made that I think requires a little elaboration, and that is the matter of retroactivity. I agree with him that we should always look very carefully at retroactivity in any kind of legislation. It is not popular with me, and I do not think it is popular with most members of legislative bodies. However, the retroactivity of clauses 1 and 8 is surely not as iniquitous as Senator Grosart represents it to be.

Let me elaborate just slightly on these clauses. These clauses, it is true, will back-date to December 16, 1975 the order in council which brought under mandatory controls various groups which bargain in association, and applies only to them. This date would normally have applied except for a technicality, and I will come to that in a moment. The government has always made clear its intention to take this action, and a number of affected groups have made decisions on that basis.

To elaborate further, section 12 of the act provides that designated industries may be brought under mandatory control where the Anti-Inflation Board, after receiving a direction from the Governor in Council to conduct an inquiry, recommends that this should be done. Obviously, some time may elapse before the AIB's inquiry is completed, and section 3(3.2) of the Anti-Inflation Act provides that an order in council bringing designated industries under the act may be applicable on the day on which the minister first directed the AIB to conduct an inquiry into the advisability of such action.

In this particular case, the direction to the AIB to conduct an inquiry was given on December 16, 1975. However, a technical defect prevents the use of this section, thus restricting the application of the act to the designated industries only from April 15, 1976. I think I mentioned in my opening remarks on this bill the nature of the technical defect. In order for it to be effective under the act, the minister must give public notice in the House of Commons. In fact, the minister mistakenly gave the notice to a Senate committee, with the result that the notice was not properly given to the House of Commons. This defect has to be corrected by this legislation.

As I said, it would have taken effect only from April 15, 1976, the date on which the results of the Anti-Inflation Board's inquiry were given effect by order in council. In view of this, Order in Council P.C.1976-910, which brought these industries under the act, is not retroactive to December 16, 1975, although from that date the industries were under notice that such action was likely to be taken. Important contracts were concluded in the interim. So that the purpose of the order in council would be obviated if it were not made retroactive to December 16, 1975.

A public commitment was made by Mr. Macdonald at the time the order in council was issued to seek amending legislation to rectify this anomaly. A number of groups have already concluded agreements on the understanding that they would eventually be placed under the act by legislation. For this reason, I suggest that this is not such an horrendous act of retroactivity as Senator Grosart represented it to be.

I think that is all I need say at the present time, honourable senators. It is apparently the wish of the chamber that the bill be referred to committee. If it receives second reading, I am prepared to move that it be referred to the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, where a number of other matters could be discussed, if that is the wish of honourable senators.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask one question of the sponsor of the bill in relation to the retroactivity of the bill. It is a simple question. Is it not so that the retroactive nature of this bill is to give legal validity to an order in council which is now a year old and which, in itself, was retroactive?

Senator Hicks: My understanding is that the order in council was made at the time the Anti-Inflation Board had completed its inquiry as directed by the Governor in Council—

Senator Grosart: 1976.

Senator Hicks: —and that the effectiveness, therefore, would date only from the date of the order in council, which was April 15, 1976. But in fact the machinery was set in motion on December 16, 1975, and the parties concerned were under notice that the changes would be effective from that date. Because the notice was not given in the proper place, this retroactivity is necessary. I am not denying its retroactivity; I am denying the horrendousness of the retroactivity as alleged by Senator Grosart.

● (1500)

Senator Grosart: Just to clarify the matter, what I did ask was whether these retroactive provisions were not for the sole purpose of giving validity to an order in council which itself had retroactive effect. That is all the question was.

Senator Hicks: I do not understand it to be so. I understand that there would be no question of the effect of the decision embodied in the order in council of mid-April 1976, and it was merely a matter of getting it back to December 16, 1975. I do not know that the order in council of April 15, 1976 was in itself retroactive.

Senator Grosart: Well, all I can say is—perhaps I should put it in the form of a question. Will the sponsor of the bill be good enough to check his answers with a clear statement to the contrary made by the officials and by the minister?

Senator Hicks: I shall certainly be glad to do that.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Hicks moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Marchand for the second reading of Bill C-8, to amend the Canada Labour Code.

[Translation]

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, allow me first to congratulate very sincerely Senator Jean Marchand for his statement regarding a very complex bill. Knowing that Senator Marchand has spent his lifetime debating labour issues, he was the most likely person to carry out such a detailed analysis of this bill.

[English]

Honourable senators, on October 27, 1977, the Honourable John Munro, Minister of Labour, introduced Bill C-8 in the House of Commons for first reading. This bill represents the first major revision to the Canada Labour Code in five years, and its "omnibus" nature reflects the substantial changes which have taken place in employment conditions, labour relations, and provincial labour laws. The bill also contains provisions intended to ease some of the administrative problems which have arisen since the last changes in the Labour Code because in the Labour Code, as in the case of many pieces of legislation, administrative weaknesses become apparent as times and conditions change.

Honourable senators, I say with all sincerity that the minister is desirous of bringing about a better state of industrial relations in this country. Certainly he has made a great many speeches trying to persuade the Canadian public, especially the labour movement, that this is so. The difficulty is that he has been operating under very trying conditions, most of which have been created by the actions of his own cabinet colleagues.

I should like to come to some of the points which have to be considered when one looks at labour legislation and industrial relations. I suppose that when one tries to find the key to better relations between labour and management, labour and government, or labour, management, and government together, the first word to start with is "trust." This may not all be the fault of the Minister of Labour. His difficulty over the last several years has been largely that labour in this country no longer trusts the government of the day.

What has happened is that there has been a breakdown of any trust between the labour movement and the government, although, curiously and interestingly enough, there has been more consultation between management and labour in the last year than probably at any time earlier in our history. What does that mean? It means that management recognized that there was no way out of this morass unless they ignored the blandishments or the entreaties of the government and dealt with labour by themselves. That is exactly what has happened.

We remember the next doublecross. As honourable members will remember, the Anti-Inflation Board guidelines clearly indicated that if in 1978 inflation did not decrease to 6 per cent or less, there would be provision for allowing wage increases above 6 per cent. That commitment to labour was broken. I say with sincerity that the Minister of Labour knows the effect that had on the climate of accord which he has been attempting to establish.

It is against a background of broken promises and most serious economic difficulties that the minister has the unenviable task of trying to maintain a link between the government of the day and the labour movement. I will give him credit for trying. As everyone is aware, he is operating under difficult circumstances.

The public of Canada should be reminded that federal jurisdiction in labour matters is extremely limited. The minister referred to extra-labour propositions. These propositions will have only a limited effect if they are established, because approximately only 10 per cent of the work force in Canada comes within federal jurisdiction. There are approximately 10 million people in Canada's labour force and, of that number approximately 10 per cent come under the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. The rest come under the jurisdictions of the ten provinces and are subject to various provincial labour codes. The workers within federal jurisdiction are subject to the Canada Labour Code. It is important to realize that they include federal public servants who are subject to the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

• (1510)

The 1977 figures indicate that, of the total Canadian work force, 3,149,213 are unionized. The Canadian Labour Congress membership includes 99 unions. Of these, 14 unions have 50,000 members or more. I do not need to list all the unions, but it is important to remember that in the private sector and under federal jurisdiction, and as a consequence subject to the Canada Labour Code, there are approximately 550,000 workers. The most recent figures indicate that approximately 45 per cent of these workers are non-unionized. In addition, approximately 320,000 public servants come within federal jurisdiction and are subject to the Public Service Staff Relations Act. The unionized workers within federal jurisdiction, subject to the Canada Labour Code, are represented by approximately 55 unions, excluding directly chartered CLC and CNTU unions, 40 of which are affiliated with the CLC. The unionized federal public servants are represented by 13 unions, of which eight are affiliated with the CLC.

The minister set out the general areas of federal jurisdiction. In summary, the federal jurisdiction involved 550,000 people who are private sector employees and 320,181 people who are public sector employees. If the armed forces, the RCMP and others—which comprise approximately another 100,000 people—are added to those figures—the total is just under one million. In the private sector, just over one-half are unionized and have the right to strike under the Canada Labour Code; and in the public sector, approximately 90 per cent have the right to strike. In the public sector the remaining 10 per cent are senior executives, personnel administrators, the operational methods group, and certain designated essential service employees.

The first major function of Bill C-8 is to update the provisions of Part III of the Canada Labour Code which deals with standard hours, wages, vacations and holidays. These revisions have been necessitated by changing social standards in terms of working conditions, changes in provincial legislation, and a desire to extend to unorganized workers many of the benefits which have become commonplace among organized workers.

In terms of added benefits, the bill adds Boxing Day to the list of national holidays, clause 1; extends the vacation period to three weeks for employees with more than six years continuous employment, clause 12; and increases the vacation pay to 6 per cent of annual salary from the present 4 per cent after six years employment, clause 11. The bill also allows bereavement leave to workers for any working days falling on the three days following the death of a member of the immediate family and that leave will be granted with pay to workers with more than three months' experience on the job, clause 21.

The bill also contains several provisions which are aimed at extending job security to unorganized workers in the federal jurisdiction. Workers can no longer be laid off or dismissed because of pregnancy, clause 6. This protection had previously been offered only to workers with more than 12 months employment. Employees can no longer be dismissed for absence due to illness once they have been employed for three months, providing their absence is for a period of less than 12 weeks, clause 22. The bill also establishes a greater degree of job security by providing that workers cannot be dismissed without just cause, clause 22, division V-7. Under these new regulations unorganized workers can appeal to the Canada Labour Relations Board for reinstatement if they feel they have been dismissed unjustly.

The bill also extends the protection of working conditions, except those dealing with hours of work, in Part III of the Labour Code to managers and professionals employed in the federal jurisdiction, clause 2. Another provision of the bill requires that wages must be paid within 30 days of the date they are earned, clause 22, division V-8.

I am surprised that honourable senators on the government side are not interested in what I have to say, and to see that the government side of the chamber is leaderless. They will be dissolved shortly, but I am surprised to see that no one feels that they should listen.

Senator Croll: I am interested.

Senator Bélisle: Another major change to Part III of the Labour Code is offered in clause 6 of the bill which provides for the issuance of permits by the Minister of Labour which would allow the averaging of hours worked over two or more weeks. This provision allows for averaging in industries where working hours may be irregular, but requires that permission of the employees involved be given before the permits are issued by the minister, thus protecting the interest of those employees.

I hope that honourable senators have read the statement and comments made last night by Senator Steuart, and that the government will at least recognize his contribution criticizing this bill, to the effect that it is so negative that I hope he will have the courage to stand up and say no to it.

Bill C-8 also offers several changes to Part IV of the Labour Code, that part dealing with the safety of employees. Among the provisions of the bill is an amendment which for the first time will allow employees to refuse to work where there is imminent danger to their safety pending a decision by a safety officer and/or an appeal to the Canada Labour Relations Board, clause 29. Employees are also extended the right to appeal to the Canada Labour Relations Board for reinstatement if they are dismissed for refusing to work in unsafe conditions, clause 34.

Other provisions dealing with Part IV of the Labour Code authorize the Minister of Labour to require the establishment of safety and health committees comprised of both labour and management representatives, clause 30. The minister is also allowed to encourage the voluntary establishment of health and safety committees wherever he feels it appropriate to do so, clause 31.

Part V of the Labour Code deals with industrial relations, and Bill C-8 offers several amendments to this part. One important amendment provides that the Minister of Labour can ask the Canada Labour Relations Board to impose a first agreement in a situation where a newly certified bargaining agent and an employer cannot reach an agreement and the point has been reached where a lawful strike or lockout could occur, clause 63. The bill also provides that the minister can appoint an arbitrator or a chairman of an arbitration board if a dispute arises during the life of a collective agreement and the parties cannot agree on an arbitrator, or have failed to make provision in their agreement for the appointment of an arbitrator, clause 53.

● (1520)

The bill also extends individual rights to members of unions by providing that unions cannot discriminate in referring members to employment, clause 59; and that unions must make financial reports available to their members on request, clause 72.

The bill also provides increased security to unions by providing that an employer cannot discipline a worker who attempts to organize a trade union, clause 66; and that an employer cannot change the conditions of employment while an application for certification by a trade union is pending, or for thirty days after certification is granted, clause 45.

The amendments also offer clarification of the role of the Canada Labour Relations Board in certification procedures, clause 46; and they allow the board to order an end to an unlawful strike or lockout, clause 65, where previously the board could only rule on the legality of such actions.

The bill contains many other provisions, but these are mainly changes to other sections of the Labour Code which are necessitated by the major changes mentioned above, or are changes in wording intended to clarify certain sections of the Labour Code.

In considering Bill C-8, the House of Commons Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration heard testimony from several witnesses concerned with the provisions of the bill. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce expressed their concern over several of the bill's provisions, especially those allowing the imposition of a first collective agreement in a situation where an employer and a newly certified bargaining agent could not reach an agreement. The witnesses felt that this would represent unnecessary government intervention in the bargaining process. But in his second appearance before the committee, the Minister of Labour, accompanied by his deputy minister, pointed out that such a system has been introduced in the jurisdiction of the Province of British Columbia, and that the experience of that province was that the threat of intervention was sufficient to encourage the parties to reach an agreement, and that the actual number of cases in which the imposition of an agreement was necessary was very small.

Concern was also expressed by the Railway Association of Canada, the Canadian Trucking Association and the Canadian Grain Handling Association that the requirement of ministerial permits to allow the averaging of hours worked would impose undue hardship on these industries where employees must often work long hours at peak periods to accommodate the fluctuations in activity which occur in these industries. Again I refer to Senator Steuart's intervention yesterday. The minister said that these provisions would not be harmful to the industries, since a permit would be issued almost automatically by the minister if he were convinced that the employees affected by the averaging were for the most part in agreement with the request for averaging. The minister also stressed the importance of providing protection to those groups of employees who might face averaging of their working hours but who did not wish to have such a system.

The Canadian Labour Council also appeared before the committee and expressed its concern that the imposition of a first agreement would represent a destructive form of government involvement in collective bargaining, delaying the normalization of relations in a newly-organized work place. The CLC also expressed concern that the extension to unorganized workers of many of the rights held by union workers, including job security, additional holidays and longer vacations, would undermine the labour movement in its attempts to extend its umbrella to cover these unorganized workers.

The Minister of Labour responded to these suggestions again by pointing out the experience in British Columbia, where first agreements rarely had to be imposed and expressing the view that, since many of the fringe benefits extended by the bill had become commonplace, it was necessary that the bill extend these benefits to unorganized workers, who have a right to expect certain minimum standards of employment which are in accordance with contemporary social standards.

After its consideration of the bill it was apparent that the committee had achieved all-party agreement in principle to the provisions of the bill, and that it would be necessary to introduce only a few amendments to the bill before third reading in the House of Commons. The government agreed to entertain these amendments in the house and the bill was passed in committee.

One major amendment to the bill was moved on third reading by the honourable member for Nickel Belt, Mr. Rodriguez, to further strengthen the clause allowing the minister to establish health and safety committees by specifically outlining the powers and functions of such committees, and providing that the members of committees be allowed to perform their duties during regular working hours. This amendment specifies the requirements of the health and safety committee so that they are known a priori, and it is not necessary that they be established by order in council as each committee is formed. This amendment, along with another moved by Mr. Rodriguez, including exposure to excess radiation levels as a form of imminent danger under section 82.1(1) of the Labour Code, was passed by Parliament and incorporated in the bill.

The Minister of Labour, Mr. Munro, moved three amendments to the bill on third reading which were intended to clarify provisions aimed at reducing delays in proceedings before the Canada Labour Relations Board, extending to the board the power to enforce a first collective agreement, and guaranteeing the right of union organizers to access to workers in remote locations. These amendments were passed by the house.

The honourable member from Vancouver South, Mr. Fraser, also moved amendments to the bill, outlining the responsibilities of employees to report any threats made which might endanger the health and safety of other employees and the responsibility of employers to take adequate steps to protect their employees from the carrying out of any threats on their health and safety. Both these amendments were accepted by the house.

● (1530)

I believe there are no magic answers to industrial relations in Canada. What we are talking about are human relations. And anyone—labour leader, public spokesman or politician who offers an instant answer or an omniscient remedy for the frailties of human nature is selling the public a pig in a poke.

Following the consideration and acceptance of these amendments by the house, Bill C-8 was read a third time and passed on April 7, 1978.

I am informed that requests have been made by witnesses and organizations to appear before a committee. I feel that the arguments put forward by Senator Steuart yesterday have merit, and that this bill should be referred to the appropriate committee.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: If the sponsor of the bill does not intend to reply now, would he please tell us what he intends to do with regard to referring the bill to the committee?

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, I suggest that the bill be referred to the committee, because I do not intend to reply at this time.

[English]

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, that the bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole later this day.

Senator Laird: I rise to object strenuously to that in view of what has been said by Senator Steuart, to say nothing of what has been said by other senators. There are a number of witnesses wishing to be heard on this matter, and they cannot be heard if this bill is referred to a Committee of the Whole. I feel that they should be heard and that this bill be considered carefully.

I would certainly be willing to agree to its being referred to the appropriate Senate committee, and on reading the Rules of the Senate I find that that would be the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. Clearly, that committee has jurisdiction over labour legislation. As far as I am concerned, I will not consent to this bill's being referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I do not wish to delay this matter, but I believe that this is an important piece of legislation, and that people wishing to be heard on it ought to be given an opportunity to be heard. I agree with my colleague, Senator Laird, in that respect.

These witnesses cannot be heard if the bill is referred to a Committee of the Whole. Therefore, I believe it should be referred to the standing Senate committee that is given responsibility for labour legislation.

Senator Perrault: May I suggest what I believe to be an advantage in the process of attempting to understand the contents of this bill. It has been indicated to me by the Minister of Labour that he would be prepared to attend this chamber this afternoon to explain in detail, with assistance from his deputy, certain provisions of this bill which may be of concern to members of the Senate.

This is a procedure which has served the Senate extremely well in the past. Indeed, the offer was made by the Minister of Labour because he felt the bill represents two years of hearings which were held coast to coast, and because he thinks it is a complicated measure. He indicated to me at noon that, in an attempt to assist members of the Senate understand what the amendments are, he would be most pleased to attend before the Senate to explain the bill.

I urge you to accept this offer. This the kind of co-operative offer from the other place which we should accept. We have done so in the past, and I think it is an inestimable aid in understanding legislation.

Senator Bélisle: May I ask the Leader of the Government why there is a rush to have this legislation passed? Should the witnesses not be informed that the committee will meet this afternoon? I feel the minister should come tomorrow or at a later date. If the bill is to receive royal assent, I feel that it should be in 24 hours so that the witnesses who wish to be heard can be informed. Otherwise, it is just another whitewash.

Senator Perrault: Let me clarify the situation. The minister, of course, has a very full schedule. We have encountered this problem with respect to the Honourable Mr. Danson, the Minister of National Defence, when he indicated to us that he was available at a certain time. We accepted that offer, and it seems to me that, at least in a preliminary manner, we should have an explanation of this bill this afternoon, if such explanation is available from the Minister of Labour. It was not indicated to me whether the minister would be available tomorrow or at a later date.

Honourable senators, I, for one, am most interested in hearing an elucidation of some of the clauses of the bill. I think all honourable senators are equally interested in hearing a detailed exposition of this important measure. I know that the sponsor of the bill supports the view that the minister's presence in this chamber would be most welcome.

I have difficulty in following the suggestion by the Honourable Senator Bélisle that somehow there is merit in going from the particular to the general, rather than the other way around. It seems to me that an exposition of the bill, and a list of the witnesses which have been heard in all the provinces, should be received from the minister. If we are satisfied with that, and if we have further questions to ask of the minister or his officials, then we will have a full opportunity to question in detail any aspect of the bill, or the manner in which the bill has been brought before Parliament.

Senator Flynn: It is quite obvious that the Leader of the Government is using this device to avoid referral of the bill to a standing Senate committee, where those witnesses who have asked to be heard can be heard. I do not mind having the minister come before us to explain the bill further, but on the condition that, after we have heard from the minister, the bill be referred to a standing Senate committee so that we may hear from the witnesses.

I do not think we can tell the witnesses who have been in touch with us that they will not be heard and that the Senate does not care because the Senate considers that they have had a complete hearing in the other place. I don't think this is the kind of impression we should leave with these people. I don't think this is the procedure we should follow. If the device is merely to avoid hearing these witnesses, then I am entirely opposed to it.

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, I have spoken to this bill, and I say to the Leader of the Government that referring it to a Committee of the Whole is not fair even to the senators. At the present time there are two committees sitting, and a while ago this chamber was nearly empty because senators were attending to other duties, so you would bring the senators here without their knowing what is being discussed. I might add that when Senator Steuart spoke yesterday, it was around 6 o'clock, and the chamber was nearly empty. In other words, the minister would come here and give us evasive answers, not having had time to read what I and others who have criticized the bill said. We all know that he is busy, but this is his baby, and if he cannot spend an hour with us tomorrow then as far as I am concerned it is a complete whitewash again.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if there is a time problem involved for honourable senators, it could well be suggested to the honourable minister that he come this evening. However, I do suggest there are limits on the time available for the minister to come and explain this important measure.

I also want to point out to honourable senators, who suggest that somehow there is a restriction on freedom of speech involved in this process, that there have been coast-to-coast hearings held in Canada on this bill by the minister personally and by members of his department. There have been two years of these hearings, and in the other chamber the bill was unanimously supported by the New Democratic Party, the Progressive Conservative Party and the Liberal Party. That is rather remarkable.

Senator Bélisle: But the bill was introduced in 1977. How could they have had two years of hearings?

Senator Perrault: Because there were a great many preliminary activities in connection with the proposed measure. I am suggesting to the honourable senator, who obviously has a detailed knowledge of the bill, and who was his party's prime spokesman on the subject, that he will have no difficulty in posing questions to the minister in the process we have suggested.

I think we should welcome the offer of the minister to come here and to explain these clauses, some of which were referred to by the sponsor and Senator Steuart yesterday. We should accept this offer. This is my view, and I think that generally senators feel this way. We have worked for some considerable time to encourage this process of having the minister to come into this chamber to explain complex legislation. I see nothing but good flowing from this process.

Senator Flynn: Would the Leader of the Government tell us frankly that he wants to avoid referral of the bill to a standing committee. Is that his position? Let him say yes or no.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is not a matter of saying yes or no, but it is a matter of suggesting that after we have heard from the minister many honourable senators may feel it unnecessary to refer this bill to a standing committee. Let us hear from the minister, let us hear what he has to say, and if honourable senators wish to cross-examine the minister on the subject of the witnesses who have been heard and who have not been heard, that is their right and privilege.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I am quite in accord with the idea that the minister should attend, but I do not quite know why we have to go into Committee of the Whole. I do not see why we should not follow rule 18 and invite the minister here to explain any matters in the bill which honourable senators find obscure or hard to understand. I do not see that it calls for the house to go into Committee of the Whole.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the suggestion of the minister—and I find myself in accord with it—is that there is a greater interest outside of merely the committee membership in the details of this particular bill, and the offer was made on the basis that even those senators who are not members of the committee will have a full opportunity to ask questions of the minister. That is the nature of the offer.

On previous occasions, when ministers of the crown have come to this chamber, there has been total agreement that it aided in the understanding of all honourable senators of proposed legislation. I recall, for example, the appearance of Mr. Danson, now the Minister of National Defence, when he came to this chamber to explain housing legislation.

Senator Flynn: We know all about that.

Senator Perrault: Then, senator, if you know all about that you will recall that you were an enthusiastic supporter of the process and found it infinitely important.

Senator Flynn: Why don't you answer the simple question I put to you? Do you want to avoid this bill's being referred to the standing committee? Say yes or no. Is that difficult?

Senator Perrault: Senator, I am not on the witness stand today in a court where you are the prosecuting attorney. I am suggesting that all senators have a right to an understanding of this bill, and it should not be restricted to members of a committee.

Senator Flynn: Well, if I don't get that assurance I won't go for the motion.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, may I ask again why the procedure of having a minister to attend and explain a bill, as outlined in rule 18, is not a perfectly happy compromise in this situation? We are not committed to any later action, but the minister has an opportunity to come and explain the bill.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I would draw Senator Molson's attention to the fact that rule 18 says that the minister may take part in the debate. But the debate is already over on second reading, the bill has received second reading, so there is no debate in which he can participate in the Senate at this time unless we do go into committee.

Senator Cook: Honourable senators, if this means that there are witnesses who want to be heard by a Senate committee, and who will not be heard, then that will be the first time that such a thing has happened in the 14 years that I have been in the Senate, and I will not agree to it.

Senator Côté: Who are these important witnesses who want to be heard?

Senator Flynn: I know of some, but the chairman of the committee has received several letters. I know that representatives of the Canadian Motor Coach Association and the Canadian Bankers Association have asked to be heard. I don't know whether you would call them important. The Canadian Broadcasters Association have also asked to be heard.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators are all aware that almost all of these witnesses have been thoroughly heard in the other place, and have been conferred with from coast-to-coast. I am not suggesting that these witnesses do not have a right to be heard, but we have never assumed in Parliament that there is an automatic right for witnesses to be heard in the other place, and then heard before a Senate committee. The committee has the power to decide whether or not a witness shall be heard, and the right to determine whether or not a brief which has been submitted in the other place is sufficient in terms of providing information to honourable senators here. There is no absolute right to any group in this country to be heard by any committee in either house of Parliament.

Senator Cook: How do we know what they have to say until we hear from them?

Senator Beaubien: Honourable senators, the solution is very simple. Why don't we hear the minister this afternoon, and have the committee meet tomorrow morning?

● (1550)

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, with respect to the point raised by Senator Godfrey, the minister may take part in debate. There could be debate on third reading. In case the honourable senator is not aware of that, I am now advising him. The minister could appear on third reading, after the witnesses have been heard in committee. That would be a very reasonable solution.

Senator Godfrey: May I point out that we could have heard the minister before the motion was passed. That could have been the time to hear him, without the necessity of going into committee.

Senator Phillips: I agree, but was the Senate advised of that before the motion was made?

An Hon. Senator: Question.

Senator Flynn: The question was not put.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in speaking to the proposal by—

Senator Flynn: The question has not been put.

Senator Perrault: I am referring to the points that we have been discussing for the past half hour.

Senator Flynn: I am sorry; I thought you were speaking on the motion.

Senator Perrault: I would suggest that when the minister comes here this afternoon, if honourable senators approve of that course of action, he could be asked if he is prepared to come before the committee to hear the other groups who feel they have not had sufficient time over the past two-year period to state their views.

Senator Phillips: Why does the minister have to be present when the witnesses are there?

Senator Steuart: If the minister comes here, does that necessarily preclude this bill's being sent to a standing committee?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators may have views on procedural matters, but essentially Parliament is the master of its own destiny. I would think that if there is substantial support in the Senate, that course of action may well be open. But I think we should certainly give the minister an opportunity to speak to an important measure affecting the workers of this country, particularly in view of the fact that this measure received the unanimous support of the Conservatives, the NDP members and the Liberals in the other chamber. It is obviously a measure of some importance to all parties.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Marchand, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, that this bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole later this day. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I speak to the motion, if the rules permit? I would say that unless we get an assurance from the Leader of the Government that he will not oppose, directly or indirectly, a motion to refer the bill to a standing committee—unless we get that clear assurance—I shall vote against this motion.

Senator Perrault: Of course, I cannot give that kind of assurance. It is impossible for me to do so—

Senator Flynn: That is fine.

[Senator Godfrey.]

Senator Perrault: —in the context in which the Leader of the Opposition has posed the question.

Senator Steuart: The reason I raise the question is that in one of the representations the charge was made—I believe it was by the Canadian Trucking Association or someone representing it—that after the hearings—and I am aware that they were extensive hearings—there was an amendment introduced concerning a question of retroactivity in the imposition of a first contract by the minister. For my part, I would certainly like to ask the minister if that took place, and, if so, why it took place.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I suggest that could be one of the early questions directed to the minister, if he should come to the chamber this afternoon. That question should be put in the presence of all honourable senators, whether or not they are committee members.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators—

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, before the vote is taken, I should like to check on one point. It seems to me reasonable that if the minister is prepared to come, we should hear him, if it is not against the rules. If honourable senators then decide that they want to have the bill referred to a standing committee—

Senator Flynn: Without the assurance of the Leader of the Government, what you are saying is worth nothing.

Senator Molgat: That is still the choice of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps it is your choice, but it is worth nothing.

Senator Molgat: In my opinion, we should proceed on that basis.

Senator Godfrey: I am not clear in my own mind whether or not it is against the rules. If it is not against the rules, and we can refer the bill to committee, I am prepared to vote. Do we know what the situation is?

Senator Flynn: It is a practical question. I have no objection to the motion if the Leader of the Government will give me the assurance that he will not oppose a motion to refer the bill to a standing committee afterwards, if we feel that that should be done. But he has said that he will not give that assurance.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I appeal to the usually extremely rational Leader of the Opposition to understand the position of the Leader of the Government. The position is that without understanding the reasons which may be given for a referral to committee, how is it possible for me to give a commitment in advance that sufficient grounds exist for referral to a standing committee? I am in entire accord with our distinguished colleague from Manitoba, Senator Molgat, when he states that rational and reasonable people in the Senate may well decide that the answers are simply not there, and we should refer the bill to a standing committee.

Senator Flynn: We have a majority rule dictated by you.

Senator Perrault: If sufficient grounds exist in my view and conscience, then I will certainly support that referral to the standing committee later.

Senator Laird: Could we hear from Senator Molson?

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I cannot see any reason why a motion could not be put later that the bill be referred to a standing committee, if that is the wish of the Senate. I would like to add one word, particularly for the leader. I am a little concerned that this rather complex discussion has taken place with about half our members absent. I do not think that Senator Laird and I are the only two who held the view that those who wished to be heard should be heard. I am a little disturbed that this matter, which has been the cause of a great deal of discussion and some considerable debate, should have arisen at a time when unfortunately we have a number of members doing their duty in committee.

Senator Bélisle: That is what I mentioned.

Senator Molson: You mentioned it, I agree. If there is no position taken, I feel that after hearing the minister the bill could, at the wish of the Senate, be referred to a standing committee. I would be quite prepared to accept that.

Senator Flynn: There is a practical decision to be made, and you and I know very well that it will be made by the leader on the other side. Also, since he has refused to give us his assurance, we can predict what his decision is likely to be.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator should have somewhat more faith in the integrity of his colleagues.

Senator Molson: Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.
And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might have leave to proceed with the motion standing in my name to set up a special committee to study the northern pipeline?

Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Olson: Well, I guess that's the answer.

Senator Langlois: May I say that the Minister of Labour is probably at the door now. We could recess for a moment to await his arrival.

Senator Phillips: Are we not going to proceed with the rest of the Orders of the Day? We have to complete the Orders of the Day.

An Hon. Senator: No, we are going to go into Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk Assistant: Fifth order: Second reading of Bill C-29, intituled: "An Act to amend the Farm Credit Act".—(Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.).

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I move second reading of the bill.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Order No. 5 is for the second reading of Bill C-29, to amend the Farm Credit Act, but I see that the very next item is consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture on the subject matter of Bill C-29. It seems to me that the logical way to proceed would be to deal with the report first so that we might know what conclusions the committee has reached before we dispose of second reading. That seems to me to be the logical course to follow.

Senator Croll: That is far too logical.

Senator Flynn: I completely agree with you, but that may be far too logical for some on your side to understand.

● (1630)

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I have no objection to our proceeding in that manner, if that is the wish of the Senate. The two items are completely intertwined, obviously. My comments on second reading could cover what the committee has done, or we could proceed in the manner that has been proposed by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order No. 5 will stand until later this day.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, on a point of order. The motion has been put. How can it stand until later today? The motion has already been made, and it must either be proceeded with or be withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker: The question has not been put.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate adjourned during pleasure and was put into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, the Honourable Senator Macnaughton, P.C., in the Chair.

Pursuant to rule 18 of the Rules of the Senate, the Honourable John Munro, P.C., Minister of Labour, was escorted to a seat in the Senate Chamber.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-8, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Labour Code."

Shall discussion of the title of the bill be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Clause 1. Shall clause 1 carry?

Senator Macdonald: Mr. Chairman, on clause 1, is there any provision whereby some other day can be substituted for those nine paid holidays?

Hon. Mr. Munro: Yes, there is a provision for that.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 2. Shall clause 2 carry?

[Senator Molgat.]

Senator Macdonald: Who determines, in a marginal case, if a person comes under the classification of manager?

Hon. Mr. Munro: We would make that determination under the act. It would be like any other situation: a person could go to court if he did not like the result of our decision.

The Chairman: Clause 2. Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 3. Shall clause 3 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 4. Shall clause 4 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 5. Shall clause 5 carry?

Senator Macdonald: Would the minister explain clause 5?

Hon. Mr. Munro: That is a provision for the compressed work week. If the parties so desire, there is flexibility for that to be accomplished.

Senator Steuart: Why was this clause felt necessary? I understand this is the clause whereby if an employer wants to average the work week; in one week his employees may have worked the minimum permitted by law, but two weeks later they may work fewer hours and they can average it out. They will now be allowed to do that only by successful application for a permit; is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Munro: I would point out that this clause—we went into this in some detail in the standing committee—does not refer to averaging. It merely outlines the situation where if the parties so desire, that is the usual situation and we can authorize a compressed work week. For instance, they may decide that they want to work, because of the nature of their industry or place of employment, four days at 10 hours a day rather than the normal provision of five days at eight hours a day. This particular section gives them flexibility to permit that. It does not deal with the overall averaging.

Senator Steuart: I understood that it did. Is it not a fact that under the Labour Code they were allowed to compress the work week, but they will now require a permit to do that?

● (1640)

Hon. Mr. Munro: There is nothing in the code now that permits a compressed working week. There were averaging provisions in this bill that were dropped, so the averaging provisions of the previous legislation apply.

Senator Steuart: I should like to clarify the point I was making. Were there not provisions in the code proposed to be amended by this bill allowing for averaging?

Hon. Mr. Munro: Allowing for averaging, yes, but not allowing for a compressed work week. This deals, not with the averaging situation but with the compressed work week; in other words, the forty hours a week was altered within that week to have more hours in a day than the eight.

Senator Steuart: I appreciate that. Can the minister inform me what clause in this bill would deal with the averaging?

Hon. Mr. Munro: Because of representations made, particularly by some members of the western provinces, the clauses in this bill dealing with averaging were dropped, so there are no clauses dealing with averaging in this bill. Representations were made, and as a result of listening to those representations, some of which were on the grounds that the provisions were unduly restrictive, there are now no clauses in this bill dealing with averaging at all.

Senator Olson: Does that mean the provisions that were in the previous legislation, which allow for averaging, seasonal work and that sort of thing, remain applicable?

Hon. Mr. Munro: Precisely.

The Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Senator Godfrey: In view of our previous discussion as to whether this may also be referred to a standing committee later, why are we carrying each clause at the present time? Can we not defer a vote on each clause until the end of the discussion and then, in light of whether or not we refer the bill to a standing committee, decide whether we will pass each individual clause? The standing committee itself might come to some other conclusion. Why do we have to vote on each clause at this time? We do not yet know whether or not it will go to a standing committee.

The Chairman: Your suggestion is a very interesting one, Senator Godfrey, but the procedure, I think since 1867, has been to do it this way, so I am a little hesitant about changing it at this stage.

Senator Godfrey: Except that we did have a discussion on whether technically there was going to be any difficulty, if we went into Committee of the Whole, in having the whole thing reconsidered by the standing committee. I can see some technical difficulties if we have already passed each clause. Often committees defer voting on individual clauses, after they have been considered, until the end of the committee hearing. It is not necessary to follow this procedure.

Senator Marchand: If we agree on each clause I do not know why we should refer it to a committee.

Senator Godfrey: That is exactly the point I am trying to make. If we agree on every clause now we may block the opportunity of sending it to a standing committee later.

Senator Marchand: We do not send bills to committees just for the sake of sending them to committees.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I suggest that we proceed and see how far we get and how fast we can do it. I am sure we will then make good time. Shall clause 5 carry?

Senator Godfrey: No.

Senator Steuart: I should like to ask a general question on the answer the minister gave on clause 5. He said he received representations from western Canada and as a result of those representations the idea of averaging was dropped. Could he tell us who made those representations, who they were from?

Hon. Mr. Munro: I can check on that. In this bill we had a much more restrictive type of application of the averaging principle, so we dropped that more restrictive averaging principle. The more flexible one in the previous legislation will now apply. According to my recollection, much of the opposition to the more restrictive averaging had to do with the grain industry. We listened to those representations and dropped the more restrictive type of averaging provisions in this bill. If the honourable senator wishes to know precisely who were the organizations and individuals that made those representations, if he would be kind enough to give me a little time I will get him that information.

Senator Argue: I should like to ask a question along the lines of the one asked by Senator Steuart, merely for my own clarification. Am I right in thinking that, since the provisions you have referred to are not in this bill, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool on the prairies, for example, which runs a large elevator system, can continue in the future the practice it has been using for many years, so that when farmers are out combining around the clock trying to get their grain under cover, the elevator agents, the managers, call them what you like, can operate, let us say, a 16-hour day for six days a week or seven days a week, as many of them do, without any penalty and without any interference from the federal government, and the employees can be given time off in the winter, when they have weeks and weeks and weeks of time off in any case?

Hon. Mr. Munro: The answer is yes.

Senator Bélisle: I should like to ask a question of the minister, in view of his answers to Senators Steuart and Argue. I did not have time to read the three versions of the bill, but my information was that it is still under permit. According to what I heard the minister say a while ago, you will not need a permit. Was that provision dropped by means of one of the three amendments you introduced on third reading?

Hon. Mr. Munro: Under the previous act, which has been in force since 1972, incorporating the most recent amendments, you always needed a permit for averaging. By and large we have granted those permits, and there has not been a great deal of difficulty with respect to them. We have always had the permit provision.

Senator Bélisle: In other words, the averaging clause will still continue, even though you said a while ago that it has been dropped?

Hon. Mr. Munro: No, no. I said that under this bill amending the Labour Code there were averaging provisions that were perceived by many, particularly in western Canada, as being too restrictive, that did not allow the flexibility of the previous provisions of the code. We listened to those representations and dropped all the clauses in this bill dealing with averaging. They were perceived to be too restrictive, and we agreed. Therefore, the provisions that have been in force for some years will remain in force. They are not being changed; they are not being amended by this bill.

Senator Bélisle: In other words, it was one of the three amendments that you brought in on third reading. Or was it?

Hon. Mr. Munro: All the amendments that were in this bill prior to our dropping them have now been totally taken out of the bill.

Senator Bélisle: Prior to the last addition or after?

Hon. Mr. Munro: I do not know at what stage. This bill got first reading about a year and a half ago. As a result of representations and of the hearings before the standing committee, and as a result of my officials and myself going around and talking to people, we have made changes. I can give you the precise date on which we dropped the provisions with respect to averaging, if you wish. The fact of the matter is that we did drop them.

● (1650)

Senator Bélisle: Do you recall one out of the three which were dropped on third reading? My information is that they were not dropped on third reading, but I could be wrong.

Hon. Mr. Munro: My deputy minister reminds me that it is not before the Senate because we dropped the clause as a result of what took place before the Commons committee. Perhaps you are reading an old version of the bill, because it is not in this particular bill at this time.

Senator Bélisle: What is the date on the bill passed by the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. Munro: April 7, 1978. I do not see any provision in this bill dealing with averaging.

Senator Steuart: Clause 5 of the bill I have in front of me reads:

The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 29 thereof, the following section: "29.1(1)—

That appears on page 2 and continues on page 3. If you read that you will see that it talks about the work week. At the top of page 3 it reads:

—if the average hours of work for a period of two or more weeks calculated in the manner prescribed in the permit do not exceed forty hours a week, and an employer may cause or permit an employee to work longer hours than eight hours in any day or forty hours in any week in accordance with any permit issued hereunder.

It goes on to talk about the permit. Clause 5 of the bill proposes a new section 29.1(1), which provides:

Subject to this section, the Minister may issue a permit subject to such conditions as he deems advisable establishing hours of work in excess of eight hours in any day or forty hours in any week for a class of employees specified therein employed upon or in connection with the operation of any industrial establishment specified therein in accordance with arrangements specified in the permit including the hours of work for each day—

If that is not talking about averaging, what is it talking about?

[Hon. Mr. Munro.]

Hon. Mr. Munro: May I make it quite clear that in the averaging provisions the old code talked about averaging over far more than a two-week period. It talked about averaging, indeed, over a 13-week period. All those provisions still apply. They are in the present code; they are not being changed. These clauses do not deal with the averaging provisions over a protracted period of time, but, as one honourable senator mentioned, over a season. That is already in the code.

This clause talks about a compressed work week situation over a two-week period. We did not restrict it to a week. This would be the situation where the union and the employer wished, because of the manner of their operation, to have a compressed work week of 38 hours within a four-day week instead of 40 hours within a five-day week. This would cause them to fall short. During the next week they would work 42 hours within a four-day period to pick this up. In the common parlance we kick about in the department, that is called a compressed work week situation. This permits us to go along with the parties themselves. The managers and the unions would collectively come together and tell us that this is the best manner in which to proceed for their particular industry. That is all that clause 5 deals with.

The averaging provisions which we consider to be something quite different from this two-week situation, over a protracted period of time, still apply, as they have for some considerable period of time.

I might point out to the honourable senator that, by inserting this provision and permitting the compressed work situation, we want to avoid the necessity of overtime being paid for hours in excess of eight hours, provided they do not exceed 40 hours a week. This provision permits that. If both parties agreed to work the 40 hours in four days, the employer would not have to pay overtime for the two hours over the eight hours in a particular day.

Senator Bélisle: I have read the bill, and nowhere have I read that clause 5 was annulled or made void by another clause. Can you tell me what other clause annulled or voided clause 5, in order that they would not need a permit? Is that clear?

Hon. Mr. Munro: Let me explain it this way—I could get the former bill for you, senator. In that bill you would see that clause 5 had two parts. One part of clause 5 dealt with the compressed work week situation, which honourable senators can see in this bill before them now.

There was another part to clause 5 which dealt with averaging, which was of a more restrictive nature than the averaging we permit now. All of that part of clause 5 has been dropped. So, all that is left of clause 5 now are the parts you see at the bottom of page 2, on page 3, and on the top of page 4. These deal solely with the compressed work week situation, and not all with averaging.

The averaging part of clause 5 was dropped at the committee stage, and when any amendments or deletions are made a new bill is printed, and this is the new bill you have in front of you now.

The Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Senator Macdonald: Just a moment. I see on page 3 that if an industry is unionized, and if they apply to the minister for a permit, it must be a joint application by the union and the employer; is that right?

Hon. Mr. Munro: Yes.

Senator Macdonald: Subclause (3) deals with the situation where they are not unionized, and where the employer requires 80 per cent of the employees. How do you determine the 80 per cent? Is there a vote or a secret ballot held?

Hon. Mr. Munro: We do not go into all the regulations in the bill. If we did, the bill, I am sure you will agree, would be much more complex than it is.

Officials of the Department of Labour talk to the employees and, in an unorganized situation, the employer. They come to the conclusion that this type of situation is the reality—namely, 80 per cent. They so advise me and I would approve it. If there is a complaint from some employees that it was not 80 per cent, we would have a further investigation.

Senator Steuart: I wonder if the minister could tell me why this clause is necessary if, in fact, they could average the work week before over a period of 13 weeks, as I think he said, when now, if I understood what he said, in just a two-week period they have to get this fairly cumbersome permit. At least, it appears to be cumbersome. Why is it necessary?

Hon. Mr. Munro: I appreciate the fact that honourable senators do not have the earlier version of the bill before them, but in it those averaging provisions were much more than simply talking about a compressed work week situation of one or two weeks. They were averaging over a protracted period of time, and the very wording of those averaging provisions did not permit or allow the minister or the government to give the permission even when the parties themselves wanted the compressed work week. The provisions permitted averaging over a protracted period of time per season, but they did not permit, and our legal officers so advised us, a compressed work week situation. We were, therefore, in the invidious position—the minister and the department—of having to refuse permission even when the parties themselves wanted a compressed work week situation; even when in respect of both employers and employees it was in their best interests and we could see no objection to it. We still could not permit it. We thought that situation should be corrected and this clause corrects that situation.

Senator Steuart: I understand this situation could go on in a company for a long period of time. The permit could be issued and be in force for, say, a year or longer.

Hon. Mr. Munro: I think it could be permanent, or at least until either the employees or the employer had a change of mind and so indicated.

Senator Bélisle: Is it not true that a report must be made to the Department of Labour periodically, and the minister must be satisfied that this is not the normal practice? Am I right?

Hon. Mr. Munro: Yes. If one of our officers reported that it was a completely unrealistic situation and was to the detriment of the employees in terms of fatigue and so on, if there was a somewhat outlandish situation, I would be under no obligation to approve it. But I think in the normal situation we would be talking about a union and an employer, and you can normally assume that the union, by agreeing with the employer in this situation, has the best interests of its employees at heart. I do not see the situation occurring very often, where we would deny the application for a compressed work week where both the employer and the employees agree to it.

Senator Bélisle: If I may ask a supplementary question? Knowing that the inspectors from the Department of Labour are as human as the next person, including senators, is it not possible that, when you have to have an agreement in principle between the employer and the union, if the inspector or the officer, whatever name he bears, does not like one or other of the parties, either the union or the employer, he could make sure that they had to make a new request every week? Surely that would involve an enormous amount of red tape.

Hon. Mr. Munro: Well, no. I would think if the employers and the employees agreed in a given situation that they wanted a compressed work week, and then, because of some bias, our officer filed a report that would steer the minister contrary to the agreement which both parties had reached, and the minister listened to that advice, it would not be long before the employer and employees would be on his doorstep, thus necessitating a most thorough investigation as to why the wishes of both of the parties in the work place, one of which is organized to protect its employees, should be frustrated. I think that bias would be quite clearly identified.

I have been Minister of Labour for many years, and it has never been my experience that we have had any officers going around trying to frustrate the wishes of both parties when they agree to something.

Senator Bélisle: Surely, the Minister of Labour is aware of the problem that occurred in the City Hall, Toronto.

Hon. Mr. Munro: Frankly, senator, I am not.

Senator Bélisle: Okay.

Senator Sparrow: Mr. Minister, in answer to Senator Argue's question pertaining to elevator agents, are you suggesting that they do not have to ask for a permit at all; that they do not come under the act in that particular case?

Hon. Mr. Munro: Honourable senators, as I stated in the House of Commons, there is power under the old act, which still exists because we have not changed it by this bill, to exempt certain categories of employers and employees from any necessity to apply to the minister's department for permission to average at all. Up to now we have granted that exemption in the country grain elevator situation. We have granted that exemption. We have listened to the parties.

As you may know, the Minister of Labour has authority to set up industrial commissions of inquiry. We had the Gunn Commission of Inquiry. We have had other investigations into the situation, trying to resolve the question as in the country elevator situation.

By and large, with respect to all of the recommendations that I have received, and to my knowledge those which my predecessor received, as far as I am concerned we should leave it to the parties themselves to work out a satisfactory regime before we, as a government under the powers in the code, come in and impose a regime which may be totally unsatisfactory to the industry. So far the parties have been unable to come up with an agreement as to a satisfactory regime, and that being the case I have continued to grant them entire exemption from averaging. That is true even with respect to the averaging under the previous code.

I have granted that exemption, and I have indicated in the House of Commons that I was prepared to grant a further exemption of six months. This again was in response to various representations made to me by members of the government party and of the opposition party mainly from the west who wished this flexibility in terms of exemption to be granted.

My having indicated that I was prepared to see if they could use the further opportunity to arrive at a regime that was satisfactory resulted in this bill's receiving unanimous approval from all parties in the House of Commons. It received unanimous approval because that was one of the main obstacles to approval by certainly some of the opposition members, and they, being satisfied on that question, supported the bill.

Senator Sparrow: For clarification, what was the relevance of the six months? Is it that they can wait six months until they get their house in order? Is that what you are suggesting?

And while you are answering that question, can you tell me if that is the same problem that the members of the Canadian Broadcasting Association were concerned about, and, if so, how does it affect them?

Hon. Mr. Munro: I have never been impressed in any way with any applications of any kind coming from the Canadian Broadcasting Association with respect to averaging. Certainly, the main situation with respect to averaging has come in the country elevator situation. We granted a total exemption from averaging in that situation until the first of August of this year in order that the parties may try to work out a regime. It being apparent that there would not be sufficient time, that they did not have ample opportunity to do it, I have indicated that I am prepared to grant a further exemption of six months so that the parties can work out their own regime without its being arbitrarily imposed in any way by the government. That is the grain handlers' situation.

If you care to give me an example of a Canadian Broadcasters' brief, in which they are complaining about unfair application of the averaging under the present code, I would be prepared to look at that, but neither I nor my officials at this moment know anything more than that. In any event, I would be surprised if there are any submissions from anybody with respect to the averaging provisions of this bill. They would be outdated, because we listened to many of the suggestions in many of the briefs. They complained about the averaging provision in this bill, and as a result we have dropped it. So I would think that if some honourable senators have briefs before them complaining about the averaging provisions, I would say it is one of those occasions when we listened to the submissions and dropped the provisions. So if there are any references in the briefs to averaging, I suggest that they have been accommodated.

● (1710)

The Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

Senator Molgat: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, since we are going through the bill, whether the minister could indicate to us those changes made in the very last stages in the House of Commons, because I have received a telegram which reads as follows:

Due to amendments made to Bill C-8 on third reading in the House of Commons, we request an early opportunity to appear before a committee of the Senate to discuss the serious implications of these changes.

This is from Mr. Stevens, the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

I wonder if the minister in the process of going through the bill could outline which clauses have been changed and reply at this stage at least to the serious implications seen by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

Hon. Mr. Munro: If honourable senators are agreeable, as the chairman calls each clause I will indicate, as I have indicated in clause 5, just what changes have been made—it was a deletion in that case—and other changes as they come along.

The Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause No. 6?

Senator Macdonald: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might put a question to the minister relating to clause 6. I think this would probably refer to clause 7 on page 4, and refers to the case of stevedores working for the Canadian National Railways. Will one permit do for them to work more than the 48 hours—that is, for overtime? Let us say a man worked 48 hours a week and then he was able to work overtime again over the weekend—and he might work 50 hours. Would a permit be required, and would such a permit apply only for a certain period of time or for a considerable period of time?

Hon. Mr. Munro: There are so many variations in these clauses. Now that we have talked about the principle, senator, clauses 6, 7, 8 and 9 are purely technical, permitting us to authorize any number of variants, and I would point out clause 6, line 13, dealing with regulations made pursuant to section 32.1. These are housekeeping measures that permit us to give permits in all those situations where the parties agree, if it is a compressed work week situation; and if it is an averaging situation it also permits us to do so, although this clause obviously does not apply to averaging. But there is a similar clause in the old bill that we have not changed. If you have a particular situation in stevedoring that you are talking about, and if you care to give it to me, I am sure I can give you a fairly quick answer.

Senator Macdonald: I am referring to stevedoring at the port of North Sydney where there is considerable traffic at times between the port of North Sydney and Port aux Basques, and at certain times you might get a rush. There are times when that does not work very well. For example, at the present time the seamen working on these ferries obviously cannot work eight hours and stop somewhere in the middle, so they have some kind of arrangement whereby they are working for two weeks on and then two weeks off. I am wondering if some similar arrangement could be made to take care of stevedoring in the busy season.

Hon. Mr. Munro: My deputy advises me that under the old act we have a special regulation which we passed to take care of the ferry situation. This applies in the situation you mention, and as a result of that there has been no problem.

Senator Macdonald: I know there is no problem there, but I can see that there might be some problem so far as stevedoring is concerned. Is there any limit on the amount of overtime they can put in without getting a permit?

Hon. Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman, in terms of the old act we have never had a problem in the stevedoring situation, and I can only judge from that that the flexibility that we have injected with respect to averaging in the old act has taken care of the situation adequately. There have been no complaints of any kind.

Senator Macdonald: Well, I am hoping there won't be any difficulties under this one.

The Chairman: Clause 6?

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I am sorry to keep harping back on this but there are a couple of points in this bill that bother me. I thought that I had this point of averaging cleared up as far as the grain elevators are concerned, but as a result of the subsequent answer given to Senator Sparrow I am not sure now.

My understanding from my first question to you and your answer to me was that previous to this amendment, employees of the western elevators could work longer, and then have time off when things were quieter. So they could average, and they liked that situation. You said to me, as I understood you, that you were going to restrict that and tighten up on it, but due to representations from western Canada, perhaps from MPs or from the grain industry, you dropped that so that now under the Labour Code they can average the way they used to. But it appeared to me that you then said to Senator Sparrow, who asked a similar type of question, that what in fact they had received was a reprieve for six months—that they could carry on in the way they have done in the past for six months, and when that runs out they would have to make some further representations or hope for another amendment.

Hon. Mr. Munro: There is nothing in this bill to deal with the averaging situation at all. That is the first point. The second point is that we did not provide for even the averaging provisions that would normally be applicable in the country elevator situation—namely, the averaging over a protracted period of time that we wished to apply in the western elevator situation—as a result of hearing representations from the parties. We indicated we would like to provide for them at some future time, but until an adequate regime could be worked out I would use the authority given to me under the old act to grant exemptions. So those averaging provisions never did apply. They still do not apply because the exemption is still in effect and, as I have indicated, I am prepared to go along with the exemption for a further period of six months.

Senator Steuart: Do you mean that in the past they have always been at the whim of the minister, and at any time the minister could have said by ministerial order “Those averaging provisions are out”? But you have now said, “I will give you a further six months and that is all I will guarantee you.”

Hon. Mr. Munro: That never applied under the old act to the western elevator situation because the parties put up cases at various times that even the old provisions were too restrictive in their particular situation, let alone the provisions that were in this bill that have since been dropped. So we have given an exemption even under the old provisions until the parties have worked out an acceptable solution.

Senator Steuart: So what you are saying is you are giving them six months or some such time to work out an acceptable solution. Your philosophy behind that answer is that if they can find something better in the old Labour Code suitable to both parties, you are prepared to consider it?

• (1720)

Hon. Mr. Munro: Precisely.

Senator Argue: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might make a comment. I appreciate what the minister has said. The government has impressed upon Canadians—and I believe rightly—that they should try to have as much efficiency in industry as possible. If we relate that to the elevator industry on the prairies, that is an efficient operation. During harvest time it is important to protect the crop coming in from the fields, and elevator agents will work almost to exhaustion, as indeed do the farmers. They work long hours in keeping the elevators open. It is an efficient operation. For instance, we have two elevator agents, two managers, in our local elevator, which is a new one. It is also an efficient one. Those two fellows work a great deal of overtime during the harvest time. During the winter they are out skidooing during the working hours, or they may be out on the traplines. They are having fun. They do not have work to do at that time. However, I still think it is an efficient way of operating. They work very long hours during the harvest period, and, in the wintertime, when there is nothing for them to do, they are not required to stay at their desk in the elevator for the whole of the eight-hour day. My plea to the minister is that he be more generous and extend the period of six months. I would suggest that he not cut it off at that time.

Hon. Mr. Munro: With respect, that representation is in respect to a bill that is not before us.

Senator Argue: I understand that.

Hon. Mr. Munro: The bill before us does not deal with averaging. However, I appreciate the honourable senator's comments.

Senator Sparrow: Mr. Chairman, the following was included in the presentation to the House of Commons committee by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters. Referring to "averaging" of hours of work, they said:

"Averaging" of Hours of Work, Clauses 4-6 of Bill C-8.

Sub-section 29(2) of the Canada Labour Code currently provides for the averaging of hours of work by any employer where the nature of the work in his establishment "necessitates irregular distribution of an employee's hours of work". The new provision to the Code (Clause 6—Section 29.1) will permit the same type of averaging as is allowed now (sub-section 29(2)) but under the proposed amendment, it will be necessary for the employer to make application for a permit authorizing an averaging program.

Is that true or false?

Hon. Mr. Munro: It was presentations such as that, submitted with observations such as that, which caused us to drop that portion of the bill. We listened to their complaints, and we did what they wanted. That section is no longer in the bill.

Senator Bélisle: Mr. Chairman, I have only one more question. I raised many questions this afternoon. I hope the minister will read the speech that I made this afternoon, and at a later date will give me an answer. Workers will no longer be dismissed because of pregnancy. That protection had previously been offered only to workers with more than 12 months' employment, and employees can no longer be dismissed for absence due to illness once they have been employed for three months, provided their absence is for a period of less than 12 weeks.

Let us say that an employee becomes pregnant in approximately the third month of employment. Who will assess the cost of her salary when she is not working?

Hon. Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman, shall I deal with that now? It is not related to this clause.

The Chairman: The minister may use his best judgment.

Hon. Mr. Munro: All that the clause provides is that a person cannot be dismissed solely on the basis of pregnancy.

Senator Bélisle: There are many Canadians who are on seasonal employment.

Hon. Mr. Munro: A person involved in seasonal employment has a contract of employment. He may work for a tobacco farm or anywhere else. There is a stated term of employment. When the work is done, the person is laid off. That situation continues. All I am saying is that a person cannot be laid off simply because she is pregnant and the contract of employment is still continuing. Her pregnancy does not change the contract of employment. This clause protects a woman from being laid off solely because she is pregnant. She may, of course, be laid off for other reasons. Perhaps the work might be finished, and so on. That situation carries on.

Senator Bélisle: Forty-eight per cent of Canada's labour force is not unionized. Seasonal employment is sometimes very short. In other words, the minister will not assess her payments to, perhaps, the farmer, or the apple grower, and so on—

Hon. Mr. Munro: All I am saying is that if the work is finished and there are no more apples to be picked, she may be laid off. That applies to any seasonal job. But she cannot be laid off simply because she is pregnant. There is no cost to the employer, that I can see. It is merely basic protection.

Senator Bélisle: It is not too explicit. She may not have a contract of employment—

Hon. Mr. Munro: All the bill says is that the employee cannot be blamed simply because she is pregnant.

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 7. Shall clause 7 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 8. Shall clause 8 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 9. Shall clause 9 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 10. Shall clause 10 carry?

Senator Bosa: Mr. Chairman, may I congratulate the minister. He looks very comfortable on the front benches of this chamber. If he decides to come here on a permanent basis, when he has had enough of the other place, we shall welcome him with open arms. Having said that, I should like to ask a question relating to clause 10 which defines "vacation pay" as follows:

● (1730)

"vacation pay" means four per cent or, after six succeeding years of employment by one employer, six per cent of the wages of an employee during the year of employment in respect of which he is entitled to the vacation.

What happens after he has served ten years with one employer, that employer goes bankrupt and the employee then starts afresh with another company? Does he have to serve six years before he is entitled to the same benefits? Does his seniority disappear?

Hon. Mr. Munro: If he changes his employer and starts over again, there is no successor clause here if the employer goes bankrupt. If you turn to section 45 of the existing act—not this bill, because we have not changed anything—you will see it reads:

Where any particular federal work, undertaking or business in which an employee is employed is, by sale, lease, merger or otherwise, transferred from one employer to another employer, the employment of the employee by the two employers before and after the transfer of the work, undertaking or business shall, for the purposes of this Division, be deemed to be continuous with one employer, notwithstanding the transfer.

This would cover the bankrupt situation, or the successor. If the new employer came in and took over from the bankrupt, the employee would not be prejudiced in terms of any lost years. However, if the business went bankrupt and was no longer in existence, or if it was just wound up, the employee would have to go to a new employer and start all over again, just like anybody else. You cannot have a successor provision for a nonentity.

Senator Bosa: But the seniority of the employee is still valid.

Hon. Mr. Munro: There is nothing for it to be valid against.

The Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 11. Shall clause 11 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 12.

Senator Molson: I am not quite clear on clause 12. On page 7, at lines 3, 4 and 5, we read:

—at least three weeks with vacation pay in respect of every year of employment by that employer.

Is that three weeks with pay in respect of every year? I find the wording of that a little obscure. I understand it means three weeks' holiday with pay, but I do not understand why it should be three weeks' holiday with pay in respect of every year of employment, which adds up to eighteen weeks, by my calculation.

Hon. Mr. Munro: You are right, it is three weeks with pay. That wording has been in the act for a long time.

Senator Molson: That does not make it right.

Hon. Mr. Munro: It may not make it right, but we have never had any difficulty with it. I am prepared to take your point up with the legal draftsmen.

Senator Flynn: This was raised previously.

Senator Molson: Does it mean what it says or does it say what it means? To me it presents a problem. If I am right, I would say that after six years with one employer an employee was entitled to three weeks with pay for every year of those six years.

Senator Flynn: After twenty years he would be on vacation all year round.

Hon. Mr. Munro: It says "in respect of every year", and I am told the courts have taken that to mean every year; he gets three weeks holiday every year.

Senator Everett: Is there any precedent for that?

Senator Molson: Three weeks for every year after six consecutive years is eighteen weeks.

Senator Marchand: Each year he is entitled to three weeks, that is all. They are not added.

Senator Molson: My only contention is that it is not in respect of every year; it is in every year.

Senator Marchand: Read the French version and you will see that it is very clear.

Senator Molson: It does not read right to me.

The Chairman: Shall clause 12 carry?

Senator Molson: No.

Senator Everett: The minister made the point that there are some court decisions that have interpreted along those lines.

Hon. Mr. Munro: Yes.

Senator Everett: Could he give me the citation?

Hon. Mr. Munro: I cannot give the citation. What I said was that the courts have never found any problem; that was all I was saying in my reference to the courts. The words "in respect of every year" are to ensure that in each succeeding year you do not add another three weeks. The legal draftsmen feel this is accomplished by keeping it to three weeks in every year rather than a compilation of the weeks for each year.

Senator Goldenberg: I think it is quite clear if you read the French version. It is quite clear to me.

Senator Molson: I will accept that, but then let us correct the English version.

Senator Everett: The minister spoke of some cases and I am interested in whether the minister is telling us about cases that exist or whether he is just telling us his deputy's view of the law, which comes from something other than a court.

Hon. Mr. Munro: I can get a list of prosecutions by the Department of Labour against people we felt had contravened this section. We will try to get the list of prosecutions if you like, and a list of convictions we have obtained for contravention of this section.

Senator Everett: Even if the French version is clear, as Senator Goldenberg says, I have to agree with Senator Molson that the English version is not clear. It would be interesting to have a list of your prosecutions. The point is: Did the courts deal with those words "every year" and did the courts make an interpretation of "every year" as meaning only one year, three weeks per year?

Hon. Mr. Munro: There have been many prosecutions under this section as it is worded, and there have been successful prosecutions, which means that the courts did not have any trouble in interpreting the section. The employers subject to those prosecutions had to pay the employees where it was proved that they did not pay the vacation pay. That being the case, the department having been successful in prosecutions for contravention of the section worded this way, it is probably one of the inducements on our part not to change the wording, since the courts found it valid and a sound basis for prosecution. I have already offered to get for the honourable senator a record of the prosecutions, if we can. We could do it this evening, if you like.

Senator Marchand: If I understand correctly, there was never any prosecution in order to interpret whether this means three weeks per year or three weeks which are added each year of employment. It was not on that that the prosecutions took place. It is not interpreted.

Senator Everett: That is the point, that there is no legal interpretation because it has never been asked for.

Hon. Mr. Munro: I am just assuming that if you launch a prosecution under a particular section, the wording of which is not clear, most defence attorneys are quite capable of getting an acquittal on that basis.

The Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Senator Everett: We will be with you in a minute, Mr. Chairman. I do not think that really is a valid legal opinion. I do not believe, because a court does not rule on something, that that constitutes a legal opinion. As Senator Marchand has said, there has been no interpretation of those words by the courts.

● (1740)

Hon. Mr. Munro: Perhaps I could obtain a further opinion from the draftsmen in the Department of Justice. If honourable senators feel that this would accomplish something, I am prepared to do it.

Senator Flynn: If you look at clause 10 you will see the definition of "vacation pay." It is clear, when you adjust it, that three weeks' vacation means three weeks in one year. I think the intent is clear in the definition of "vacation pay" in the French version.

Senator Molson: I do not see why we could not translate the French version into English.

Senator Flynn: We can, but it is not always easy to do.

The Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

Senator Langlois: I move that the committee rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again.

The Chairman: It is moved by Senator Langlois, seconded by Senator McIlraith, that the committee rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: The sitting is resumed.

Senator Macnaughton: Madam Speaker, the committee to which was referred Bill C-8, to amend the Canada Labour

[Hon. Mr. Munro.]

Code, has taken the said bill into consideration, has made some progress thereon, and asks leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Senator Langlois: At 8.30 p.m. this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, that the committee have leave to sit again at 8.30 p.m. this day. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate adjourned during pleasure and was put into Committee of the Whole to further consider Bill C-8, to amend the Canada Labour Code, the Honourable Senator Bourget, P.C., in the Chair.

Pursuant to rule 18 of the Rules of the Senate, the Honourable John Munro, P.C., Minister of Labour, was escorted to a seat in the Senate Chamber.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is sitting in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-8, intituled "An Act to amend the Canada Labour Code." We are now dealing with clause 12. Does clause 12 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 13. Shall clause 13 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 14. Shall clause 14 carry?

Senator Macdonald: Clause 14 says:

(2) Except as otherwise provided by this Division, when New Year's Day, Dominion Day, Remembrance Day, Christmas Day or Boxing Day falls on a Sunday or Saturday that is a non-working day, the employee is entitled to and shall be granted a holiday with pay on the working day immediately preceding or following the general holiday.

If an employee has to work on one of the paid holidays, is it compulsory that he must take his holiday on the day before or after that general holiday? I take it from the act that there is no discretion.

Hon. Mr. Munro: All that the clause says is that if one of the holidays enumerated here falls on a non-working day, the employee is still entitled to a holiday on the day before or after. I believe the honourable senator is asking whether an employee, if he works on a day enumerated here, gets an additional day either before or after. That type of substitution is provided in the original code. There is no change. That is why you do not see that section in the bill.

The Chairman: Shall clause 14 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 15 carry?

Senator Everett: On clause 15, I wonder why it is confined to a collective agreement. What about a company that gives nine holidays a year, but is not covered by collective agreement? Are they provided for in some other clause?

Senator Langlois: Do you mean under provincial legislation such as we have in Quebec?

Senator Everett: No, I am referring to clause 15, dealing with section 50. It says that section 49 does not apply where there is a collective agreement, which gives the employee nine paid holidays.

Hon. Mr. Munro: Perhaps it would be best—and it would only take me a minute—to give some sense of the design of the bill by pointing out that clauses 1 to 27 deal with Part III of the old Labour Code, which deals with the upgrading of standards. Clauses 1 to 27 deal with workers' standards, and that is what we are dealing with now. The safety clauses, which are Part IV of the code that this amends, are covered under clauses 28 to 34. Then the industrial relations clauses go from clause 35 on, and this is Part V of the code. These are mainly clauses pertaining to the Canada Labour Relations Board to make it more efficient, with additional members, interim certification and so on.

Returning to your question, senator, dealing with this clause that falls under standards, we tried to provide in Part III of the Labour Code that this amends minimum standards for workers. They are minimal, if you compare them to most of the standards that workers have won for themselves under collective agreements across Canada. We assume that if there is a collective agreement they will at least have the minimum standards that we are providing here. In other words, that is why we make an exception here if there is a collective agreement.

Senator Marchand: It is so as not to give them two recourses—one under the law and one under the agreement.

Hon. Mr. Munro: That is right, and it does avoid the two recourses—one under the collective agreement and one under the law. The reality of the situation is that you do not have to worry about the two recourses in this sense, that these minimum standards are very minimal as compared to what every collective agreement in the country provides. You do not have to worry about that.

The Chairman: Shall clause 15 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 16 carry?

Senator Macdonald: With regard to clause 16, I notice that if the collective agreement provides for nine paid holidays, then the employer has the right to designate one of those paid holidays in lieu of the nine set out. I notice that it is just the employer that has the right to make this designation. In other words, the union has no say in that. Am I correct?

Hon. Mr. Munro: Again, to avoid difficulties with collection agreements, we give this right to the employer to designate what the day is so that it would not cause any trouble with the existing collective agreement they would be operating under. It is a transitional provision.

The Chairman: Shall clause 16 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 17 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 18 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 19 carry?

● (2040)

Senator Everett: Could the minister tell me what the conditions are for granting leave to a pregnant employee?

Hon. Mr. Munro: She must have worked for twelve months with the employer.

The Chairman: Shall clause 19 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 20 carry?

Senator Flynn: I was wondering whether this clause is really necessary. I understand that, generally speaking, the employer uses discretion, taking the circumstances into account. Why it should be necessary to require bereavement leave is surprising to me.

Hon. Mr. Munro: This is again something we perceived as a required minimum standard. We are aware of situations in which this type of leave has not been given.

Senator Flynn: Do you not think when you are specifying the minimum standards you are at the same time specifying the maximum standard?

Hon. Mr. Munro: No, I do not believe so. In most collective agreements there is provision over and above this. There are complaints—thank goodness, not too frequently—that come into the Department of Labour from people who work for one of those employers who can be very harsh indeed. There is no protection in the code in even a minimum way providing protection in an area such as this. It happens very infrequently that this type of provision is needed, but this clause enables us to deal with it where it is.

Senator Flynn: You are not afraid of counter effects?

Hon. Mr. Munro: No.

The Chairman: Shall clause 20 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 21 carry?

Senator Roblin: I have not had the advantage of following this bill through its various stages in the legislative process, so it may be that I will speak to a point that has already been clarified, or perhaps I do not understand this as well as I might. However, there are a number of interesting items in this clause to which I wish to refer.

I am looking at the portion that covers unjust dismissal. What has attracted my attention is the procedure that is followed. I think it is wise that we should have some method of ventilating any question in dispute with respect to unjust dismissal. I see a complaint is made in a report to an inspector by the employee, and if the inspector is able to settle the matter to everyone's satisfaction that will end the matter.

Senator Côté: Where is this?

Senator Roblin: This is Division V.7, "Unjust Dismissal", section 61.5(6). If I read it right, the inspector may settle the matter, or at any rate his decision may be final. However, there is a further provision that the minister may provide an appeal to somebody who is called an adjudicator. I am wondering whether that "may" should not be "shall," because it has been my experience in legislation of this kind that it is a wise thing to provide some measure of appeal. At the present stage the inspector could have the final word with really no appeal, while the minister may grant an appeal if he sees his way clear to do so. I would be much happier if it were "... shall ... refer the complaint to the adjudicator ..."

My notice was directed to this point because further on in the same clause we find a provision with respect to safety in the workplace which, quite properly I think, makes it possible for an employee to decline to continue work if it is not safe. In this particular case, which I think is somewhat similar to the first one, the procedure is a little different. The employee goes first to his employer to put matters to rights. If that does not happen, the matter is considered by all concerned, together with the safety committee, which is stipulated in the statute. If they cannot agree, it shall be referred by way of appeal to a further person, called the safety officer. If he does not settle the matter, there is a further "shall" appeal to the Canadian Labour Relations Board, if I understand the matter correctly.

So here we have on the one hand in connection with unjust dismissal what I think is an unsatisfactory method of appeal, and in connection with matters of safety we have a superabundance of caution in connection with appeals. We have two of them there, so I wonder if the minister would like to indicate the rationale by which this differentiation is made between these two types of labour problems?

Hon. Mr. Munro: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The reason it says "may" and "unjust dismissal" is that this is fundamentally a new right that has been given. It has never been given to the unorganized worker before. The unjust dismissal provisions, by and large, deal with all the unorganized workers under federal jurisdiction. They have never had it before and there are very few other jurisdictions in which this right has been given. I think it is a right that should have been given long before now. When dealing with something new such as that, it was our feeling that the discretion should reside in the minister to determine over a period of time just how this is going to work. Rather than the minister merely being sort of a channel through the appeal procedure and automatically it goes to an adjudicator, we would give the minister a discretion to determine on the facts of the situation whether, indeed, it should go to an adjudicator. It affords us some period of time in which to gain some experience as to how this will work.

We do not think it will happen, but it could be that there will be frivolous examples, in which people could be intentionally fired and claim unjust dismissal, and we would be overburdened with the automatic appointment of adjudicators. We are endeavouring, therefore, since it is a brand new provision—and we do not know that it exists in any other jurisdiction—to test it and give the minister of the day, for the time being, that discretion to determine whether on the facts of the situation an adjudicator is warranted.

As far as the safety provisions are concerned, you will find that in many cases there we are dealing in the organized sector. They have already built up an expertise with respect to what the rights are in a situation. I believe the honourable senator will agree that those provisions we have with regard to safety are not essentially novel. They are not new; they are contained in some provincial statutes already which apply to a larger percentage of the work force than does this particular bill. That being the case, and also in view of the fact that there has to be in the safety area a much speedier process of determination, mainly because the man is already working in the workplace and has already perceived himself to be in immediate danger and removed himself before sanctions apply or, indeed, should have to apply to the employer if the employer has taken action against the employee, we try to establish as of right a method, a quick method, by which it can very quickly go to appeal and be fundamentally determined before there are any fallout effects that would cause bitterness between the parties.

• (2050)

Senator Roblin: I wish I could say that I thought the minister's reply was convincing. I think that as far as the federal legislation is concerned the safety measures are new; is that right?

Hon. Mr. Munro: Yes.

Senator Roblin: While it is perfectly true that some provinces do have safety rules of a similar nature, I think the two procedures are new to federal jurisdictions. It puzzles me to think there is going to be an expeditious settlement of safety problems with these five steps, going from a safety commissioner to the Canada Labour Relations Board. I wish him luck. I hope it does work smoothly and as quickly as he thinks it will. However, I have considerable doubt about that.

Going back to my main point, I should still like to reiterate the suggestion that it really would be wiser if the minister—and perhaps he will not change the statute tonight—would make a mental note to make sure that, if someone appeals from one of these inspectors under the unjust dismissal clause, he allow that appeal to be made. There is nothing so comforting to someone who feels himself aggrieved in an industrial dispute as to know that he has this right of appeal open to him. Of course, the same should apply to the employer. He does not want to be stuck with a local decision made on the job. He would like to know that he can go to a higher court which will take a broader view of the problem in question.

I will leave the matter at that, but I do reiterate that the minister would be wise to make sure that that right of appeal be made available.

Hon. Mr. Munro: I will make a mental note of your comments, Senator Roblin. When we do get to the safety provisions I will endeavour to indicate—and this might be of some consolation to the senator—that this procedure can be carried out expeditiously, even though it includes five steps.

In most cases I should imagine that the safety officer will respond to the situation the same day and make a ruling the same day. That has been our experience with safety officers. They can mediate and arrive at some type of solution.

The Chairman: Senator Bonnell?

Senator Bonnell: I have a brief before me which was submitted by the Canadian Bankers' Association concerning the unjust dismissal clause. It is quite lengthy. I am sure the minister is familiar with this brief. I should like to have this attached, with consent, to the proceedings of this evening.

Senator Flynn: No. There is no reason for doing that.

The Chairman: We cannot do that.

Senator Flynn: I should like the minister to tell me whether he thinks the minister—and I am not speaking of him—is the right person to decide whether there should be an appointment of an arbitrator.

It seems to me that the minister is not in the same position as the court. I agree that there should not be frivolous appeals and we should not allow all appeals, but does not the present minister think that the minister would be in a difficult position in deciding these things, and that it should be decided elsewhere?

I agree that there should be some restrictions, but I do not think the minister should bear the responsibility of deciding whether or not someone has the right to have an arbitrator.

Hon. Mr. Munro: In this sense it is a political responsibility.

Senator Flynn: It is rather judicial too.

Hon. Mr. Munro: I should think that a minister is accountable to the proper exercise of his duties when he exercises this right. I imagine he would be open to some criticism and attack if he frivolously denied what is obviously a right, and I suppose he would be subject to attack in Parliament. So there are remedies.

I would point out that a commission under the Human Rights legislation can decide whether or not an individual can have the benefit of a tribunal. I suppose the difference there is that the tribunal would be subjected to criticism from Parliament if it frivolously denied rights. I would assume that a minister is going to act with compassion and in a judicial way with respect to this matter.

Senator Flynn: The minister is a member of the government, which is quite separate from the judicial area. This bill would give the minister a judicial responsibility. We have always been careful to keep separate the judicial and administrative responsibilities. Now the government seems to be moving into the judicial area. I, for one, do not like it. I suggest that if a problem arises fairly soon, the minister will find out that he has too great a responsibility in this area.

Hon. Mr. Munro: I would point out, senator, that the Minister of Labour, under the Labour Code, has many discretionary powers that he can exercise.

Senator Flynn: Discretion is one thing. This is something else.

Hon. Mr. Munro: This is an exercise in discretion based upon a factual situation that is put before the minister. If there is a grievance under a collective agreement and the parties cannot find a resolution to it, the minister may appoint an arbitrator. He does not have to. A decision of that kind is one of discretion, but the manner in which the discretion is exercised may very much affect the well-being of one of the parties to the grievance.

Senator Flynn: That is my point. If the minister decides not to appoint an arbitrator, the rights of the aggrieved person would terminate. However, if the minister decides in favour of an arbitrator, the aggrieved party might be able to get some relief or compensation, and that would be at the discretion of the minister. That is a matter that is usually the responsibility of a court, or some very independent person or body.

Hon. Mr. Munro: I might point out, Mr. Chairman, that this in no way affects the employee's civil remedies in the event of an unjust dismissal, and so forth.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but a great deal will be decided at this point in terms of the civil remedy.

The Chairman: Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: Mr. Chairman, with reference to Senator Roblin's point, I note that subclause (10) on page 11 states:

(10) Every order of an adjudicator appointed under subsection (6) is final and shall not be questioned or reviewed in any court.

Subclause (6) states:

The Minister may, on receipt of a report pursuant to subsection (5)—

That is, from the inspector.

—appoint any person he considers appropriate as an adjudicator to hear and adjudicate—

And so on.

Perhaps there is a convenient explanation that the minister can give, but it seems to me that if the minister receives a report and fails to appoint an adjudicator, an appeal may then lie to the courts. I am wondering whether that was a mistake in drafting, or whether that indeed has been provided elsewhere in the bill and it is simply a case of my not having read the legislation that well.

Hon. Mr. Munro: There is nothing in the bill that would require the minister to appoint an adjudicator. Again, we are relying on the fact that the minister in this particular instance will act in a just way.

Hon. Mr. Munro: No, there isn't.

Senator Everett: Subclause 10 only prevents him from doing it, if the adjudicator is appointed.

Hon. Mr. Munro: Precisely. There is nothing here that would prevent the employer from doing that.

Senator Everett: And you do not consider that to be an error in drafting?

Hon. Mr. Munro: No sir, I do not.

Senator Flynn: Since Senator Everett has discussed my point, I want to mention that under subclause (9), where an adjudicator decides that the person has been unjustly dismissed, he may, by order, require the employer who dismissed him to pay the person compensation not exceeding the amount of money that is equivalent to the remuneration that would, but for the dismissal, have been paid by the employer to the person; reinstate the person in his employ and do any other like thing that it is equitable to require the employer to do in order to remedy or counteract any consequence of the dismissal.

Normally, this right can be exercised in normal courts; but if the minister does not appoint the adjudicator there would be, of course, subclause (14), which says that "No civil remedy of an employee against his employer is suspended or affected by this section."

But I would say that there is quite a difference when you have an adjudicator under this bill saying, "You were unjustly dismissed. You are entitled to your remuneration. You are entitled to be reinstated," and the case where the minister says, "No, no. You have no right. Go to the usual court." That is why I say that this discretion given to the minister is of a judicial nature and does not belong to the minister.

Hon. Mr. Munro: Well, again, I say that it is not unusual. I gave my reasons, senator, why I feel that it is not unusual for ministers to accept—

Senator Flynn: Not in judicial matters.

Hon. Mr. Munro: —to accept political responsibility for determining—

Senator Flynn: That is something else again.

Hon. Mr. Munro: —for determining where an administrative process should be used and where it should not. This is essentially to allow the minister discretion to open up an administrative process to finally determine an employee's rights, where a new right has just been given, and has never been given before; and at the same time it does not deny or it has no impact whatsoever on his right to go to the courts, if he so desires.

Senator Flynn: Why not give that authority to the board?

Hon. Mr. Munro: There is no board in this particular case, senator. I think you mean the adjudicator.

Senator Flynn: Well, the board. The board has a lot of experience in these matters. He could really say that "this is a case where we should appoint an arbitrator," and "this is a case where we should not appoint an arbitrator."

● (2100)

Senator Everett: I am not sure that the minister has grasped my point. Let us assume that the minister fails to appoint the adjudicator under the clause and then the employer makes an appeal to a court. There is no preclusion that I can find to prevent the employer from doing that where the adjudicator was not appointed.

[Senator Flynn.]

Hon. Mr. Munro: In the safety provisions there we have gone to the board. I think it was Senator Roblin who made the comparison between the safety provisions and these provisions.

Senator Flynn: That is something else. It is rather technical.

Hon. Mr. Munro: There is the same question whether we would want to test our experience to see whether we could be overburdening the board.

Senator Flynn: Just try it!

Senator Roblin: Mr. Chairman, the deeper I get into this clause the more puzzling it becomes to me. Going back to the main point here that the inspector makes a report to the minister and apparently, if the minister decides that it is not to go on to the adjudicator, the matter stops there, I do not see any provision in this bill, although there may be some and I have overlooked it, that says what the minister does when he gets a report from the inspector and decides to hold the process at that stage.

If he decides to let it go on and sends it to the adjudicator, then the rule follows that the adjudicator can make regulations for the payment of the aggrieved employee, and all that kind of thing that my honourable colleague has just read to the Senate. But I am just a bit puzzled to know what happens when the inspector makes his report to the minister. There is no provision, as I see it, for the minister to do anything about it. Apparently, he would have to provide for an appeal to an adjudicator in order to get the adjudicator's ruling and the remedies that flow from that. Have I misunderstood it or is there a gap in this procedure?

Hon. Mr. Munro: That is quite correct, senator. If the minister does not appoint a person, then the process stops there.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, this is nothing new in the field of labour. Even where you have a labour agreement which regulates, for example, employment layoffs and so forth, while the union is not compelled to take a grievance up to the arbitration board, they can say, "No, we will not take it." The union has this power.

Of course, these are the cases which are not covered by an agreement and can be assimilated. The standards are established by the government—in this case it is the federal government—and administered by the Minister of Labour as such. It is like all other standards. This is new because some employees—when the Honourable Senator Flynn says it is judicial—

Senator Flynn: I am speaking of dismissal, not of safety.

Senator Marchand: Even in this case you have no law regulating the hiring or dismissal of employees except in the Labour Relations Act. You cannot dismiss an employee because he belongs to a union. Outside of that, this is judged not according to any law; it is judged according to the discretion or the good judgment of the arbitrator, the adjudicator, or the minister if the ministry is involved. We are not in court here.

Senator Flynn: But we could be in court. When the act says that it does not affect any civil remedy, it is because there is a civil remedy for dismissal without cause. There is in the Civil Code, with all due respect to my good friend, a dismissal right of action if you are dismissed without cause. You can go to a court and you can obtain damages and even in some cases, depending on the term of the agreement, require the person to take you back. That is done very seldom, and it is not a very practical remedy, I agree, but it exists. That was not something new when it appeared in the Labour Relations Act. A lot has been done to improve the situation in this respect, but practically all these were already recognized in the Civil Code but were not as specific as in the Labour Code.

Senator Marchand: It does not exist.

Senator Flynn: It does not exist because you never thought of that. You only thought of negotiating an agreement, but there is a lot that you missed by not studying the Civil Code to find out what the rights were of the individual or of the citizen. I suggest to you that sometime you should consult a lawyer.

Senator Marchand: Yes, I did consult a lawyer. I had a professor by the name of Mr. Pigeon.

Senator Flynn: He was talking constitutional law.

Senator Marchand: According to the Civil Code the only thing the employee is entitled to, because he is employed by the hour, is an hour's notice before he is fired.

Senator Flynn: You were a very bad pupil.

Senator Marchand: I had a bad professor. He was the same as the one you had.

Senator Roblin: This is at least one area where I know my limitations. I am not going to argue with Senator Marchand about labour policy, because I am sure he knows so much more than I do so as to be in quite a different league.

As a simple, non-labour person, not even a lawyer but just an ordinary senator in this house, I read section 61.5 regarding unjust dismissal and it says what the inspector does when you cannot get an agreement is that he reports to the minister that he cannot get an agreement. He then gives the minister a written statement with respect to the matter. Supposing the matter under dispute was a question of wages and they could not get an agreement between the parties about wages, and it is conceivable as I read the law—again the lawyers will have to correct me if I am wrong—the minister would say, "Oh, yes, we owe wages all right, but we are just going to drop the matter there." There is no further appeal from the inability of the inspector to get the parties together or to come to some agreement.

● (2110)

Hon. Mr. Munro: When you say "dispute over wages" you are talking about the fact that the situation as revealed by the inspector shows that that was the cause of the employee's dismissal—because this only deals with dismissal.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps I used the wrong example. I was just speaking of this dispute over dismissal, and it is quite likely that those disputes will involve money before you get through with them.

Hon. Mr. Munro: My deputy has just pointed out that there are other parts of the act dealing with wages as such, particularly in terms of non-payment and so on. But again I would suggest that the inspector will investigate this and it will become apparent, and in the factual examination it will be laid before the minister for determination as to whether it should go further in terms of the adjudicator. I really do not expect that any Minister of Labour in the exercise of this discretion is in any way going to arbitrarily deny further recourse through the process to an employee who prima facie seems to have been dismissed unjustly.

The Chairman: Shall clause 21 carry?

Senator Macdonald: I wonder if the minister would look at page 9, subclause 61.5(2), where it says that the person must make a complaint within 30 days unless the minister extends the time. It seems to me that 30 days does not give very much time. This seems to be particularly the case if you look at page 15, where the amendment in clause 26 says that proceedings in respect of an offence under this part can be instituted at any time within three years. So the poor man might be dismissed, and then three years later they come and lay a charge against him. Personally, I think that 30 days is too short and that three years is too long.

Hon. Mr. Munro: Well, senator, we feel that there are two different things here. If an employee feels that he has been unjustly dismissed then he should make this known within 30 days. The other situation covers the whole act and alleged offences under the entire act that may not even come to the surface or be discovered until many months have passed. Our inspectors may go out to the workplace and find out that offences with respect to safety standards have been committed, and may have been committed over a year previously, and if we did not have a clause with the time frame that the honourable senator referred to in terms of three years, then it would deprive us of the right to enforce the act at all, because such offences would only come to our knowledge after the time limit had expired. So, senator, these are two different situations.

Senator Macdonald: On that point of the three years, under the old act was the time limit not two years?

Hon. Mr. Munro: That is correct.

Senator Macdonald: Can you give us some idea of why it was extended?

Hon. Mr. Munro: Well, senator, the old provision required a prosecution to be launched within two years after the situation came to the attention of the minister. Now that was felt in the standing committee—

Senator Macdonald: Was it two years or one year after it was brought to the attention of the minister? That was the first proposal under this act.

[Senator Roblin.]

Hon. Mr. Munro: The previous situation was that it was two years after occurrence. This was a compromise solution arrived at by the committee, which provided that it would be three years after occurrence.

Senator Macdonald: I may be wrong, but as I read the first act, the proposal was one year. The additional year was after it was brought to the attention of the minister. The objection was that that might go on for years. It is an improvement, but it is still an extension of two years. I am wondering whether there was a special reason why they wanted to extend the time. Have they come upon cases where they could not institute a prosecution?

Hon. Mr. Munro: That is precisely the situation. Sometimes our inspectors go out, and do a routine examination only every two and a half years. A factual situation may come to their attention which they did not notice when they were last there two and a half years ago. We thought it reasonable to go back that far but no further, in terms of being able to enforce the act.

The Chairman: Shall clause 21 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 22. Shall clause 22 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 23. Shall clause 23 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 24. Shall clause 24 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 25. Shall clause 25 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 26. Shall clause 26 carry?

Senator Flynn: Mr. Chairman, this is a question that was raised by Senator Macdonald. It says:

(2) Proceedings in respect of an offence under this Part may be instituted at any time within three years after the time when the subject-matter of the proceedings arose.

Is this the same thing as the points raised by Senator Macdonald?

Hon. Mr. Munro: Yes.

The Chairman: Shall clause 26 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 27. Shall clause 27 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 28. Shall clause 28 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 29. Shall clause 29 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 30. Shall clause 30 carry?

Senator Haidasz: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether this is the appropriate place to ask the minister a question. In our hazardous society, federal and provincial governments have undertaken several inquiries into the safety of our workplaces in the nation. What relationship will these safety committees have with the proposed Canadian centre for occupational health and safety?

Hon. Mr. Munro: There is a bill now before the house establishing a Canadian centre for safety and occupational health that it is hoped will bring together labour, management and people in the health sciences who will run this centre in an autonomous way and report to Parliament. In fact it will be a data collection agency. It will bring together the fund of knowledge in all matters dealing with occupational safety and hazards to health in the workplace. It will interpret, analyze and distribute that information across the nation and make it available in a pragmatic way to the health and safety committees at the plant level, so that these types of committees will be served by a national agency that can keep them updated as to the latest revelations, both in Canada and abroad, with regard to safety and health standards in the workplace.

● (2120)

Senator Haidasz: But will these safety committees have an input into the centre for health and safety, or do they have to report to the Canada Labour Relations Board first?

Hon. Mr. Munro: This centre is going to be an agency that is accessible to and dovetails with the health and safety committees. So there is a flow back and forth on an on-going basis.

The Chairman: Shall clause 30 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 31 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 32 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 33 carry?

Senator Macdonald: With regard to clause 33, at the top of page 25, this says that a complaint must be made within 30 days from the date on which the complainant knew, or in the opinion of the board "ought to have known," of the action. Is that not rather strange, that a person "ought to have known"?

Senator Langlois: That is a very common expression.

Hon. Mr. Munro: It is a test of reasonableness, I suppose. I can envisage a situation where most reasonable people would say that it is obvious at a given point in time that a particular employee should have known that he was operating under an unsafe situation, and the time would run from then. It is a protection, I would anticipate, against undue delays in making complaints.

The Chairman: Shall clause 33 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 34 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 35 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 37 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 38 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 39 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 40 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 41 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 42 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 43 carry?

Senator Flynn: This is a clause, I think, that expresses the wishes of the board. I do not doubt that any board would wish this kind of a clause to apply to its operations. What we are doing here is restricting considerably the powers of the courts to review or check the operations of the board. The proposed new section 122 provides:

Subject to this Part, every order or decision of the Board is final and shall not be questioned or reviewed in any court, except in accordance with subsection 28(1)(a) of the Federal Court Act.

There is already a restriction, because section 28(1) of the Federal Court Act has paragraphs (a), (b) and (c), and this refers only to paragraph (a). Then in subsection (2) we see:

Except as permitted by subsection (1)—

That is already the restriction provided.

—no order, decision or proceeding of the Board made or carried on under or purporting to be made or carried on under this Part shall be

(a) questioned, reviewed, prohibited or restrained, or

(b) made the subject of any proceedings in or any process of any court, whether by way of injunction, certiorari, prohibition, quo warranto or otherwise, on any ground—

Just imagine the repetition here. It is extraordinary. They want to cover the whole waterfront.

—including the ground that the order, decision or proceeding is beyond the jurisdiction of the Board—

Even the question of jurisdiction.

—to make or carry on or that, in the course of any proceeding, the Board for any reason exceeded or lost its jurisdiction.

It is quite obvious that here we are trying to say, "Let the board go to the end of its decision and then possibly you could appeal under paragraph (a) of section 28(1) of the Federal Court Act." That is quite obvious. Paragraph (a) of section 28(1) of the Federal Court Act says:

failed to observe a principle of natural justice or otherwise acted beyond or refused to exercise its jurisdiction.

I will come back to that. What we are trying to take away from the right to appeal is paragraphs (b) and (c). Paragraph (b) says:

erred in law in making its decision or order, whether or not the error appears on the face of the record.

We do not want the appeal court to decide whether the error appears on the face of the record. Then paragraph (c) says:

based its decision or order on an erroneous finding of fact that it made in a perverse or capricious manner or without regard for the material before it.

If there is a perverse or capricious manner of deciding there is no appeal.

I would say there is a contradiction, on the surface anyway, because we say here that we do not want the question of jurisdiction to be decided before the board has reached a final decision, yet at the same time we say in section 28(1) (a) of the Federal Court Act:

failed to observe a principle of natural justice or otherwise acted beyond or refused to exercise its jurisdiction.

Does the minister want the board to be able to operate until the end and not allow anybody to question especially the problem of jurisdiction at the beginning? They have to wait until the end. I think this appears to be the intention. You put somebody under an obligation to follow the course of action of the board until the end, and only then have recourse to the Federal Court on a question of jurisdiction or natural justice, and be unable to invoke any of the other elements contained in section 28(1)(b) and (c) of the Federal Court Act.

The second question I want to put to the minister is this. Even if we have this clause in the new legislation, does the minister really think that by this legislation he can take away the right of any person to go to a regular court of justice, the Superior Court or the Supreme Court, in order to stop the board from going outside its jurisdiction? If he says, "I am not too sure", I would ask him why this is put in here. You are restricting only the powers of the Federal Court, but are you really restricting the powers of the superior courts of the provinces? That is always a very pertinent question.

● (2130)

Hon. Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman, I point out that this type of clause has been pretty well tested because—

Senator Flynn: I know that.

Hon. Mr. Munro: It has been tested in this sense, that this type of clause is now prevalent in eight of the ten jurisdictions, precisely as it is here in this legislation. The reason for that is that the provinces found, as, indeed, we have found now, that any clause that is looser in its application than a clause such as this means that chaos results as far as the Canada Labour Relations Board is concerned. That is because the way to defeat the process in terms of industrial relations is to immediately, during the course of the proceedings, launch the appeal to the Federal Court, thus delaying any final decisions being made for one, two or three years and undermining the very credibility of the labour relations system. Indeed, this has happened in so many cases now that it has been the subject matter of such concern as to constitute abuse of the labour relations system and the laws relating to it. So we have, in effect, adopted the same legislation as is prevalent in the provinces for that reason. It has been found to have restricted frivolous motions and applications to the courts during the course of the proceedings before the Board.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Flynn: I would like to hear the comments of Senator Marchand on that point, because you referred to the legislation in the provincial jurisdictions. In that respect it seems to me that it never prevented the unions, and especially the union led by my honourable friend some years ago, from going to the Supreme Court and saying that this type of provision would not prevent the courts from intervening, because you cannot really legislate and deprive a person of the privilege of invoking lack of jurisdiction, if I am correct. It also may bring back some memories to Senator Marchand of some famous cases in which he was involved in those years, because this type of clause, if my memory serves me right, was contained in the legislation enacted under the Duplessis government, to which he objected very much. I do not know whether he is in favour of it now and I would like to hear his views in that regard.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, the purpose of this law is that which is seen in almost all labour legislation, to attempt to prevent certain things being done by the labour councils or the parties to the negotiations, such as going to the courts and preventing the normal procedure from following its course. So this is the purpose, and it is not to deny the rights of anyone. It is necessary because there have been abuses of this, which abuses can involve either party.

Senator Flynn: I know.

Senator Marchand: These abuses are attempts to use the courts in order to delay and gain some advantage. So, in my opinion, some type of statute is necessary in order to protect the rights of the parties against the abuse of references to the courts.

Senator Flynn: But I was asking whether you liked it when it was enacted by the provincial authorities some years ago, and whether you were not successful in fighting it and obtaining the right to appeal even to the Supreme Court, despite wording such as this?

Senator Marchand: I do not know which case you are referring to.

Senator Flynn: Let us use the Guindon case.

Senator Marchand: At that time the decision had been made by the council. The union was decertified by the labour relations board in Quebec. There was an appeal to the regular court, but there was no intervention during this process of recognition of the union or request for certification.

I can think of other cases which are clearer. I remember receiving a certification by wire one day because the government wanted to settle a strike without the council's knowing about it.

Senator Flynn: I should like the minister to tell me whether he thinks this clause takes away the right to appeal to the superior courts of the provinces?

If a company says that it is not under the jurisdiction of the board, it can go to the court and say that it is not under the board's jurisdiction. The Federal Court may be inclined to say that its jurisdiction is restricted by this provision, but would a regular court of a province consider it is restricted by this provision?

Hon. Mr. Munro: The Federal Court Act establishes the Federal Court—

Senator Flynn: I know that.

Hon. Mr. Munro: —as the court to review decisions of administrative federal tribunals. I do not understand, unless I have misunderstood the senator, where the superior courts of the provinces come into play in this situation.

Senator Flynn: They come into play on the question of constitutional jurisdiction. You are not saying that a provincial court cannot deal with the problem of jurisdiction? If the company is not under federal jurisdiction, the Federal Court cannot say that the provincial court will not be able to hear the company.

Hon. Mr. Munro: The Federal Court Act establishes the Federal Court as the only court to review decisions of administrative federal tribunals. It is the only duly constituted court that can review a decision of the Canada Labour Relations Board.

Senator Flynn: There is mixed jurisdiction in the Federal Court. Perhaps it is not on everything—

Senator Marchand: This is definitely within federal jurisdiction.

Senator Flynn: If the board has no jurisdiction, how can you say that the Federal Court will be the only court to decide on jurisdiction?

Senator Marchand: The Federal Court would decide it has no jurisdiction.

Senator Flynn: Not at this point.

Hon. Mr. Munro: The Federal Court has made decisions dealing with administrative tribunals. I believe, subject to correction, on several occasions it has stated that the Canada Labour Relations Board had exceeded its jurisdiction. The B.C. Packers case is one where they, in fact, did so. There lies an appeal from the Federal Court to the Supreme Court of Canada.

● (2140)

Senator Flynn: I realize that on occasions when people went to the Federal Court on the ground that the Labour Relations Board had exceeded its jurisdiction, the Federal Court decided that it had in fact exceeded its jurisdiction. But jurisdiction cannot lie only with the Federal Court. This is a problem beyond the Federal Court. If I want to contest the question of jurisdiction, I can go to either a provincial superior court or supreme court. This clause, which restricts the possibility of appealing interim decisions of the board, could very well be put aside by an appeal to a superior or supreme court of any province.

Hon. Mr. Munro: We are not aware of any such decision of the Canada Labour Relations Board that has not gone to the Federal Court, which has been duly constituted as the court of review over administrative tribunals in the federal jurisdiction.

Senator Flynn: You may become aware of such cases.

Hon. Mr. Munro: I suppose it is conceivable that the Federal Court could make a decision that a province would not like, or the Canada Labour Relations Board might make a decision that a given province might not like, in which event the jurisdiction of the Federal Court could be challenged under the Federal Court Act. That has not occurred, and I cannot predict what the outcome might be.

Senator Flynn: The point I wanted to make is that the effect of this clause is to provide the board with the possibility of going to the final decision without interference from the court, thereby putting some people under the obligation to follow everything that the board does prior to coming to its final decision.

This, to my mind, is not natural justice. If I am sued, I can object right at the outset that the case does not stand in law. I can request of the court that the action be dismissed right away on the ground that there is no basis in law, without going into the facts.

What you are saying is that, whether one likes it or not, one will have to follow the board right up to its final decision, and only then can one invoke the ground of lack of jurisdiction. That may be desirable from an administrative point of view, but certainly it is not a good principle as far as its effect on the public is concerned.

Senator Forsey: May I ask the minister whether it isn't true that courts have shown themselves remarkably hostile to private clauses of this sort and have found a variety of ways of getting around them in greater or less degree? My recollection of some of these cases is pretty hazy, I must admit, but my impression is that in a good many cases the courts have been very averse to accepting this kind of thing and have found ways around it. Is the minister quite sure that they will not find a way around this? This, I think, involves the very question that Senator Flynn has been raising.

Hon. Mr. Munro: I think it is a fair conclusion that the courts have shown in their judgments an antagonism towards clauses of this kind.

Senator Côté: Carried.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Carried nothing!

Senator Flynn: Well, you have to give Senator Côté a chance to make his contribution.

Senator Côté: I am the only progressive one here.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Let me say at the outset that I have not had the opportunity of following all the discussion on this bill. However, it does seem to me that this proposed section is one of the most offensive—and I repeat the word “offensive”—to provinces of any clause I have ever seen in any bill I have had the opportunity to scrutinize since coming here. It is also, it seems to me, one of the most offensive possible sections to natural justice.

As Senator Flynn has pointed out—and I do not want merely to repeat what he said but rather to emphasize what he said, because I think it needs to be emphasized; indeed, perhaps it ought to be emphasized many times—this is really an attempt to deprive the ordinary provincial citizen of his right to appeal to his provincial courts on the question of whether, constitutionally, a court which is trying to assume jurisdiction over him has that jurisdiction.

I think that is offensive, not merely as an exception to constitutional law, but I think it is offensive to the principles of natural justice, and I am amazed that here at this late date, or at any date for that matter, we should be asked to give our consent to this abhorrent type of legislation.

Hon. Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure I understood the honourable senator correctly. I do not know whether his objections are on two grounds. One, he does not like this type of clause, period.

Senator Smith (Colchester): That is one.

Hon. Mr. Munro: That is one, and the other one is that he does not like the establishment of the Federal Court.

Senator Smith (Colchester): No, no, no.

Hon. Mr. Munro: Well, the only reason that a provincial citizen would not have access to the superior courts in the provinces is that the Federal Court Act establishes that court to make determinations with respect to decisions of administrative tribunals with federal jurisdiction. Prior to that act, it was a different regime. So access to the Federal Court, in areas falling within federal jurisdiction deriving from decisions of administrative tribunals in federal jurisdictions, is open to the citizens if they feel aggrieved, but it is through the Federal Court system as opposed to the superior courts of the provinces. It is another court system and it is there for federal matters. If there is any objection to that, I would say that we should direct our objection to the Federal Court Act.

Hopefully, having dealt with that aspect, if indeed that was the point of the senator's objection, then so far as the clause itself is concerned, as I have indicated, first, I do not see it in really the intolerable terms that the senator does, and I will tell you why. It is because there are many abuses that deny people rights. It may appear that clauses of this kind seem arbitrary and deny people's rights, but I happen to perceive them as indeed preventive of abuses that have become all too apparent in the industrial relations system, where people are denied the exercise of their legitimate rights because the system that we have for the protection of individuals is perverted by one side or the other to, in fact, deny a decision that intimately affects their rights.

I have seen situations of unions which have expended considerable amounts of money on lawyers and on the preparation of cases that have gone for certification to the Canada Labour Relations Board, and within the second or third day of the hearings, or even on the first day, immediate recourse is had by the other side to the Federal Court to make a review before the board has had a chance to get into the substance of the question or make a decision.

It is not just unions, but this has happened in many cases with unions. Certainly, it happens with employers, depending on the type of case, where it is hoped to frustrate the entire administration of justice as it applies in industrial relations by recourse to the courts. Once it gets in there, it is there for a year, two years or three years. Imagine the impact that that has on a pending certification that is supported by the employees who want a decision fairly quickly as to whether they are to have a bargaining agent to protect their rights. And the system is so frustrated by this recourse through various channels that the decision does not emerge for two or three years. It makes a mockery of the system and I think it is repugnant to what our sense of natural justice should be as far as the protection of individual rights is concerned.

● (2150)

Senator Smith (Colchester): I must say that I remain more convinced than ever, after listening to the minister, that I was right because, as I understand this clause, it means, as I think Senator Flynn said, that in order to determine the question of jurisdiction one has to go through all the Federal Court system, until one gets to the Supreme Court of Canada. How can one get more delay—not because it is the court's intention to delay, but because of the channels through which the process must go?

What the honourable gentleman is really saying, as I understand him, is that it is far better to have a delay through the Federal Court and the Supreme Court of Canada and exhaust the patience and the financial resources of the parties, whether they be union or company, to get the question of jurisdiction determined there, than to get it determined in the courts of one's own province.

Hon. Mr. Munro: I am not saying that at all.

Senator Smith (Colchester): If you would like to interrupt me, go ahead.

Hon. Mr. Munro: Thank you, senator. I am not saying that at all, nor do I think I said that. All I said was that the Federal Court Act establishes the Federal Court to make determinations of this kind in federal jurisdiction. I am not here to answer for that. I am just speaking of the reality. So far as this particular clause is concerned, what it does is prevent recourse to the courts until the final determination by the board in question. Once that final determination is made, then there is recourse to the court system. It happens, in this case, to be the Federal Court. It could have been some other court, but because of the Federal Court Act it is the Federal Court that the person goes to. I am not arguing for the superiority of the Federal Court over another court; I am just saying that once it is open to review by the court under this privative clause, it is dealt with by the Federal Court as a result of an act of the Parliament of Canada.

Defending the principle of the clause is quite different from arguing what court it goes to. My argument was directed towards the defence of the clause itself in terms of its practicality and protecting people's rights in the sense that it prevents abuses which have already become apparent. I believe the honourable senator's administration was in power in the province of Nova Scotia. I indicated that identical clauses, or clauses so similar as to be almost identical to this, exist in eight provincial jurisdictions that found the same result as I am talking about in terms of abuse, and this is why it was necessary to resort to privative clauses of this kind. Nova Scotia has a similar one to this.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Of course, but that is Nova Scotia, and that is the point I am making. In Nova Scotia we left it to the Nova Scotia courts and I believe in law it still will be, despite this. This is a futile clause which is going to cause more trouble, disputes and legal proceedings than we have ever experienced before. However, I can agree with the minister that in Nova Scotia we wanted to make sure, so far as it was possible—and it will never be completely possible—that there is a quick determination of these things, and there is a determination made close to the people involved, not in some distant court which has not got the same sort of relationship to the citizens of the province. It should be made quickly and it should be made at home, and I think that is where, after endless litigation, it is going to end up anyway.

Senator Flynn: I want to illustrate the argument that we are making on this side, and possibly on the other side. What you are saying is that we have to wait until the final determination of the board to appeal to the court. If we do, and if there is a question of jurisdiction from the Federal Court, we go to the appeal division of the Federal Court, and then we go to the Supreme Court if the Supreme Court says, in the first instance, the board had no jurisdiction. We have spent, let us say, three years in the normal course of events. What I say is that if you leave the situation as it is, you cannot have the Federal Court determine immediately that the board has no jurisdiction.

Of course, the other party who does not accept that decision may go to the appeal court and may then go to the Supreme Court, but that is his problem. We have had a first decision of a court that there is no jurisdiction. I suggest to the minister that what he is doing now is just increasing the difficulties that we have there. I understand what he wants, and I understand his objective, but I suggest to him that he will find out that in the end it will be worse than the situation he is trying to correct.

Senator Everett: Mr. Chairman, the minister, as I understand it, stated that no appeal would lie until the final decision was taken. At this point an appeal would lie to the Federal Court. I can agree with that approach. I think it makes sense, and, indeed, I am not sure that I understand what Senator Marchand was dealing with when he talked about appeals during the proceedings. As I understand it there are no appeals, and the intent of this amendment is that there should be no appeals during the proceedings but only after the proceedings have been concluded. So as I understand the amendment there is no delay during the proceedings; the decision is taken and then there can be an appeal.

But what I am mystified about is that the appeal itself seems to be restricted. You can appeal if the tribunal has failed to observe a principle of natural justice or has otherwise acted beyond or refused to exercise its jurisdiction. But section 28 also has subsections (b) and (c), which say that you can also appeal if the tribunal has erred in law in making its decision or where the tribunal has based its decision or order on an erroneous finding of fact made in a perverse or capricious manner or without regard for the material before it.

I can understand why you do not want an appeal taken during the proceedings, because that may, indeed, constitute a form of delay. And I can understand the minister's concern, but if you are going to say that you do allow an appeal under section 28, then surely if the decision of the board was based on an erroneous finding of fact that it made in a perverse and capricious manner, that is a ground for appeal. I understand that the minister, and he can correct me if I am wrong, brought this act before the house and then on April 7 proposed this amendment. He states that this is something that he has been worried about for a considerable number of months or years during his tenure as Minister of Labour, and indeed he is probably the most experienced labour minister, next to Mackenzie King, in the history of this country—

● (2200)

Senator Flynn: Mr. Chairman—

Senator Everett:—yet he came upon the necessity for this amendment—

Senator Flynn: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order.

Senator Flynn: He did not object; so it is not your problem.

The Chairman: I am sorry. Order, please. I do not think that any senator should interrupt another member of the Senate when he is speaking. I think this practice should be observed, particularly by the honourable senator.

Senator Flynn: I would say that under the Rules of the Senate the Chairman or the Speaker should not intervene unless someone requests that he intervenes; otherwise he should stay in his seat.

The Chairman: No. That is not the way that I understand the Rules of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: That is your way of thinking.

The Chairman: Well, I can have my way of thinking. A senator should not interrupt unless he has the permission of the senator who is on his feet and speaking. That is the way I understand the rules. If I am wrong, then someone can replace me in the Chair.

Senator Marchand: There is no appeal from that, I agree.

Senator Flynn: I would invite the chairman to try to enforce the rule as he has just announced it. He would see how difficult it would be.

The Chairman: I will not pursue the discussion. If the honourable senator is not satisfied, let someone else take the Chair.

Senator Flynn: I am not asking anyone else.

The Chairman: That is the way I look at it. I am sorry.

Senator Everett: Perhaps during the discussion I was talking at the same time that Senator Flynn was talking and I did not hear what he said. Perhaps he had something to contribute and I did not listen.

Senator Flynn: I must say that the chairman has made me forget what I was saying.

Senator Everett: I will conclude by saying that, as I understand it, the minister proposed the amendment on April 7, which indeed was very late in the day. I just cannot understand why it was brought up at such a late period when it is something that has been concerning him, apparently, for a number of years. I reiterate that if the minister says an appeal should lie to the Federal Court, then surely it should include appeal against decisions where the board has erred in law, and certainly where it has made an erroneous finding of fact, made in perverse or capricious manner or without regard to the material before it.

Senator Forsey: Mr. Chairman, I should like to intervene at this point to support what Senator Everett has said. It awakens in my recollection memories of the case of Smith and Rhuland which I think Senator Marchand may possibly recall. It was one in which we in the Canadian Congress of Labour got a decision from the Nova Scotia Labour Relations Board, which I think might well be described as having come from a "perverse and capricious" interpretation of the situation before it; and in spite of the fact that most of our unions were very much opposed to our going to the courts on the thing, as a matter of principle, we decided we would go to the courts. We went to the Nova Scotia Supreme Court, which gave us a resounding decision against the Nova Scotia Labour Relations Board. The board appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada and we got an equally resounding decision from the Supreme Court of Canada confirming the decision of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia.

This was really the only way in which we could secure justice for that particular union at that time. I am inclined to think that the point that Senator Everett is making is a very substantial one, simply from my recollection of that case of Smith and Rhuland—a most flagrant miscarriage of justice. I don't know whether anybody in the department has any recollection of that case. Possibly Senator Marchand himself, as it wasn't his particular pigeon, may not recall it either; but I recall it very vividly because I had some direct concern with it.

Hon. Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman, with regard to Senator Everett's concern about its being "very late in the day," I think the proceedings of the standing committee of the House of Commons would indicate that along with several amendments during the course or the hearings we endeavoured to make this amendment as well. The Chairman ruled, however, that unless there was something new to be added to the bill that had not been referred to in the bill, it was out of order and the only way that that amendment, which is the amendment we are discussing here now, could be included in the bill would be to go to the House of Commons, where, with the unanimous consent of the entire house, it could then be dealt with and included in the bill as an amendment. Without the unanimous consent of all parties that would not have been accomplished.

We did receive unanimous consent, but were not able to do it in the committee, although an effort was made to do it there, which applied not only to this amendment but to several others. That was the reason that the amendment was presented in the House of Commons, where unanimous consent was obtained, and a subsequent unanimous vote was obtained for its inclusion.

That, in a sense, is the history of how the provision got here. You might say that it would have been helpful if we could have had it in the original bill. That would have been my desire. For one reason or another, however, and whether it was an omission on our part I do not know, we did not get it in the original bill, so naturally at the first opportunity to get it in the bill we endeavoured to do so, and that was in the standing committee.

Dealing with the points raised by Senator Everett and Senator Forsey, might I just say that section 28(1)(a) deals with the question of review by the Federal Court after the final determination by the Canada Labour Relations Board, on questions of jurisdiction, excess thereof, and questions of natural justice.

I cannot precisely recall, Mr. Chairman, all the law I knew, though I know there are other distinguished senators here from the legal profession; but certainly being able to appeal to the court system—in this case, the Federal Court—on questions of natural justice, seems to me to cover a fairly wide area, as indeed it should if it is to mean anything at all. I would assume that when you talk about a decision of a board that would not be subject to appeal under the heading of natural justice, it would take a capricious and erroneous finding of law or fact to achieve that, and it is suggested that if any board were to be irresponsible enough to fall under that particular indictment, it would be a denial of natural justice if such a decision were not overturned.

What I am suggesting is that when you have given powers of appeal on grounds of natural justice and excess of jurisdiction, you have pretty well said it all as far as ensuring the rights of the individual are concerned, when the final decision of the Canada Labour Relations Board is made, but not while it is being made.

Senator Flynn: Why, then, did you restrict the right of appeal to subsection (a) of section 28(1) of the Federal Court Act?

Hon. Mr. Munro: For the reasons I just stated.

Senator Flynn: No, but why did you restrict it? You do not have to do it if you say that in any event a court would change a decision on that basis. Why did you take it away? Under the present legislation it says that "subject to this part, every order or decision of the board is final and shall not be questioned or reviewed in any court, except in accordance with section 28 of the Federal Court Act," which includes what I quoted, and what Senator Everett quoted, in subparagraphs (a), (b) and (c).

Then paragraph (b) of this subsection 122(2) provides that subject to subsection (1), no order shall be made, process entered or proceeding taken in any court, whether by way of injunction, certiorari, prohibition, quo warranto or otherwise, to question, review, prohibit or restrain the Board in any of its proceedings under this Part.

That is rather restrictive. I think the present situation is fair. Some decisions have been made by the Federal Court which may not please the board, but I cannot be convinced we should say that we should not stay with the present system. I do not think we should accept these two new sections.

Hon. Mr. Munro: When you have the provision of natural justice there is a guarantee that there will not be abuses. I suggest it will prevent the situation about which Senators Forsey and Everett are concerned. When you start to include provisions about errors of law and capricious findings of fact, I suggest they are of such a nature that people who have no intention of proving an abuse of natural justice or anything else just make that allegation and launch an appeal proceeding under paragraph (b) or (c) of section 28(1) merely to delay any decision made by the Canada Labour Relations Board for an intolerable length of time. To prevent this abuse we are limiting it to natural justice, and I think the individual is protected.

Senator Roblin: The minister's sentiments do him credit, but I find his logic hard to follow. He tells us that natural justice includes all the things we are talking about here; he says that natural justice would protect against any error in law or any capricious finding of fact. If so, why not go for paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) as they were previously? I do not really understand why he can agree with the sentiments we on this side express and yet fail to give effect to them in the law we are being asked to pass.

I go further and say I am rather doubtful about the soundness of the argument he makes for doing this. He says that if paragraphs (b) and (c) were in there somebody might take advantage of it, somebody might go to court on this. The plain fact of the matter is that somebody might be right to do so, and if they are right to do so the court is the place to find out whether they are right or wrong.

I take it from the argument we have listened to that it is inconvenient to somebody. The minister says it is the labour unions. Maybe so, but we have just had testimony on the other side that it works both ways, which does not surprise me one little bit. I suggest to the minister that he reconcile his sentiments with his recommendations in this bill and reinsert paragraphs (b) and (c), so that we can restore the law to the position it was in before this amendment was introduced.

Hon. Mr. Munro: I can only reiterate that in our opinion there were abuses under paragraphs (b) and (c). Natural justice is wide enough. It casts the onus on people to establish that there has been denial of natural justice, a greater onus than with an allegation about an error of law that they have no intention of trying to establish in the ultimate, in any event, but which is just a means of delaying the deliberations and final decision of the Canada Labour Relations Board. That is our experience.

By including the provision for natural justice we think that where there is a real abuse the person who has suffered that abuse, in the sense of a faulty decision by the Canada Labour Relations Board, will have his remedy, without having to include paragraphs (b) and (c), which have already proved through experience to lead to any number of frivolous applications to the Federal Court that do nothing but frustrate the system.

You say someone may have been inconvenienced, senator; as you put it I believe the direct quote was that maybe they should have been inconvenienced. Well, inconvenience is a polite way of putting it, but I think we are in such a situation that people resort capriciously and frivolously to the court system without any intent, really, of winning their final allegations through that court, but merely for the purpose of delaying a board for often two to three years from making a decision which will bring an application before it to a conclusion. That is more than an inconvenience; in my opinion, that very abuse and type of delay is a denial of natural justice. Perhaps when we in a sense, "restrict this clause to natural justice", the litigant will be tempted just to take frivolous proceedings because that in sum will constitute abuse and a denial of natural justice, and the court will so find.

Senator Everett: The minister is concerned about capricious applications to the Federal Court that are meant to delay the proceedings. However, if he permits paragraph (a) to exist and an appeal based on the fact that there was a failure to observe natural justice, that opens the door to a capricious action. In using the word "capricious," is an error in law a capricious matter? Is basing an order on an erroneous finding of fact made in a perverse or capricious manner a thing that we should ignore? We have a system that is based on the rule of law, and to say that it is capricious to bring an appeal because you believe that the tribunal erred in law seems to me to argue against the entire system of law that we have. So I make two points: One, that in permitting paragraph (a) you have opened the door to so-called capricious appeals; and secondly, appeals based on errors in law and decisions based on complete disregard for the facts are not in any manner, Mr. Minister, capricious appeals.

Senator Forsey: May I follow that up, just briefly? I understand the minister's point about not wanting to have these appeals taken while the process is going on, but if he simply left the law as it is now—as I understand it is now—with section 28(1)(b) and (c) of the Federal Court Act in operation, surely then that would still mean that the minister's point would be met, that there would be no appeal until the decision of the board has been made. On the other hand, if he takes the other line and says: "Oh, yes, but that would allow appeals to be taken while the process was going on" then, surely, leaving section 28(1)(a) in the clause also will allow appeals to be taken while the process is going on. I do not see that the minister can have it both ways, but perhaps I am just being stupid or perverse at this hour of the night, or because of age and infirmities. But I should like to have this cleared up, because I am not sure that everyone else finds it any clearer than I do.

Hon. Mr. Munro: I do not think the senator is suffering from any lack of awareness of the provision, knowing the senator. I just repeat that we endeavoured to accomplish two things. We have endeavoured to accomplish that the system not be obstructed by appeals being made during the course of hearings before the Canada Labour Relations Board. This was to stop this frivolous use of the system.

• (2220)

The second objective was to limit or restrict the grounds of appeal. There is no question of that, because we felt the wider grounds enumerated in section 28(1) (a), (b) and (c) of the Federal Court Act do, in themselves, open up the frivolous actions which go before the Federal Court. So we narrowed it down to section 28(1)(a).

These were the two objectives, to narrow the grounds of appeal and to prevent appeals going ahead before the courts while hearings are being held before the Canada Labour Relations Board.

To prevent any real denial of natural justice which, as far as I am concerned, is something that is not tolerable, we left that particular ground in. It seems that it does cast a heavier onus on someone who wishes to go before the court to prove denial of natural justice, than to merely make allegations under section 28(1) (b) and (c). They have to go further and establish that as a principle of law. It is a very serious matter when you are alleging denial of natural justice.

It is a sincere intent. I do not think there is any doubt one will carry it through if one is basing their appeal on that ground of natural justice. I firmly believe, for those reasons, that we have narrowed the grounds of appeal and we hope we have eliminated these frivolous appeals. That has been our experience with the provincial legislation in eight jurisdictions which have followed a similar regime.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I did not intend to make reference to the rather late-in-the-day conversion of the minister to this remedy for what he considers a very serious problem, but it having been raised already, and having listened to his response, it seems to me that he has not really made a very convincing case as to why such a serious problem didn't catch his attention, or the attention of his advisers or draftsmen, until after the original bill was drawn up.

I would have thought, without really requiring very much evidence one way or the other, if a problem was a serious one and had existed for a substantial time, so long a time that it was really right for it to be recognized as a serious problem, that a minister responsible for that particular type of problem, or at least his adviser or draftsman, would have recognized it long since and not come at the last minute with an amendment which would create a remedy for a very difficult and long-standing problem.

I must say that, in response to the minister's response to Senator Everett, I find nothing convincing at all that this could be so long standing and so serious, but rather I find myself doubting whether this was recognized until very recently as something that needed to be dealt with. Perhaps this sudden recognition sprang not from long experience, but from something of the kind of problem Senator Roblin mentioned.

I do not expect the minister to pay much attention to anything he does not hear, and I do not really expect him to give me the courtesy of listening to me if he does not wish to, but it would add something to the debate if he did listen. Then, at least, we would be able to say to him that he heard what we said. The minister seems to ignore what I am saying, and perhaps he has a very good reason. Perhaps he doesn't want to hear any argument that would go contrary to what he has been saying.

This talk of frivolous proceedings before the courts leaves me completely cold. I have had quite a lot to do with the courts to this point in my life, and I have had something to do with the rules by which courts conduct themselves. It has been my experience that in most jurisdictions the courts and their rules are so arranged that frivolous proceedings are given very short shrift—very short shrift indeed. There are quite proper and well understood ways by which frivolous applications to the courts, or the frivolous beginnings of legal proceedings, are brought to a halt quickly. Such applications are brought to a halt long before trial, and in a most expeditious way. If such proceedings are not brought to a halt in that way, then either they are not frivolous or the people who are opposing them are not properly doing their jobs.

I am bound to say, therefore, that if the minister finds court proceedings so frivolous, and so difficult to deal with because they are frivolous, either he is not doing his job or the people under his authority are not doing their job in getting these frivolous proceedings disposed of quickly, or the legislation which governs the Federal Court is not properly constituted or shaped to deal with that sort of thing.

the first thing I think of when someone complains about a frivolous proceeding being brought before the court is that the person complaining is afraid the court will not give him what he wants. That is the first thing that occurs to me in such instances, and it not only occurs to me, but to a great many people. It is near time that those who are in authority in this country began to stop complaining about frivolous applications when the courts do not find what they want, and begin to think of the rule of law and the rights of the individual.

The way in which the minister has presented his argument this evening leads me to think that it is very nearly time that he and those who are advising him woke up to the fact that Canadians are getting pretty tired of people who do not like what the courts do. Canadians are prepared to submit their controversies to properly-constituted courts. Those who would try to deprive the courts of jurisdiction are those who are afraid that the courts will not let them have their way.

[Translation]

Senator Marchand: Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, I would rather say what I want to say in French since I have more facility in that language. Moreover, I am not a lawyer and I am of course very impressed by the legal arguments that Honourable Senator Smith has just given.

However, I believe that knowing the law as he does and as we all do, we know that labour legislation has developed outside of traditional law and that all the efforts of the governments, whether in Nova Scotia, in New Brunswick or at the federal level, have been made from the very beginnings of labour legislation to provide exceptions to the general statutes, and this has resulted in a new branch of law called labour legislation. This has happened precisely because the basic laws, whether in the Civil Code or the Criminal Code, have never been designed to accommodate this new reality we call collective negotiations and the collective rights of workers in an industrial world.

This law is therefore based on exceptions and we try to protect it against the traditional law which did not provide for it. So we should not be shocked and say that our courts are ready to understand everything. If there is a labour relations council in Nova Scotia, if there is one here, if there is one in Quebec or elsewhere, it is indeed because we thought that there were things which the courts were not able to decide and that we needed a special system, not only for the special courts which we call administrative councils, but also special legislation for the world of labour in its relations with the employers because it involves legal problems that do not affect traditional law.

When labour law began to develop, those who opposed it used traditional law to try to stop this development. They did this, for instance, by obtaining injunctions against work stoppages or by certiorari brief procedures or by some other form of exceptional legal action, not to enforce the law, but to try to delay a process which was not in their interest.

You can say that you are shocked, but I would also be shocked to know that our legal system is such that people have no confidence in the courts as they now exist. It is not a matter of having confidence in the courts such as they are, it is simply a matter of knowing whether we subscribe to the concept that we are now facing a new type of law which we are trying to integrate into traditional law.

This is the basic problem. I do not think this should cause a scandal since we must simply determine if in such a case it is justifiable to act in this way for the common good.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

[English]

Senator Smith (Colchester): I must say that the eloquence of Senator Marchand is only equalled by his wide knowledge of labour relations, and I accept in large measure without reservation his comments about the necessity of having a different kind of law, or an innovative way of administering law, when we come to deal with labour relations. I learned that very early in my public life—incidentally, not as perhaps the senator indicated I might have, but because of a great friendliness with people who were not labour oriented. Not to do anybody any good, but just to make it clear, I have been on both sides of these questions and, much more frequently, I have been straight in the middle.

So I think I understand very well what Senator Marchand is saying. But that does not lessen my feeling that the fundamental rights of the individual must be protected, whether we are involved in labour law or in any other kind of law you could want to mention—and there are a great many aspects to the law, of course. Nor does his very persuasive exposition of the need for innovative law convince me that this is such an important and long-standing and convincing type of situation, when the minister only thought of it after he introduced the bill in the House of Commons.

Now, surely, one can argue all one likes about the necessity of innovative law, and, generally, I suspect I would be on the side of that argument, although one should not offer one's support in advance, I suppose. But when I get right down to considering this matter as I understand it from the minister's explanation, that this was not made a part of the original bill, which was provided some time ago—I don't know the date—but that, as a secondary thought after the bill was drafted, the conclusion was reached that this change ought to be made to remedy a long-standing abuse, to me that is a contradiction in terms. I would have thought that if one who was charged with the responsibility of dealing with the very difficult field of labour relations was going to present before Parliament a bill which would deal with the most difficult problems that he had experienced, and which had to be faced and solved, he would have encompassed all those serious problems in the first draft of his effort.

When you come along after that and find yourself compelled first to go to a committee of the legislative house—is somebody saying something? If he is, I would be glad to hear him, and I would like to be enlightened by his contribution. I do not want to carry on without giving proper attention to anyone who has anything to say.

The Chairman: That is why I called order. The honourable senator is now speaking and we should listen to him.

An Hon. Senator: We do.

Senator Côté: This is the third time he is saying the same thing.

The Chairman: I interrupted the Leader of the Opposition, and I will call anybody else to order.

Senator Côté: Of course.

Senator Smith (Colchester): That is very much in line with your usual fairness.

I must say that the honourable gentleman who tried to enlighten me has at least succeeded in interrupting my train of thought, which he would probably say was not very good. However, I regard it as being of some use and, consequently, I shall try to resume it.

Where I think Senator Marchand and I do not see eye to eye on this—and I think fundamentally we would really have no significant difference—is that I have a very high regard for the courts, and I suppose that he, being brought up in a different discipline, perhaps might have a different regard for them, and I suspect—

Senator Marchand: I have a very high regard for the courts.

Senator Flynn: Order, order!

Senator Smith (Colchester): I will just return to say this, and then I will stop. If this is such a deadly serious thing, how is it that the minister was so late in discovering the problem and asking the legislators to remedy it in such an objectionable way?

The Chairman: Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn: I move that clause 43 be deleted and that the situation existing presently, which apparently has not worried the minister for some time, remain as it is. Therefore, I move that clause 43 be deleted. I do not know that if by the mere fact of voting against the clause it is deleted. One way or the other, I would ask you to either request that it be deleted or we vote against it.

The Chairman: You are moving, Senator Flynn, seconded by Senator Grosart, that clause 43 be deleted? Is that your motion?

Senator Flynn: Yes.

The Chairman: If that is so, those who are in favour of the amendment—I am sorry, Senator Marchand?

Senator Marchand: It is an important point, and I would like either Senator Flynn or Senator Smith to point out what prejudices they think this position can create for the people, the organization, or the employer. This is what I am just trying to understand. I understand very well their point of view when they say that if we depart from the regular procedure of the court system we should have a good reason. I understand that. We think that in this case this should be dealt with differently. I am just wondering what prejudice or what kind of rights we remove from whom.

• (2240)

Senator Flynn: Mr. Chairman, I think we have explained our position. I think Senator Smith (Colchester) has explained his views many times. I say that under the present situation we can have the problem of jurisdiction settled right away at the beginning, and I do not see any advantage for anybody on either side in having to wait until we go to the Supreme Court to decide whether there is jurisdiction in the board or not. I say that the present situation is not really serious, and Senator Smith has made the point that this amendment was brought in only at the last minute.

Of course, you can say to the people, “Well, you will have to follow anybody up to the Supreme Court before you know whether you are subject to the board or not.” I say it is better to have the Federal Court in the first instance decide that and, of course, if somebody wants to appeal the decision of the Federal Court it is up to him. But at least you have an opinion there that you should not take for granted that it is wrong. On the contrary, I think there is the presumption that the decision of the Federal Court on the question of jurisdiction in the first place is right, and it is up to the people who do not agree to go to the Supreme Court.

You have changed completely the burden, and you say you will not be able to question the jurisdiction until after the final decision, and you will have to go to the Supreme Court. If the Supreme Court decides there was no jurisdiction, all you will have done in the meantime will have been useless. That is my point, and I do not think that you gain anything. I think this amendment was a last minute bright idea, and we would be much safer to retain the present position.

Senator Marchand: Well, I don't agree.

Some Hon. Senators: Question.

Senator Everett: I just want to ask a clarifying question of Senator Flynn. He is suggesting a repeal of section 43, and I wonder if really what he wants is an amendment—

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Everett: Please hear me out, Senator Flynn—an amendment which would say in the fifth line of section 122 “subsections 28(a), (b) and (c) of the Federal Court Act”.

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Everett: Well, senator, that is what we have been discussing.

Senator Flynn: I know, but if you want the explanation, then I move that we delete clause 43. The effect of that deletion will be to keep sections 122 and 123 as they are in the present legislation. That is not very difficult, and in the present legislation, if Senator Everett wants to know, section 122 says:

(1) Subject to this Part, every order or decision of the Board is final and shall not be questioned or reviewed in any court, except in accordance with section 28 of the Federal Court Act.

It does not mention section 28(1)(a).

Senator Everett: That is what I wanted to clarify.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I do not rise of my own volition this time; I rise because Senator Marchand asked a very reasonable and responsible question and I would like to answer it. Senator Flynn gave about three-quarters of my answer. I would just like to add two other reasons. One is that I really believe that instead of shortening the time in which frustration takes place, this is really only going to make it longer, because you are ensuring, if you pass this, honourable senators, that these decisions which now are reached at a somewhat earlier stage cannot be decided until they get to the Supreme Court of Canada. I do not think that is in anyone's interest. That was really my chief reason for objecting.

I also think, however, without having been able to give it any particular study, that there is really substantial reason to doubt whether the provincial courts will pay any attention to this, on a question so fundamental as natural justice, for instance. Therefore, I believe that instead of having what may be an unsatisfactory situation, but at least one which has some degree of certainty and which generally has a finite end, we will make it much longer, we will create a great deal of uncertainty, and we will give people who want to create problems in the way of a decision to resort to the constitutional argument. I believe that neither of those things is a good thing to do.

The Chairman: It is moved by Senator Flynn—I do not think it is necessary to have a seconder—that clause 43 be deleted. Those in favour of the motion will please rise.

The Clerk Assistant: Nine.

The Chairman: Those against the motion will please rise.

The Clerk Assistant: Seventeen.

Mr. Chairman: I declare the motion lost. Shall clause 43 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

Senator Flynn: On division.

The Chairman: On division. Clause 44. Shall clause 44 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 45. Shall clause 45 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 46. Shall clause 46 carry?

Senator Macdonald: I wonder if the minister might comment on why they considered this necessary. It says:

(3) Where the Board is satisfied that a trade union has an established practice of admitting persons to membership without regard to the eligibility requirements of its charter, constitution or by-laws, the Board may disregard such requirements—

That would appear to me to be a dangerous situation, one which could lead to abuses in the trade union movement. I believe it would be wholly unfair to the bona fide members of the trade union.

Hon. Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman, there was the Metropolitan Life case which highlighted why this provision was necessary. It was a provision which the Government of Ontario found necessary to insert also. Some of the international unions go back for a long time and have clauses in their constitutions which are decades old, and which limit membership in accordance with some very old traditions that are there, in terms of who can join the union. They have not been changed. They are unrealistic under this situation. As a matter of fact the union has carried on ignoring these qualifications in their charter, as a matter of practice, for years and years. This provision is one that relaxes rather than restricts membership to the unions. We empower the board to do likewise, if it deems proper.

The Chairman: Shall clause 46 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 47. Shall clause 47 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 48. Shall clause 48 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 49. Shall clause 49 carry?

Senator Macdonald: I wonder if the minister might comment on this. It seems to be a strange clause. It says:

136.1 Where a trade union is the bargaining agent for a bargaining unit, the trade union and every representative of the trade union shall represent, fairly and without discrimination, all employees in the bargaining unit.

It seems to me strange that such a clause would be necessary. I can understand that in an industrial union it could happen. I am wondering whether there have been many cases brought to the department's notice which would justify the insertion of such a clause.

● (2250)

Hon. Mr. Munro: We have had complaints from individual union members at one time or another, senator, that indicated that they were not experiencing fair representation by their union, and they desired a remedy. They asked the department to intervene on their behalf, but we had no power to do so, and so we thought we should have a remedy whereby that type of isolated case, albeit of a single union member who was suffering from poor representation, could have a remedy, and this supplies it.

The Chairman: Shall clause 49 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 50 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 51 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 52 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 53 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 54 carry?

Senator Smith (Colchester): I am sorry to be just a little slow, but that is not unusual. I wonder if clause 53 could be explained by the minister. I see what it says, but without being able to relate it to the section it is intended to amend, and the sequence of sections, I am not quite sure what the effect would be. Perhaps the minister would be kind enough to explain it.

Hon. Mr. Munro: This is identical in all provincial legislations, senator, and deals with the case where a grievance is filed under a collective agreement, and the parties agree on an arbitrator. In some situations an arbitrator is appointed, but often they both agree to the arbitrator during the currency of the collective agreement. That is what this is designed to do. There are sometimes 50 or 60 grievances under all the collective agreements, and they are not all referred to the courts. The arbitrator's decision is final.

Senator Flynn: Is this another amendment made in committee? I look at the present section, and it seems to me that the purpose of this amendment is to prevent review by any court of a decision of an arbitrator; whereas in the present section there is also some provision to prevent interference by the court. I can read it. It is as follows:

156. (1) Every order or decision of an arbitrator appointed pursuant to a collective agreement or of an arbitration board is final and shall not be questioned or reviewed by any court.

This is exactly the wording. It goes on to say:

(2) No order shall be made, process entered or proceeding taken in any court, whether by way of injunction, certiorari, prohibition, quo warranto or otherwise, to question, review, prohibit or restrain an arbitrator or arbitration board in any of his or its proceedings under this Part.

(3) For the purposes of the Federal Court Act, an arbitrator appointed pursuant to a collective agreement or an arbitration board is not a federal board, commission or other tribunal within the meaning of that Act.

This meant that the decision of an arbitrator was in any event subject to the regular court. Are you trying to take away that power of review by any court whatever—either the Federal Court or any ordinary court of any province?

Hon. Mr. Munro: I was just explaining the principle here, why subsection (1) is being amended. Subsections (2) and (3) of the old section 156 remain. The two subsections you just mentioned stay in the old code.

Senator Flynn: What is the change?

[The Chairman.]

Hon. Mr. Munro: I will tell you. It is merely housekeeping. If you refer to section 156(1), which is the same principle that was complained of a minute ago, it is there. Subsection (1) of section 156 says:

Every order or decision of an arbitrator appointed pursuant to a collective agreement or of an arbitration board is final and shall not be questioned or reviewed by any court.

That is in the old code which is in front of you. The only change made here is with reference to the arbitrator and the words "or arbitration board."

Senator Flynn: Why do you take away the words "appointed pursuant to a collective agreement"?

Hon. Mr. Munro: I do not think that is required in the circumstances, that is all.

Senator Flynn: Gee whiz!

Hon. Mr. Munro: In the same situation, as I mentioned in reply to earlier questions, some are appointed by the procedure set out in the collective agreement and some are left to the minister to appoint, so it is restricted. You will see in subsection (2) reference is made to the arbitration board.

Senator Flynn: Yes, I agree.

Hon. Mr. Munro: We had to make one consistent with the other.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I should like to make sure that the effect of this is to provide that, no matter whether or not the arbitrator or arbitration board is appointed pursuant to a collective agreement or appointed pursuant to the right of the minister to appoint, the decision is final. Is that different from the situation today?

Hon. Mr. Munro: It is not.

The Chairman: Shall clause 53 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 54 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 55 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 56 carry? Carried?

Senator Forsey: Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. I want to call attention to a mistake in English.

Senator Flynn: We had forgotten you.

Senator Côté: You won't give up.

Senator Forsey: I want to call attention to a very common mistake in English which has crept in here. The French text is perfectly clear but the English text says, "the decision of a majority of those comprising the Board", when it should say "composing the Board". "Comprising" means to include. If you say "the majority of those including the Board" you have got a piece of absolute nonsense. I do not see why it cannot be just as it is in the French text:

sa décision est celle de la majorité de ses membres.

That is, "the decision of the majority of the members of the Board". If you are going to include the participle you had better put it in English and not pidgin English.

I have had occasion to refer to this in other instances, but usually too late, so I wanted to get up in time to have it corrected. I wish to mercy they would teach some English in the schools, and I might say also in the universities, so that we do not get this kind of vulgarization of the language enshrined in the statutes of this country.

Hon. Mr. Munro: We will take that into consideration and try to get it amended in one of the miscellaneous statutes.

Senator Forsey: I am glad to have that commitment. It would be better if we could amend it now, but I suppose in the circumstances we cannot.

The Chairman: Shall clause 56 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 57 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: I hope I am not going too fast.

Senator Flynn: You're slowing down.

The Chairman: I am sorry. Shall clause 58 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

● (2300)

The Chairman: Shall clause 59 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 60 carry?

Senator Smith (Colchester): I would just like to take time, if I may, to read clause 60. I am not sure whether I have the slightest objection to it, but I wonder, again without having the existing section to turn to quickly, if the minister would indicate what change this clause provides?

Hon. Mr. Munro: Yes. There is a change here from the old act, which provided that the report of the majority of the members of a conciliation board is deemed to be the report of the conciliation board. Here we say in this clause that if there are three members of a conciliation board and each files a different report, then to have the report we say that the chairman's report shall be the report.

The Chairman: Shall clause 60 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 61 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 62 carry?

Senator Macdonald: This is a new clause and it would be helpful for the record if the minister would give a short explanation of just what it means.

Hon. Mr. Munro: Yes. We have run into several situations over a protracted period of time in which the board has certified a particular union to represent a group of employees. The employees have endeavoured to enter into collective bargaining with the employer. No settlement is reached; it goes through all the procedures set out in the act. Conciliation officers are appointed, without success; a conciliation board or commissioner is appointed. A report is brought in, which report is unacceptable to either one or both of the parties. Then the employees may go on strike, exercising their legal right to strike and just stay on strike indefinitely. This is the situation following first certification. In other words, no settlement is ever reached; the people are on the streets for an indefinite period of time and the strike never ends. This is prevalent in certain radio station situations, particularly, where it has happened. We have had representations from various members of Parliament to see if this situation could not be corrected or, at least, a remedy made available in the event it should appear the circumstances warrant a remedy being applied.

This covers all political spectrums in terms of people being concerned with this abuse, with complaints from the Right Honourable Member for Prince Albert, various members of the New Democratic Party, and members of my own party. It follows an example of similar legislation which has been implemented. One province in particular stands out in my mind, British Columbia, where it has been effective in correcting that type of situation in which a minister using his discretion is satisfied after a protracted period of time, perhaps a year or more, even if the union still represents its employees, that he can arbitrate, in effect, the first agreement—only a first one and no other one. That agreement would provide minimum standards for one year only.

Senator Roblin: I have some difficulty in following the minister's argument, because as I listened to him he seemed to be describing what could happen in any industrial dispute, whether it be the first one or the 31st one.

I am wondering what the particular factors are in the first dispute that renders it necessary to call for the government to interpose itself in this form of arbitration. After all, this is basically an economic debate between two parties. In the collective bargaining system we leave it to them to settle it because their particular economic fate is at stake. Why should we come in on the first occasion with a form of arbitration and find ourselves able to relax on subsequent occasions when we run into precisely the same difficulty?

Hon. Mr. Munro: In my view, Mr. Chairman, this would occur in very few situations. Most certifications involve a certification for employees in an operation which has a fairly strong union and a fairly sophisticated bargaining apparatus which they could use to establish a bargaining relationship with an employer and carry it through. The strike weapon can be a weapon as, indeed, can a lockout. It is an effective threat to bring the parties together to sign a collective agreement.

I say that advisedly, because it is not new to anyone to learn that there are collective bargaining processes based upon the adversary approach. That is the fundamental premise for its operation. That is the usual case and it always will be.

There are situations that are relatively unique where employees can—and this largely occurs in the broadcasting area—establish a bargaining unit, be certified for collective bargaining purposes, and no bargaining relationship is ever initially established. This is simply a total certification; nothing happens after that. There is no bargaining relationship and no bargaining in good faith of any kind.

Often communities can be torn apart under such circumstances. For that unique type of situation we give this particular power.

Senator Roblin: I wonder whether the description the minister just gave applies to a particular situation he has in mind. I notice this clause is made retroactive to December 31, 1975. Surely he must have had some particular case in mind in selecting that date. Is this clause aimed at some particular situation which he can tell us about?

Hon. Mr. Munro: I am quite prepared to go on record on this. I would not really want to go behind the date that this bill receives royal assent, unless there are unique circumstances whereby the union could establish, beyond any reasonable doubt, that they still represented a significant majority of the employees involved, especially if they received their certification one, two and three years ago. That may be a very difficult thing to establish. It is operating almost exclusively in the future, with very little application in terms of any retroactivity, even back to January 1, 1976.

● (2310)

Senator Roblin: Assuming that the minister holds that view, why, then, is it made retroactive to December 31, 1975?

Hon. Mr. Munro: We wanted to cover at least some contemporaneous situations where there has been a certification and no resolution of the dispute. In many cases the employees are still on strike. There has been no first agreement, and yet it is still fresh enough to be contemporaneous, in some cases, with precious little doubt that the union still represents the majority of employees.

It seems to me that if we go much behind the date of January 1, 1976, we get into situations where it is difficult to establish what the real situation is. In view of that it seemed to be a judicious time for a cut-off.

Senator Roblin: I do not suppose I am going to be successful in getting the minister to change the date. However, I would like to register my opinion that it is objectionable for us to be asked to pass retroactive legislation, particularly when the legislation would change the rules of the game in mid-course with respect to certain situations which have already developed. I do not know the specific instances the minister has in mind, and I would not like to sit in judgment of them, but certainly the concept of retroactivity, particularly when the legislation is going to interfere with conflicts that are already advanced over several years, is something which I do not feel merits much support.

[Hon. Mr. Munro.]

Senator Everett: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to embellish Senator Roblin's argument at all. I merely want to concur with him in everything that he has said.

Senator Flynn: Mr. Chairman, I, too, support what Senators Roblin and Everett have said regarding the matter of retroactivity. I do not see why it cannot apply from this point onwards and have them follow the procedure provided in this clause.

There are two other points in this which are very important, the first of which is that the board is to decide on all the terms of the agreement. To my mind this is not the role of the board. The board has other jurisdictions. This bill would make the board an arbitrator first, and to my mind the normal responsibilities of the board should not be mixed with those of an arbitrator.

Also, I am baffled by subclause (3), which states:

In settling the terms and conditions of a first collective agreement . . . the Board . . . may take into account—

And listen to this.

(a) the extent to which the parties have, or have not, bargained in good faith in an attempt to enter into the first collective agreement between them—

Just imagine! You are telling the board that if the employer was not a good boy, was not in good faith, then you would just increase the wages; and if the union did not bargain in good faith, well, then you will give them less. Just imagine that! Is that a condition that should really be suggested? It is only suggested, but should that be suggested to the board? To me it is entirely silly. The board at least should decide on the facts what should be awarded. Surely it should not make its findings on the basis of good or bad faith. If you want to impose a fine on the employer or impose a fine on the union, that is all right; but the terms of the first collective agreement should not be influenced at all by the good faith or bad faith of one side or the other. I just cannot accept that. I cannot understand it.

Maybe Senator Marchand has had that experience, but I have some experience, too, and that never even occurred to me.

Senator Marchand: Mr. Chairman, I will not speak to the entire clause, but just on that particular point I should like to stress certain aspects.

The reason for this is that we assume, and I think rightly, that for the first agreement most of the time—I cannot say all of the time, but most of the time—there are many grievances or uneasinesses that, having accumulated over the years in an organized plant, make themselves felt. The union is not used to negotiating; the employer is not used to negotiating collectively with a union, either. That is why the proportion of conflict or dispute in such circumstances is much greater than in other circumstances.

Senator Flynn: It should not affect the terms of the agreement.

Senator Marchand: When you say that it is a matter of principle that the board should not decide, say, on the substance of an agreement, I have to reply that that principle has already been violated. It was violated many years ago, because the board has always had the right to impose, for example, grievance procedures, with a final decision where the parties had not agreed on one.

In principle, therefore, I agree with Senator Flynn that normally we should not be involved in all of this, because it means that we are heading in the direction of binding arbitration everywhere in private enterprise, and that is not our purpose at all. That is not the idea of anyone here or in the House of Commons. It is only because of these psychological factors surrounding the first agreement that we say that maybe it is a good formula for teaching them to live together. After they have achieved that, it will probably follow that the other agreements will be easier to negotiate. That is all.

It is only an assumption that is made according to the experience we have in the field of labour relations.

Senator Flynn: I do not think you have replied to my point that bad faith or good faith should not determine the level of wages or determine whether there should be more advantages or fewer advantages.

Senator Marchand: Well, I think what we have called "bad faith" or "good faith" in the field of labour relations may be something special. I have had a lot of personal experience in this. We have always said that an employer who refuses, for example, to recognize a union is not in good faith; and a union that refuses a proposal made by the employer is often considered as being in bad faith from the point of view of the employer. Those are always the contentions of the parties. Of course, what good faith is or what bad faith is is not defined anywhere.

Senator Flynn: That is why I do not want it there.

● (2320)

Senator Marchand: When an employer refuses something, is it bad faith? When a union refuses something, is it bad faith? This is an expression that is used when the parties refuse to talk to each other. I do not think you will see anywhere in the law that bad faith is defined one way or another, but I know that the spirit or the purpose of this whole process is to reach an agreement, and the parties should try to reach an agreement in good faith. When an agreement is not reached, and is not about to be reached, then there is an assumption that there is not good faith.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I do not disagree in any way with the principle which is contained in this clause or which Senator Marchand enunciates. I do, however, question whether it is really very conducive to long-term relations, in this particular situation, to allow the parties to hurl accusations at each other and suggest that this thing or that thing has been done in bad faith. It seems to me, when disputes have reached this situation, the thing that is most conducive to settling them is to cut off the arguments and disagreements about the past and say, "Look, I do not care what has happened in the past, but as of now we are going to try to work out a fair, reasonable and proper agreement." To me, an invitation to rehash these old disagreements does not seem to be calculated to achieve what I am sure is the very commendable objective of the clause.

Hon. Mr. Munro: I naturally welcome your support of the principle of the clause dealing with the one matter which you identified as concerning you about bargaining in good faith. At the beginning of subclause 61(3) it says:

In settling the terms and conditions of a first collective agreement . . .

(a) the extent to which the parties have, or have not, bargained in good faith in an attempt to enter into the first collective agreement between them;

Our intent there was that the board, in endeavouring to settle the terms and conditions of a first agreement, could rely on paragraph (a) to induce the parties to go back and start bargaining directly between themselves, in an effort to arrive at a collective agreement without one having to be arbitrated by the board.

In British Columbia where they had a similar clause to this, we learned that it was indeed a deterrent in the sense that the parties, faced with the prospect of having an agreement arbitrated, did go back, and the thought that one might be arbitrated was an inducement to start bargaining in good faith and reach an agreement.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I do not dispute that at all. I cannot really see the helpfulness of inviting them to get back into the old disagreements, angers, dissatisfactions and accusations that this was done in bad faith or that was done in bad faith. I would think, as one not entirely inexperienced, when you get to the point where you have to impose an agreement, that the best thing to do is to cut off the troubles, trials and tribulations of the past and start afresh.

Senator Marchand: It may sound a little awkward from my position at this moment, but I will vote for this. However, I think the minister should exercise this right with great care because, of course, it is an encroachment on the principle of freedom of negotiation. It is an exception to the whole system that we have. I do not say we should not have that, but I think it should be used only where there is confidence that this is the only way to serve justice.

The argument you developed, of course, is a strong one, but I think it may be very useful to have that in the law because circumstances arise where there is no other way out for the first agreement. But I think that this right should be used with great care and not in principle, so that the unions which are recognized now will say, "Well, we are not going to negotiate because the minister or the board is going to solve the agreement for us."

Senator Flynn: The point I was making is made stronger by the comments of Senator Marchand. I would say that the minister, when he directs the board to inquire and to determine the terms, could then take into account the good faith or the bad faith of the parties, because this is an element. If he sees somebody is in bad faith and there is no possible settlement, this is an element that the minister should consider in deciding whether he will direct the board to establish a first agreement. But when the board is given the task of settling the terms and conditions of a first agreement, as is mentioned in paragraph 3, then the good faith and the bad faith of the parties should not enter into consideration. I think this is probably bad drafting. But it would be very useful if the minister would say that in his opinion he interprets the clause to mean that the good faith and the bad faith of the parties would enter only in his decision to direct the board to establish the terms and conditions of an agreement, and that he would hope that the board would not take these factors into consideration because they are entirely irrelevant.

Senator Forsey: In effect, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that what Senator Flynn is saying is that the point which is made in subclause (3)(a) should really be in subclause (1).

Senator Flynn: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Munro: Well, if this would assist in any way, when the board actually gets down to settling the terms and conditions of the collective agreement, then I believe precious little attention should be given to (a) in terms of determining what the terms and conditions should be. But I can only reiterate what I said a few minutes ago, that the intent here does seem to be in an appropriate place, that is, under the heading of settling the terms and conditions of a first collective agreement. The intent here, and I am sure the board and the parties will take note of this particular statement, was to entice the parties to go back directly. It is an inducement to settle the agreement, because both parties usually are rather hesitant about finding the board doing it in case the board's final decision is something that they may not like. They may resist taking that type of gamble in many cases. History shows that with a similar clause in British Columbia they have gone back and got an agreement between themselves without the necessity of the board's doing it. That was the intent. Maybe that accomplishes the position you are trying to get, Senator Flynn.

The Chairman: Shall clause 62 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

Senator Flynn: On division.

The Chairman: Clause 63. Shall clause 63 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

● (2330)

The Chairman: Clause 64. Shall clause 64 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 65. Shall clause 65 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 66. Shall clause 66 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 67. Shall clause 67 carry?

Senator Smith (Colchester): Mr. Chairman, I am not too sure what change this makes in the present law. I wonder if the minister might explain.

[Senator Flynn.]

Hon. Mr. Munro: This refers to complaints about what are generally regarded as being unfair labour practices. It is a drafting improvement to the old section. Section 188(3) reads:

A complaint in writing made pursuant to section 187 in respect of an alleged failure by an employer or any person acting on behalf of an employer to comply with paragraph 184(3)(a) is evidence—

And here are the operative words:

—is evidence that the employer or person has failed to comply with that paragraph.

I believe the wording indicates that it is meant to place the onus on the employer. All the wording does is make it clear that that is where the onus lies. It is an improvement to the wording. I am quite prepared to read the wording of 188(3) of the old act to show that the intent is not changed.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I think I followed the existing section as the minister read it, but I thought it was left open to some interpretation other than actions by the employer. I think it made some reference to "person."

Hon. Mr. Munro: The rationale of why the onus is placed here, with respect to a person or an employer connected with the person in question, is simply that the employer, in many cases of unfair labour practices, is the only one who has the evidence and the knowledge.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I am not objecting to that. I merely wanted to know what is the difference. I did not think there was any difference.

The Chairman: Shall clause 67 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 68 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 69 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 70 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 71 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 72 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 73 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 74 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 75 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

Senator Langlois: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid you missed clause 71.1.

Senator Flynn: No, no.

The Chairman: Did I?

Senator Flynn: It is in clause 71. Anyway, it is deemed to have been approved.

Senator Langlois: All right, then.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Before the title carries, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Would you mind, senator? I would like to clear this point. Did I forget clause 71.1?

Senator Flynn: Anyway, it is carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 71.1 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Senator Smith?

Senator Smith (Colchester): I wanted to inquire of the minister whether he was aware of representations made by certain people that they wished to appear before a Senate committee to give their views about this bill, and, if so, if he had any objection to such a request.

Hon. Mr. Munro: I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that that is a question for the Senate itself to decide, but I would make one observation that might be helpful.

I think some briefs have come in in the last very short while to senators from the following organizations: the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Broadcasting Association, the Canadian Bankers Association, Bell Canada, the Canadian Trucking Association, and the Canadian Motor Coach Association. Five of those organizations—the only exception being the Canadian Motor Coach Association—submitted briefs to and did appear before the standing committee of the House of Commons. As I have indicated in the answers to some of the senators' questions, as a result of some of the submissions in those briefs amendments were made—not all, by any means, but certainly a fair number.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I certainly agree, of course, with the minister, that this is a matter for the Senate to decide, as is the case with everything we have been considering tonight, but the comments, advice and assistance of the minister will be helpful in reaching that conclusion. I want to be perfectly clear about this, because to me, although he may not think so after what I have said about certain things tonight, his views on this matter are of considerable significance. I understand him to say that all the representations of which he is aware have been heard by the other place, or by himself?

Senator Grosart: Leave it alone.

Senator Smith (Colchester): No, no.

● (2340)

Hon. Mr. Munro: A lot of the associations that you have heard of, of which I read out six, submitted briefs. Five of the six submitted briefs to the standing committee; they were heard and adjustments were made as a result of those briefs. That is five of the six that the honourable senator showed me.

Presumably the same thing went to all honourable senators. I will read them again if you wish.

Senator Smith (Colchester): No. You say five of the six and that is fine.

Senator Rowe: May I ask if the Canadian Manufacturers' Association—

Senator Langlois: The minister just said so.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, whatever may be the disposition by the Senate of the suggestion by Senator Smith, may I say that I can think of no other occasion when a minister of the Crown has given so much of his time and energy to help explain a bill which is his responsibility. I am sure we all appreciate very much the co-operation that has been demonstrated by this minister this day.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: I am quite sure this has been a unique experience for the minister, and that he did not suspect coming to the Senate meant so much hard work.

The Chairman: Shall the title of the bill carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this may be a relatively small point, but on a sort of check list of the sections that we have been keeping I have no record of sections 27.1 and 27.2 having been carried. I think it was presumed they were carried. They are on page 15, and I do not have those two on my list. I simply bring that to the attention of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: When we carry the bill at the end we carry all the preceding sections.

The Chairman: I am sorry if I made a mistake.

Senator Flynn: You did not.

[Translation]

Senator Bourget: Before closing, on behalf of honourable senators I would like to thank the honourable minister for his excellent explanations. Our thanks are also extended to the two people with him.

[English]

Hon. Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman, may I say to you, and through you to all honourable senators, that I appreciate very much your making yourselves available at such short notice to work on this bill all afternoon and this evening. I know it was probably at great inconvenience to many of you. On behalf of myself, the government and my officials, I appreciate your courtesy very much. Thank you.

The Hon. the Speaker: The sitting is resumed.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Senator Bourget: Madam Speaker, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-8, to amend the Canada Labour Code, has considered the said bill and has the honour to report the same without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

Senator Flynn: I would suggest that this debate, which has not started, be adjourned until tomorrow, just because I think that at this time of the night, with the number of senators who cannot be present, it would be taking undue advantage of those who are strong enough to be here.

An Hon. Senator: They would also miss the arguments.

Senator Flynn: Yes, especially because we would like to hear Senator Perrault again, although I believe tomorrow his voice will be fresher. I also believe that everyone will be in better humour.

Senator Marchand: If they were not here, they will not know what has been discussed and the reasons for it.

Senator Flynn: That is why tomorrow will be better, as they will have had the chance to read Hansard, including what Senator Marchand and others have said. I think we would have a more, let us say—

Senator Côté: Hansard may come out very late tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: No, it comes out before 2 o'clock and we sit at 2 o'clock.

Senator Langlois: Not before 2 o'clock; they would not have time to read it.

Senator Flynn: They will have ample time to read it.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Flynn: I found ample time to read it this morning and it was quite a heavy Hansard for yesterday but, of course, not everything was worth very much.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Grosart, that this debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Grosart: Oh, no; you are not going to refuse to adopt the motion to adjourn the debate. Honourable senators, speaking to the motion, I find it unbelievable that a motion to adjourn by the Leader of the Opposition under circumstances such as this, particularly on an occasion when there were a number of senators on this side—

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Flynn: On the other side, also.

Senator Grosart: —who had a previous engagement that they could not miss. I am sure that the Leader of the Government is aware of what that engagement was; some of us had to miss the engagement, regrettably.

Senator Langlois: We all did.

Senator Grosart: No, I do not believe there were too many senators on the other side who were invited to attend the dinner for Joe Clark at the Château Laurier.

Senator Langlois: Oh, no; not there, no.

Senator Grosart: But in view of that circumstance, it does seem reasonable. We are not trying to pull any trick, or anything. We just believe that any discussion as to whether the representatives of several hundred thousand Canadians should or should not be denied the opportunity of making representations, which they have urgently requested, should take place tomorrow.

I appreciate the statement made by the minister that the representations made by some of those who have now urgently requested that they be heard have already been heard. However, I am quite sure that honourable senators are aware that the reason most, or some at least, are requesting that they be heard is that there was an amendment made after they had been heard previously. They have specifically indicated the importance of this—and they represent, I say again, hundreds of thousands of Canadians—and I cannot believe that the Leader of the Government would not entertain a motion by the Leader of the Opposition that we adjourn until tomorrow the debate as to whether we hear them.

● (2350)

It is now one minute to midnight. I am asking this in fairness and reasonableness to the position we take on this side. We would like to debate this tomorrow.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the hour is most certainly late. I regret very much that the attendance has not been better this evening, especially since the minister was present to explain some very controversial clauses which we are all aware caused some concern to this chamber.

I am sure that some honourable senators may have had social engagements this evening, but most of them ended an hour and a half ago. I think it is unfortunate that there was not a better attendance.

I would certainly entertain the view of any other senators on this matter. I will do nothing to restrict the legitimate rights of the opposition senators to put forth their views on this. I would be pleased to hear from them on this matter.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE*APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. H. A. Olson moved pursuant to notice of Monday, April 10, 1978:

That a special committee of the Senate be appointed

(1) to inquire into any matter relating to the planning and construction of the pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada described in the Bill C-25, intituled: "An Act to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto",

(2) to consider, in particular, all reports, orders, agreements, regulations, directions, recommendations and approvals referred to in the said Act, and

(3) to report to the Senate thereon at least once in each session of Parliament during the period of the planning and construction of the pipeline; and

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee.

He said: Honourable senators, I discussed this matter earlier today with the Leader of the Opposition and other honourable senators, and it is my understanding that there need be no debate on the question.

Senator Flynn: I have one point to put on the record in this respect.

We can debate it tonight. There is no problem in doing that, but it will not be very useful because, with dissolution coming, this committee will have no power to do anything until the new Parliament assembles in the fall. This is, more or less, an empty gesture, but it may be symbolic.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, April 13, 1978

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Department of the Environment for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1977, pursuant to section 7 of the Department of the Environment Act, Part I of Chapter 42, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

Report of the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency for the year ended December 31, 1977, including its financial statements and the auditors' report thereon, pursuant to section 31 of the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, Chapter 65, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

Report of The Canadian Wheat Board for the crop year ended July 31, 1977, including its financial statements certified by the Auditors, pursuant to section 7(2) of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, Chapter C-12, R.S.C. 1970.

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Macnaughton, on behalf of Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-18, to amend the Anti-Inflation Act and guidelines, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Hicks: With leave, now. In explanation, I will be leaving this afternoon and will not be here tomorrow to move the third reading.

Senator Flynn: Someone can move third reading on your behalf.

Senator Hicks moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

FISHING AND RECREATIONAL HARBOURS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Smith (Colchester), Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the following report:

Wednesday, April 12, 1978

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to which was referred Bill C-2, intituled: "An Act respecting the administration and development of certain fishing and recreational harbours in Canada," in obedience to the order of reference of Wednesday, February 22, 1978, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Although it did not amend the bill, your committee reports that it held five meetings during which there were lengthy discussions with the Minister and his departmental advisers. As a result of these discussions, your committee is pleased to report that the Minister has made certain undertakings, one of which is an undertaking that when the Act is next amended, subclause 19(2), dealing with the redelivery by order of the court of any seized vessel or goods, will be amended so that the amount and form of the security to be given for the redelivery is determined by the court rather than the Minister.

With respect to clause 8 of the bill, the Minister has given an assurance that a clause will be contained in every lease of a scheduled harbour, as defined in the bill, ensuring that access to such harbours is not denied to any person during the term of the lease.

With respect to clause 10 the Minister assured your committee that the Public Service Commission would be consulted to obtain its views as to the proposed method of appointing enforcement officers.

Your committee reports that the Minister has also undertaken to re-examine certain clauses of the bill with a view to considering the possibility of amending these clauses in accordance with the suggestions and observations made by your committee. The provisions involved in this undertaking by the Minister are the following:

- (1) Clauses 11 and 15: These clauses relate to the seizure and detention of vessels and goods and contain the expression "reasonable grounds". Consideration will be given to replacing these words with the expression "reasonable and probable grounds".
- (2) Clause 14: This clause relates to the authority of an enforcement officer to remove an abandoned vessel to such place as he "deems suitable." The Minister has undertaken to consider amending this clause to delete the word "deems" in order to permit the courts to rule on the matter of the suitability of the place to which a vessel has been removed.
- (3) Subclause 16(3): This subclause relates to the protection of persons claiming an interest in any forfeited vessel or goods. A suggestion has been made regarding the possible inclusion of applicable provisions of the Fisheries Act instead of their incorporation by reference.

(4) Clause 18: This clause relates to the return of a seized vessel. Your committee considered the period of 21 days during which the Minister must either return the vessel or apply for an order authorizing its sale. The Minister has undertaken to review the time allowed to determine if this period can be shortened.

(5) Clause 25: This clause, which must be read with clauses 12 and 20, relates to the authority of the Governor in Council to designate by regulation the offences under the Act or the regulations that will be subject to a fine not exceeding fifty dollars, all other offences being subject to the maximum penalty of $25,000 or six months. The Minister has undertaken to review the residual power contained in this provision whereby certain offences may be determined to be subject to the lower penalty.

Respectfully submitted,

George I. Smith,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Côtteau moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

JAMES BAY AND NORTHERN QUEBEC NATIVE CLAIMS SETTLEMENT ACT

REVOCATION OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL—NOTICE OF MOTION

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, with leave, I give notice that later this day, I will move:

That orders P.C. 1978-503, P.C. 1978-504 and P.C. 1978-505, dated February 23, 1978, made under paragraph 4(1) (a) of the James Bay and Northern Quebec Native Claims Settlement Act, approving, giving effect to and declaring valid certain agreements amending the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement be revoked; and

That order P.C. 1978-502, dated February 23, 1978 made under paragraph 4(1)(b) of the said Act, approving, giving effect to and declaring valid an agreement to which the Government of Canada is a party with the Naskapi Indians of Schefferville, Quebec, concerning the native claims, rights, title and interests that such Indians may have had in the territory defined in the Act prior to its coming into force be revoked.

Honourable senators, I speak to the question of leave. As it is explained to me, the motion has to do with certain provisions of the James Bay and Northern Quebec Native Claims Settlement Act, which was passed by this Parliament about a year ago, and is chapter 32 of the Statutes of Canada, 1977.

There have been four supplementary agreements made under the provisions of that legislation. These agreements are valuable to the native peoples in northern Quebec. There is a danger that if the motion is not considered by the house shortly, the implementation of all these agreements may be delayed appreciably and, I think it can properly be said, to the detriment of the native peoples of the area. I will, of course, be explaining the detail of the matter in due time, but if leave could be granted to allow the motion to be presented later this day, I think the Senate might consider this proposal favourably.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: Would the honourable senator say when the day provided in the bill would expire, normally?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I am not quite sure whether I understand what the honourable senator means by "the day when it would expire," but perhaps I could take just a moment and say this. These agreements are required to be ratified by order in council and tabled, and when they are tabled, if there is no parliamentary action, after the expiry of 30 sitting days of Parliament the agreements and the orders in council which approve of them come into force and effect.

That time will run out, it is said, on April 27. I am making no predictions about certain cataclysmic events that may happen between now and then, but I understand from rumours I have heard that there is a possibility that Parliament may not be sitting at that time. I think that is perhaps the point the honourable senator makes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government why the usual motion that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until next Tuesday has not been made? Is it the intention to sit tomorrow? I should like to know what the program is.

Senator Langlois: I did not move the motion for the adjournment of the Senate at this time because there is a possibility of more legislation coming from the other place this afternoon. I would suggest, after we have completed the Orders of the Day, that we adjourn to the call of the bell later this day, at approximately 8 o'clock. If we do that, we will likely have to sit tomorrow morning.

Senator Flynn: If no legislation comes before us before 8 o'clock, do you propose moving the motion to adjourn until next Tuesday?

Senator Langlois: It is very likely that will happen.

Senator Grosart: Would that be at 8 o'clock or 6 o'clock?

Senator Langlois: To the call of the bell. It would be at approximately 8 o'clock.

THE CONSTITUTION

REPORT OF ONTARIO ROYAL COMMISSION ON CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, yesterday a question was asked by Senator Olson with respect to the report of the Ontario Royal Commission on Constitutional Reform. He asked the following question:

May I ask the Leader of the Government if the government has received a copy of, or been apprised of, the report of the Ontario Royal Commission on Constitutional Reform? If so, does the federal government intend to respond to this report, especially regarding those recommendations dealing with certain important federal institutions such as the Supreme Court and the Senate of Canada?

The answer to that question is no.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

MINERAL EXPLORATION ACTIVITY IN BAKER LAKE AREA— INQUIRY RE QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, on December 13 last, I placed a question on the Order Paper regarding—

Senator Flynn: What date was that?

Senator Austin: December 13 last.

Senator Grosart: What year?

Senator Austin: Last year. I am always pleased to help Senator Flynn in understanding what I am trying to do.

This question was with respect to the Baker Lake area, and with respect to the government's freeze on uranium exploration in the Baker Lake area.

I understand that there are substantial rumours about the government's "unfreezing" the freeze, and that members of the Baker Lake community are quite agitated about that possibility and the alleged jeopardy to that particular community if uranium exploration does go ahead.

Therefore, I ask the Leader of the Government whether the government has taken a decision not to continue with the exploration freeze in the Baker Lake area, and whether members of the Baker Lake community have made submissions to the government in that respect?

Senator Perrault: I must take that question as notice. I should apologize for the long delay involved in providing an answer to the honourable senator's question. An investigation will proceed immediately.

Senator Flynn: Second notice.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, I should like to draw your attention to the presence in the gallery of Mr. Joe Morris, who served the Canadian Labour Congress very competently for many years, and who is now the immediate past president. Accompanying Mr. Morris are his advisers, Mr. Major and Mr. Lang.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, on your behalf I also welcome a delegation of Congressional Fellows of the United States of America who are spending a few days in Ottawa.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION TO REFER BILL TO STANDING COMMITTEE NEGATIVED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Grosart that Bill C-8, to amend the Canada Labour Code, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, this motion speaks for itself. The idea is to give a day in court to all those who have asked to be heard on this motion. I do not suppose it meets any objection.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the proposal advanced by Senator Flynn is an interesting one.

Senator Grosart: It was proposed by me.

Senator Perrault: I think it should be said at the outset that we had a unique experience in the Senate last night. Many honourable senators were present for the study of Bill C-8 in Committee of the Whole. I believe that all of us, regardless of our political affiliations and persuasions, were impressed by the fact that the Minister of Labour, the Honourable John Munro, spent over five hours with us. I am sure he discovered, among other things—perhaps he knew it in advance—that the Senate has a keen interest in labour-management relations and other legislation which comes before it, and that it is not a rubber stamping group or organization.

Senator Flynn: Who would suggest that?

Senator Perrault: True, I am certain that no sane person would suggest that. I am sure that all of us were impressed by the direct nature of the replies the minister gave to questions asked about the various clauses of the bill.

In the course of consideration of Bill C-8, as it has proceeded through Parliament, a number of briefs have been submitted to honourable senators and to the appropriate committee in the other place. I should like to read into Hansard the names of the organizations who have submitted briefs to a committee of Parliament in the other place. Of course, this process certainly does not rule out the possibility of groups appearing before a committee here at some point. The groups are: Air Transport Association of Canada; Bell Canada; the Board of Trade of Metropolitan Toronto; The Canadian Bankers' Association; The Canadian Association of Broadcasters; Canadian Construction Association; Canadian Labour Congress; Canadian Manufacturers' Association; Canadian Chamber of Commerce; Canadian Motor Coach Association; Canadian Steamship Lines; Canadian Railway Association; Canadian Railway Labour Association; Canadian Trucking Association; Cape Breton Development Corporation; Christian Labour Association of Canada; Confédération des syndicats nationaux; Fédération des travailleurs du Québec; L'Union des artistes; Miss Betty Garbutt; Canadian Grain Handling Industry; Grain Services Union; Retail Council of Canada; Saskatchewan Federation of Labour; Telesat, and the United Transportation Union.

The clerk of the House of Commons committee reports that only two groups who requested to make oral presentations could not be included in the committee schedule. These were the Canadian Motor Coach Association and the Board of Trade of Metropolitan Toronto.

Additionally, the B.C. Maritime Employers, the Manitoba Federation of Labour, the Alberta Federation of Labour, the Business Council on National Issues, and the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association were heard.

In addition to that there were literally hundreds of consultations from coast to coast, both individually and with organizations and associations in all provinces.

The fact is that Bill C-8 has been under preparation for a period exceeding two years. It is regarded by the Government of Canada—and obviously by the opposition parties as well, who gave their unanimous support to this measure in the other place—as a very important piece of proposed legislation on behalf of the working people of this country, and as a measure designed to improve labour-management relations in this country.

● (1430)

Last night the bill was given virtually unanimous approval in Committee of the Whole. Our deliberations here extended to almost midnight.

I know, however, that there are many honourable senators who would like to have the Senate give an additional hearing, a full hearing, to all the groups I have listed, and perhaps several more. All of us are aware of the fact that there are certain deadlines looming for this Parliament of Canada—deadlines which would make it literally impossible for all these groups to be heard. If we meet the requests that have been received from certain groups to be heard now with repeated and new arguments, with variations of the views that they set forth in the other place, if we give those groups the kind of attention Senate committees traditionally give to important representations, the process might take days, perhaps even weeks. Within the timeframe available to Parliament, with the imminence of a national election—and there is no mystery about that possibility—the Senate literally could not deal with this measure in committee, hear all these groups and report back to Parliament before prorogation.

I fully support the view that groups who feel they have legitimate, important views that should be heard by the Senate should have the right to be heard. I think we are faced here with certain parliamentary imperatives while at the same time assuring that our democratic traditions in this chamber continue. At the same time, I think none of us would wish to see left on the order paper such an important piece of legislation, legislation which would bring undoubted benefits to thousands of Canadians—legislation which is the product of long weeks and months of intensive consultation with all sectors of society.

While I cannot find myself in support of the proposal made by Senator Flynn to refer the bill to committee—

Senator Grosart: It was not Senator Flynn. Wake up!

Senator Flynn: By Senator Grosart.

Senator Perrault: By Senator Grosart, backed by his leader.

Senator Grosart: Led by his leader.

Senator Langlois: I thought it was the other way around.

Senator Perrault: I want to give this commitment to the house. I shall undertake the appropriate initiative in the near future to have the subject of labour relations in the federal sector referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. I certainly hope that all groups not heard on the subject of Bill C-8, and indeed many of those who will have been heard if the committee should so decide, would appear before that committee to state their views—indeed to state ways in which they think the Labour Code of Canada should be changed at some future date.

The proposal contains the possibility that the committee will wish to propose changes in not only the Labour Code but other legislation affecting labour-management relations in the public sector. In other words, with this proposal to have a standing committee take the proper time which these groups deserve, they can be heard at length, if the committee desires, on certain aspects of labour-management relations in the public sector.

Some honourable senators—this was evidenced last night in the discussion with the Minister of Labour—have suggested that certain sections of the bill still cause them a degree of concern—two sections in particular. I have just received a communication from the Minister of Labour, which I would like to read:

The minister and his department give the commitment that during the next few months they will seek the re-establishment of a labour-management advisory committee within federal labour jurisdiction which will: (1) pay particular attention to the effects of these amendments to the Canada Labour Code; and (2), maintain in collaboration with the minister and his officials an ongoing scrutiny of legislation and programs in this field.

Honourable senators, I have received this commitment from the Minister of Labour in writing and I desire honourable senators to know that it is the intention of the minister to make certain that at all times all sections of this bill work in the manner in which they are intended to work, which is to serve the interests of the working men and women of this country and those who sustain the economic viability of this nation, whether in labour or in management.

I oppose this motion not in any vindictive spirit at all—because I know it is well intentioned—but because this motion, if adopted, could well result in a splendid bill, one of undoubted merit, dying on the order paper, thereby depriving thousands of working people from coast to coast of the undoubted advantages which would flow from it. I urge honourable senators to defeat this motion and to proceed to third reading. Let us put this bill on the statute books of Canada. Let us see how it works. With the commitment given to us by the Minister of Labour and the commitment I have given here that we will be ever watchful of the rights of groups and organizations to be heard in this chamber, let us see whether we can really advance the cause of labour-management relations in this country in the way in which I think the bill is designed to do.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: As a new member of this chamber I certainly appreciate the encouragement that honourable members have just given me. I hope I can live up to whatever expectations they might have with respect to my performance. However, I doubt if my performance could be as persuasive and as well rounded as that to which we have just listened from the lips of the honourable leader on the government side, because he certainly impressed me with his ability to deal with problems of this nature in a way which would attract the largest measure of support. I only regret that I cannot really include myself among those who are persuaded by his eloquence, because it seems to me that if I know anything about the function of the Senate—I agree that I have a great deal to learn—one of the important duties that we have here is to provide a sounding board, to provide a forum before which members of the general public and others interested may come to discuss matters that are before the Parliament of Canada. I have the impression that, while it is not always possible for the other house to devote the attention to these matters which they might like, we are, perhaps, a sort of safety net to catch those who fall through the chinks and to hear those who wish to be heard on matters which come before the Parliament of the nation.

● (1440)

In this particular instance we know that there are groups who wish to be heard in respect of matters on which they had no opportunity to speak before the committee of the other house. I was very impressed with the recital of hearings and work of that committee. I think it is very good. However, it seems to me that what we have been debating here in the last little while has to do with the two clauses referred to by the Leader of the Opposition, one which would restrict the right of appeal and the other having to do with the retroactive nature of certain clauses of the bill which, if I am correct, were adopted by the other house on April 7 after they had heard all the representations from these people. As a result, those who object to the changes which were made so late in the progress of this bill—it has been making the rounds for two years, I understand—now wish to be heard again. They want an opportunity to explain their views on these new matters which were introduced subsequent to their original submissions.

That seems to me to be a perfectly reasonable and simple proposition for this house to accept. I do not believe it is the desire of anyone to have this bill referred to committee for the purpose of going over all of the ground that has been so well covered on previous occasions. The intention of the mover and supporters of this motion is that the bill should be referred to a standing committee so that we can deal with two specific points which have not been discussed before any committee of Parliament that I know of, and in respect of which people have asked to be heard. There aren't very many of them, but they are important. I know of only four—the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Broadcasting Association, and the Canadian Trucking Association, and I have also had a personal inquiry from one of the banks, which may well be speaking on behalf of the banks of Canada.

If we proceed as the Leader of the Government suggests, these people will not be heard. The Leader of the Government made a very reasonable and, I think, worthy attempt to meet this situation by giving us the undertaking of the minister that at some time in the future there would be an opportunity for a special body to be convened before which these matters and any others could be ventilated. However, his suggestion has the not inconsiderable defect of being after the fact. We are being asked to pass this bill now. If we were to have the bill referred to committee, we would probably be able to hear these people on Monday, and my hunch is that that would still be a good date for us.

The Leader of the Government shakes his head. He may know more about it than I do. However that may be, I would like to follow him up in his accommodation attitude here this afternoon and put forward a proposal which I think might meet the needs of all and the desire of those who wish to make further representations on this measure, and I urge him to accept it.

I note that clause 75 of the bill states:

This Act or any section or sections thereof shall come into force on a day or days to be fixed by proclamation.

That offers us a way out of this dilemma. I wonder whether the Leader of the Government can give the Senate the assurance that two clauses with which we are concerned will not be among those which are proclaimed in the immediate future. If these were left in limbo and not proclaimed, we would have an opportunity to deal with the matter at a more leisurely pace at some future time. No one's interests, I suggest, would be seriously impaired if that course were followed.

My suggestion to the house is that we ask the Leader of the Government to give us the assurance, if he can, that the proclamation of those two clauses in question will be delayed. The rest of the bill, which he speaks so highly of, could then go forward without any let or hindrance. If the Leader of the Government does not wish to give us that assurance, then I, for one, would be willing to support Senator Grosart's motion that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I shall endeavour to be brief in my remarks. After receiving notice of Senator Grosart's motion last evening, I devoted a few hours to the reading of authorities on parliamentary procedure to satisfy myself as to the effect of such a motion, if passed. As a result of my reading, I had to come to the conclusion that the effect would be mainly an exercise in futility, because once the house, sitting in Committee of the Whole, after a thorough clause-by-clause study of the bill, has passed the bill without amendment, there is no provision for a creature of the house, whether a standing committee or a special committee, to either review or revise that decision.

My main authority for this proposition is found in May—

Senator Flynn: May I ask the deputy leader if he is rising on a point of order?

Senator Langlois: No, I am speaking to the motion.

Senator Flynn: As I understand your remarks, you are saying that the motion is irregular in some way.

Senator Langlois: No, I am not rising on a point of order at all. I am merely making my comments, as I am entitled to do, on the motion before the house. In preparing to speak to the motion, I endeavoured to determine the effect of such a motion, if passed.

Senator Grosart: But you agree that the motion is in order?

Senator Langlois: The motion is in order, yes. I agree with that. My position is that this motion would be merely an exercise in futility, because nothing that the committee to which this bill might be referred does could change the unanimous decision of the house. We could not have a creature of this house reviewing or revising a decision made by its main body, or creator, if you wish to put it in those terms, and I found support for that proposition in May.

I apologize for not being able to give the house the reference, but May says that this could take place only if there were some particular or special circumstance, such as new evidence having been brought before the Senate—or the House of Lords, in the case of Britain—which would warrant such a review, or in the case where there were some very important amendments brought in by the Committee of the Whole which could affect some other sections of the act. Otherwise, the decision of the Committee of the Whole should not be altered by any decision of a committee of the house.

I received a number of telephone calls this morning on this matter, most of which came from management people. I was on the telephone for quite a while with these people, one of whom called on behalf of a broadcasting chain of Quebec. I do not want to involve anyone, so I will not mention the name—

Senator Flynn: Everyone knows.

Senator Langlois: That may be. When I said "of Quebec", I was not referring to the city of Quebec but to the province.

This broadcasting chain objected to the amendment which brings about a degree of retroactivity in the bill. This, apparently, is the only point they wanted to put before us. I readily admitted to the gentleman who called that I was impressed by his argument. However, I pointed out to this gentleman that even if the Senate agreed to refer this bill to one of its committees, it would only be a gesture in light of the decision made last night in Committee of the Whole to report the bill without amendment.

I asked him what his view would be if we were to give him an opportunity to be heard by the committee knowing beforehand that there is nothing we could do. He replied, "That is not what we want, because it would be a waste of time for you and for us." I think that is the situation.

• (1450)

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. May I call the attention of my honourable friend to rule 58 dealing with reconsideration? Rule 58 reads:

At any time before a bill is passed a senator may move for the reconsideration of any clause thereof already carried.

So therefore I feel there is no question that this agreement could not be raised if, as a result of a committee's report, an honourable senator wished to move for reconsideration.

Senator Langlois: May I first answer the first question? I am in agreement with that. One could move anything on third reading. If the motion before us were carried, it would merely have the effect of satisfying those who wish to be heard, knowing in advance that there is nothing we can do about it. That is why I prefer the alternative suggested by my leader; that is, a commitment from the minister to the effect that at a future date—probably in a few months—we will have a special committee appointed to consider the implications of this bill, possibly even before the bill is proclaimed. Whether there is a possibility of that, I do not know. I have not gone that far into the matter, but that is a possibility.

The only thing we have in mind is to try to pass a piece of legislation which has appeared to a Committee of the Whole as being a good piece of legislation.

We are probably not getting all the publicity we should have in this place. My memory takes me back to 1970, when we went into a new exercise to consider the subject matter of any legislation in advance of such legislation coming before the Senate. This first exercise was a review of the taxation legislation at the end of December 1970. We were faced with a deadline of January 1.

The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, to which this legislation was referred, proposed approximately 54 amendments—again, I am speaking from memory—which the then Minister of Finance, Mr. Benson, could not accept, but with which he seemed to be in agreement. He gave an undertaking to the committee that the amendments would be considered at a later stage—again speaking from memory, within one year. The bill was reported without amendment. In the meantime, Mr. Benson went to another department and was replaced by Mr. Turner as Minister of Finance, and the undertaking was fulfilled by Mr. Turner.

Since then we have followed the practice of giving consideration to legislation in advance of its coming before the Senate, which enables us to organize our work in an orderly manner so that we can give consideration to representations coming from the various groups across the country.

We are faced with different circumstances today. I am not saying that we ought to have known in advance what was going to face us. We are in the dying days, not of a session but of a Parliament. Probably in a matter of days this Parliament will be dissolved.

An Hon. Senator: Hours.

Senator Langlois: We have an important piece of legislation before us. We received briefs as late as yesterday afternoon; the last one came to my desk at 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon. When we are dealing with a piece of legislation which has been in gestation and negotiation for the past two years, I think these briefs should have reached us before. Lack of publicity or communication was probably responsible for this situation.

It may not be widely known that once a bill is introduced in the other place we can receive, from that moment, representations from groups who are interested in such legislation. The Senate would then immediately pass a motion to study the subject matter of such legislation in advance of its being submitted to the Senate.

I am not blaming those organizations for not having come to us sooner. They are probably not aware of this practice in the Senate. It is a good practice which should be continued. We should publicize the practice in order that in future we will not be faced with the situation that faces us today, that in the dying days of Parliament we are faced with an important piece of legislation and there are groups that would like to be heard perhaps even for a second time. I do not mind if they have been heard once in the other place and would like to be heard again. I am in favour of that. We should obtain all the information we need before passing any piece of legislation. Perhaps on both sides there are not the communication links that should exist, but we should not put aside legislation to die on the order paper with the dissolution of Parliament. It may not come back to us for many months; probably not for two years.

We should try to be practical in facing this situation. There are some clauses in the bill that I do not line any more than anyone else, but perfection is not of this world. That is true of any legislative body.

[Senator Langlois.]

We should do our best to consider the implications of any legislation, legislation which might not be altogether perfect. We should not delay the application of its benefits just for the purpose of improving some aspects of it. We can probably do that in a few months. The minister might consider the possibility of delaying proclamation of some objectionable clauses—there is that possibility—in view of the strong representations and thorough study that was made in this house. I do not think that we should consider that our role is not being taken into account in parliamentary circles. I know that we are not getting all the publicity we should receive, but we are acting as adults and we endeavor to do a good job. We were working very hard yesterday so that attention would be paid to it by the government of the day. We should try to demonstrate a willingness to hear all those concerned with this legislation, perhaps in a few months' time, rather than face the possibility that the legislation might not be passed before the dissolution of Parliament.

It is a question of being practical and of finding a way out of the situation, which is not of our own creating. We did not create the situation. We have no control over the flow of legislation coming from the other place. We have no control over the flow of representations that come from outside parliamentary circles, but we have to arrange our schedule of work.

• (1500)

Somebody mentioned a while ago—I don't know if it was Senator Roblin or Senator Flynn—that there might be a way of getting some support in hearing these representations. But, honourable senators, we are not an elected body; we are not looking for support. We are not looking for publicity, and we shall not be individually affected by the results of the coming election. We will be here after the election, no matter what happens and no matter what the decision of the people of Canada is. We will still be here talking on behalf of the people of Canada, and working in their best interests. So I hope we will consider this legislation and the motion before us in that spirit, and in that spirit alone.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in response to the invitation directed to me by the Honourable Senator Roblin, I have been in contact with the minister, and I have before me a communication from him which, with leave of the Senate, I propose to read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: The minister wishes to inform the Senate as follows:

The minister intends to confer with interested and affected parties both as to the effective date of significant provisions of Bill C-8 and as to their views concerning administrative policy in connection with their application.

I have been assured that after the passage of this legislation the groups concerned about these two sections will be contacted and will meet with the minister to discuss the proclamation date of those sections. This information may be relevant in view of Senator Roblin's suggestion.

Senator Grosart: May I ask the Leader of the Government if he is suggesting this as an assurance by the minister that he will accept the proposition put forward by—I was going to say Premier Roblin—Senator Roblin?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not wish to mislead the house. The assurance suggests the possibility of postponing proclamation if sufficient grounds can be cited by the interested parties. I think this is the only reasonable response that can be given by the minister who has the responsibility to make his judgment only after all the facts have been studied.

Senator Cook: Honourable senators, when the Senate is reviewing legislation, the consideration given by its standing committees is, I think, even more important than the debate on second reading. To pass legislation without having fully informed ourselves by hearing evidence from citizens who would be affected by the legislation is to pass legislation blindfolded. As it is our duty to review legislation already passed by the House of Commons, it would be just plain silly to suggest that we need not refer this bill to a standing committee because it has already been passed by the other place and that the same witnesses were heard by the Commons committee.

The issue is more important than this bill. The Senate is justly proud of the work done by its committees, and unless there are some exceptional reasons all bills are referred to a standing committee. In my view, the very large and important groups which continually appear before our committees is striking proof that taxpayers generally appreciate and value the privilege of expressing their views to the Senate through our committees. To refuse referral to a standing committee will be a disservice to all those interested in and affected by this important and far-reaching bill, and to the Senate itself.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, I think this is outside the bill which is before us. There are important points in what we are discussing, and I want to stress one—the problem of relationships between this house and the House of Commons. I think that bills or any documents coming from the other place to the Senate do not have exactly the same weight as far as the Senate is concerned. What I mean is that we are not all the time in the same situation. If we receive a bill that has been passed in the Commons on division, after a vote or after a fight in committee, and if we feel that the population really is not in agreement, then, of course, I think we have a definite role to play. We are not then in the same situation as we are when we have a bill before us that has been adopted unanimously by the House of Commons, and not only that but a bill which having been referred to a committee has been unanimously accepted by that committee. In addition to that two or three amendments have been presented, and that means that special attention has been given by the house to those amendments, and after studying them they have said, "We all agree."

I am telling you that we are not in the same position as we would be if in the committee and in the house there had been division. I do not say that we do not have the right to intervene, and those who do not understand that do not understand the relationship between the two houses.

I think we all agree, honourable senators, that we should have the right to refer any piece of legislation to a committee if we feel it should go there. We have that right, and I do not think that should be contested at all. But this is not a philosophical exercise that we are indulging in this afternoon. We are studying a specific case. This is Bill C-8, which was adopted by the Commons in circumstances that you know about, and all the representations that have been made there have been listed here. I can repeat that list, but you already know it. There have been representations by labour, management, banks, and chambers of commerce—everybody was consulted.

But the argument of Senator Flynn and other honourable senators who want the bill referred to a committee is that there were two or three amendments which were adopted and that on these the parties were not heard. But let us not kid ourselves. We know what those arguments are. I agree that there were points raised last evening and discussed at length by honourable senators, using all the arguments known by the parties that asked to be heard. We know all that. There will be no new arguments brought up before the committee concerning restriction on the right of appeal and concerning the first agreement.

If you say that in principle people should be heard on all new amendments that have been brought up, and if we refer it to committee, and if we decide to adopt some amendments, then after that I can also say, "Well, let us refer it back to committee because people have not said what they think about those new amendments we are bringing in."

● (1510)

We know that nothing has been hidden. We know that this has been discussed thoroughly. Senator Forsey, Senator Everett, Senator Flynn, Senator Smith (Colchester) and Senator Macdonald have brought forward all the arguments, and I was impressed by them. You know my thinking, however, about the powers given to the board or the minister concerning new agreements.

We all agree on the principle of referring a bill to a committee when there is something to be gained from it. But in this case we know that nothing will be gained and that nothing new will come to the surface. If we refer the bill to a committee at this moment, it will be just for the sake of doing so and for the sake of creating a lot of embarrassment at this particular moment, which is very special, as you know.

I do not think that anybody in this country can say at this stage that they would be frustrated because the Senate passed Bill C-8. We know the arguments of all those who spoke last night in the Senate to the effect that if we hear these people they will bring new arguments forward. But we know very well that they will not do that.

I have been on the telephone all morning. I know all their arguments, you know all their arguments, and those arguments have been repeated here. Why refer the bill to committee on those two points when we know that the whole thing has been studied and discussed thoroughly?

I think, honourable senators, that we have to exercise our responsibility. This is a very important piece of legislation. Nobody has been frustrated. Everybody has been heard. If the bill were referred to a committee I would be willing to bet with anybody that no new legal or philosophical argument would be brought up, because we all know what the bill is about. We know what it means to put a restriction on the right of appeal, and we know how important it is. When we say that the board and the Minister of Labour have the right to impose an agreement, I know very well what it means, and I do not need the Association of Broadcasters to come and tell me that they support it. I know that, and they know that I know, and you know that they know.

We now have the opportunity, which has been offered by the Minister of Labour, to revise this whole matter and give further opinions on it. Considering all the circumstances I do not think that anyone who understands the situation can be opposed to passing Bill C-8 right here and now. I am not speaking of bad faith or good faith. I think everybody is in good faith here, even though he has his own opinion, and I am giving you mine, though I noted that even before I started to speak just now some honourable senators were shaking their heads. However, I am not the type to do that.

When the minister was here last night I had some very serious reservations on certain things, and I still have those reservations, but looking at the over-all picture I think it is in the interests of Canada that the Senate pass this bill right away.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I wish I could accept Senator Marchand's argument, but the function of the Senate, surely, is to hear representations whether they have been made before or not.

Senator Marchand, you were just saying that you saw some people shake their heads before you even started to speak. Your head is now shaking very hard, and I have not even got five words into my presentation.

Senator Marchand: I am using the same technique.

Senator Everett: I did not do that. I assure you I did not do that.

Surely part of the job of the Senate is to permit people to make representations. Whether they have made them before the House of Commons or not, or whether they are well known or not, is not the issue. A bill is before the Senate, and people should be allowed to make representations.

It seems to me that what is being suggested here is that in the interests of time, and in view of the fact that Parliament may be dissolved at any moment, these representations be confined to two issues. Those issues are that the right of the Canada Labour Relations Board to negotiate a first agreement is being made retroactive to December 31, 1975, and the other is that the right to appeal against a decision of the Labour Board is being reduced.

Those amendments were made after the hearing of representations in the other place, and it seems reasonable that the Senate, taking into account that this Parliament may be dissolved, should hear the representations of those who are interested in the legislation on at least these two points.

But I do not base my argument solely on the fact that those amendments were made after the hearings in the other place. I make my case, rather, on the point that those two amendments are repugnant. It is repugnant to say that this legislation, in respect of agreements negotiated by the board, should be made retroactive to December 31, 1975. Therefore, I find myself against it, not on the basis of whether representations were made or not, but on the basis of the fact that I do not think this type of clause should be in a bill. Furthermore, I think there should be a full right of appeal from the decisions of the Canada Labour Relations Board.

It is repugnant that the minister, in his amendments, proposes to remove two very basic rights of appeal in law. In the first place he proposes to remove section 28(1)(b) of the Federal Court Act, which gives a right of appeal if a tribunal—for example, the Canada Labour Relations Board—has erred in law. Secondly, he proposes to remove section 28(1)(c) of the Federal Court Act, which gives a right of appeal if, in this case, the Canada Labour Relations Board has based its decision or order on an erroneous finding of fact that it made in a perverse or capricious manner or without regard for the material before it.

Now, I do not really care whether representations were made or not made. I do not care if they have to be made a thousand times. These two amendments are repugnant. They should not be in any act. It is on that that I base my case, and it is on that that I am happy to support the suggestion by Senator Roblin that these two clauses not be proclaimed until an opportunity has been given to those who are affected by them to make representations on them.

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to ask one question of the Deputy Leader of the Government? He has gone to great pains this afternoon to suggest to us that we should not be concerned about the voters or the electors; that we are free. Then, in another breath, he says that we must be concerned about the dissolution of Parliament. Are we free or are we not?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I am afraid that my honourable friend was not paying attention to my remarks when I addressed this matter a short while ago. I said that our main considerations were not political; that we were here to serve the people of Canada; and that we have no political advantage in being on one side or the other. That is the way we consider issues in this house.

I mentioned dissolution of Parliament because there is an important piece of legislation before us, and because we are in the dying days of a Parliament. We are running the risk of putting this legislation aside for a considerable length of time. That is my worry, and that should be the worry of all members of this chamber. This legislation is not all bad.

Senator Grosart: Do not make a speech.

Senator Langlois: There are only three clauses which seem objectionable, to my knowledge. Are we going to throw out the complete bill because someone objects to three clauses?

Senator Grosart: Answer the question. Do not make another speech.

Senator Langlois: My honourable colleague challenged my interest in this bill and interpretation of my duty as a member of this house to the Canadian public. I am answering that question.

I received correspondence and calls from the management side this morning. They told me that this retroactivity clause was discussed and negotiated, but that they were afraid because the department sided with the trade union which is not their own. I asked them whether they wanted the Senate to be an arbitrator between trade unions and management. I told them that this was not the role of the Senate. I told them that the duty of members of the Senate is to serve the Canadian public. I try to do that to the best of my ability and conscience.

Senator Sparrow: Honourable senators, at the outset I wish to make it very clear that I am in favour of referring this bill to committee for further study. I believe it was an initial mistake not to refer this bill to committee. I shall elaborate on that later, if you will permit me.

I now wish to speak to Senator Marchand's comments regarding the bill and his remarks indicating that, if it were referred to a committee, there would be no further amendments to it.

I take exception to this, particularly when we have the Leader of the Government saying that the minister himself says that he would allow a review of those sections which concern us. The minister said, "Yes, I am somewhat concerned about certain provisions in that bill and I will make . . ."—

Senator Marchand: On a point of order. I never said that there would be no amendments. I said that there would be no new arguments.

Senator Sparrow: I do not know how Senator Marchand can make that statement. He has not heard the witnesses who might appear before the committee. Unless he has some power that we have not, he cannot know what they might say. He listened to arguments raised by senators, and explanations made by the minister. Those are the only people who were in this chamber last evening. Unless the honourable senator was listening to some other voices, I do not know how he can make that statement. We have not heard the representations from people who might very well have arguments which senators, even with their wide knowledge, may not have put forward.

I reiterate that the minister himself, through the Leader of the Government, said that he was not sure about some of the provisions in that bill. I have been in this house a long time. I have heard similar assurances given by other ministers, but within the next two or three months those ministers were replaced.

Senator Langlois: Can you give us an example of that?

Senator Sparrow: This occurred with the communications bill, the wiretap bill. The Honourable Otto Lang, if you wish me to mention names, gave those commitments, but shortly after giving them he was replaced. I can go on and mention the Minister of National Revenue and bills which the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce dealt with. Another example would be the tax bill. Commitments were made in respect to that bill which were never kept. If you wish documentation, I can give it to you. However, I am not prepared to give it to you today.

I wish to take exception to the remarks made by Senator Langlois respecting the dying days of this Parliament. We are not here to decide when Parliament will be dissolved. By law this Parliament could go on for well over a year before it is dissolved. That is not our problem.

Senator Langlois: I never said it was our problem.

Senator Sparrow: The only authority Senator Langlois has for saying this is what he has read in the newspapers. I, too, read the newspapers, and I don't know that dissolution of Parliament is about to happen next week. If he is prepared to state that Parliament will be dissolved next week, let him give us that assurance and we can get on with it.

My role in the Senate is to study legislation. I have always been assured that if a bill comes before the Senate it can be referred to a committee and, whether I am a member of that committee or not, I will have an opportunity to study the submissions made to that committee. I have always felt that it was not necessary—in fact, counterproductive, to some degree—to read what went on in the House of Commons committee. It is my responsibility to study what takes place in the Senate and in the Senate's committees so that I can make my judgment on the evidence put before us. Surely, we are a separate house of Parliament, and that is our job.

I don't know why pressure is being applied to us. We have over a year to go before the law requires the holding of a general election. I was never told that I could be satisfied with the evidence presented before a House of Commons committee. All of a sudden people are telling me to consider that. In the past I was told that our committees could study any testimony presented before them, and, as far as I am concerned, I have never restricted any person or group in respect of appearing before a committee and presenting evidence. Now, because of an impending election, I hear people saying that we are not going to allow those people to appear.

It is not my responsibility to be aware as to when this bill will come to this house. It is my responsibility to know when it does come to this house, and it is my responsibility to know when it is referred to committee, but, as I say, it is not my responsibility to watch the bill in an effort to find out when it might come to this house. I am prepared to tell not only this chamber but the Canadian people that, in the short period of time we have been given to study this bill, I do not have the brainpower, expertise and knowledge to know what is in it. Surely this chamber would allow me, as a member of the committee, the time it would take me to review the evidence that would be called before that committee.

● (1530)

The Leader of the Government in this chamber said that this bill has been before the House of Commons for two years. If it has been before the House of Commons for two years, why does it have to be before us for two days? I believe that is nonsense. This chamber and its committees have always co-operated with the government in an effort to be realistic in trying to have legislation passed, but this is certainly not the situation this time. I have seen it happen before, and it is happening again and again, and I am not so sure that it is right and proper.

I mentioned earlier that it was great to see the minister give commitments, but I am not so sure, in my own mind, that that is enough because the only commitment I rely on is that given by this chamber when it votes.

Honourable senators, I wish to tell you that I want this bill to go to committee, and I am going to vote for this motion.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, may I first say how impressed I have been by the defence that has been made for the program by the Leader of the Government and his supporters. I would only add that if I ever found myself in a jam and needed a good defence, I would like to think that they were sufficiently my friends to come and defend me because they would be a hard team to beat.

Senator Flynn: For a bad case.

Senator Molson: That is an assumption, because we have not got the case yet.

I believe that passing this bill without the fullest possible study is unwise. As the Deputy Leader of the Government said, last-minute representations made by those wanting to be heard are really inexcusable. We have every right to criticize those who now express disappointment that they did not do something earlier.

I should like to call your attention to the fact that yesterday we dealt with this bill in a very different way from our ordinary Senate practice. I do not say that we did not deal with it in the best possible way. That is not what I am trying to suggest. What I am trying to say is that we do not often deal with a major bill of this type by moving into Committee of the Whole. As we know, this procedure takes no notice, and we did it with great rapidity. People who are used to making representations to our committees may, at least in part, be excused if they felt there would be enough time after the bill received second reading and was referred to committee for them to make known their wish to appear. To that extent we have to admit that, by the unusual speed with which we dealt with this bill, we could have taken a good many people by surprise.

I do not wish to make too much of this. I understand election constraints, and speaking as an Independent, which I am, I do not think I have any right to express any opinion on that situation at all. If there are severe problems or constraints imposed by the imminence of an election, then I feel the political parties involved have every right to take what they feel is the proper course of action. I cannot criticize in any way the fact that passage of this bill is being rushed, as it is, if it is necessary, or considered necessary, for an election.

Quite honestly, looking at it coldly from the outside, I fail to understand how the passage of this bill is going to add anything more for the party in power than the mere knowledge and existence of this bill after a period of approximately two years. The intent and goodwill of the government are well known, but the fact of whether this bill is passed or not—well, perhaps I should not express an opinion at all.

The case has been made by the sponsor, my colleague, Senator Marchand, and by the Leader and Deputy Leader of the Government, that it is a good bill. I do not disagree. I feel it probably is. However, that is not quite the point of our present discussion.

I should like to call your attention to the fact that there are an awful lot of people affected by this bill—workers and employers. I should also like to call your attention to the fact that conditions in the world of industry, commerce and finance are changing extremely rapidly, and this makes me think that moving unnecessarily quickly for its passage is not really wise.

The government has probably noticed that business is not doing very well in this country. It is generally agreed that the government's handling of labour relations has been about as poor as we could possibly imagine. It seems to be a poor time to rush anything, and to hasten unnecessarily any measure that can substantially affect the business climate, the economic climate, the employment climate, the unemployment climate and inflation in this country. I believe we should take all the time that is necessary to make sure that what we do is the best possible for all those hundreds of thousands of individuals who are affected.

In my own case, I have had 40 years of business experience and I have learned to appreciate fully the overriding importance of employee relations. To impose further government standards on labour relations, having regard for the business climate in this country, may not be wise, but to do it in haste, I suggest, is very unwise. I think this is liable to work to the disadvantage of both the employee and the employer.

● (1540)

My only point, honourable senators—and perhaps I am taking too long to make it—is that I believe all those affected by this bill would have a chance of being better served if we in the Senate took all the time we felt necessary to make it the best possible bill.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I should like to say just a few words. I must confess that I am not in the least an expert in labour relations law, and being rather inexperienced as a lawyer and as a parliamentarian I still have a few doubts about the bill and the attempts to pass it as it is at the moment.

I fully understand that this bill has been studied, has been referred to innumerable interested groups and has been the subject of a great deal of discussion in the other house. I am very sorry that we got it in the last couple of days of a dying session. I understand the constraints that have been imposed upon the minister, and upon the house as well, but I guess we will constantly reiterate that this is a very unfortunate procedure that we seem to be faced with constantly. This is an important bill that will have many ramifications in many sections of our country, and we should not be expected to deal with it in a matter of hours.

Having said that, I realize that the bill has been considered for a long time by people far more qualified than I, and that, by and large, it was, as Senator Marchand said, accepted unanimously in the other place. There are two clauses, to which several honourable senators have referred, concerning retroactivity and the question of appeal. Those are two clauses that concern me greatly, and I would not want the bill passed without understanding the effect of those two clauses in particular, and without hearing further arguments or submissions.

While we have been sitting here I have read last night's Hansard again very carefully, trying to understand the questions that were put, the arguments made and the explanations given by the minister, and I still am not clear in my own mind what it all means.

I would be very happy if this bill could be referred to a committee for at least clarification of those two clauses. I would be prepared to accept the minister's undertaking that he will not proclaim those two sections until we have had a chance to hear the people or organizations who wish to make submissions. In that case I would have no objection whatsoever to passing the bill, but only on the understanding that those two clauses would not be proclaimed. However, I should like to have a further explanation from the minister and his undertaking in that regard.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I want to make just a couple of very brief observations on this matter. As I understand it, the main complaint of those who want to make representations to a committee now is that certain changes were made at the last moment in the House of Commons after they had made their previous representations. As I understand it, they are not saying they did not have a sufficient hearing before the committee of the other place. What they are saying is that after they had had their hearing new features were brought in and they would now like to be heard on those new features. I looked at the principal brief on the subject, and that seemed to be the sense of it. It was delivered to my office yesterday afternoon and I have had the opportunity of running through it. The two features they refer to are exactly the two the Honourable Senator Neiman has just been speaking about, and those features are the aspects of the bill that have caused some disquiet to several of us.

On the other hand, it seems to me that both those questions were very thoroughly thrashed out last night, almost ad nauseam I would say, certainly until a very late hour, midnight exactly, I think, or possibly half a minute afterwards. I am inclined to think that nothing further can be said on those two points than was said, was dealt with and was decided on last night by the Senate in Committee of the Whole.

In the circumstances, I am very doubtful indeed whether sending this bill now to a standing committee would really accomplish anything. I do not see how we could possibly expect to pass an amendment and get it accepted in the other place before dissolution. I do not see how we could possibly allow the people who have made representations to the government and to the House of Commons over a long period of time to repeat it all to us here, nor do I think they desire to do so.

So I am inclined to feel that if the bill now went to the standing committee it would really be, as I think perhaps the Deputy Leader of the Government said, though I failed to catch certain of his remarks, something of an exercise in futility. I am all for saying that everybody should have his hearing, that everybody should have his day in court, and when we feel they have not had a proper hearing we should give them one. But in this case I am inclined to think our doing so would be a mere gesture and would have no practical effect whatsoever; that we should find ourselves merely retreading old ground; new people would make the old arguments and the same people would repeat the old answers, and we would end up in exactly the way we ended up at midnight last night.

Rather regretfully, I shall have to vote against the motion.

Some Hon. Senators: Question.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps, honourable senators, I might be permitted to speak to the motion, as I have not done so.

Senator Langlois: Are you closing the debate?

Senator Grosart: Under our rules I am not necessarily closing the debate, because that rule applies to second reading, to a substantive motion, which this motion is not, as it arose out of an Order of the Day. It is not a substantive motion, and under our rules it is not necessarily the case that the mover of the motion closes the debate. I am quite sure that Her Honour the Speaker is in agreement with that.

I have been very impressed with the discussion on the motion, and I think we have made a lot of progress. I thank the Deputy Leader of the Government for conceding that the motion is in order, although I did not quite follow his futility argument, which Senator Forsey seems to have accepted, because to me the principle is not whether it is a good or bad bill; it is not whether it should be amended; it is not whether referring it to a committee would achieve any change in the bill. I moved the motion on the principle of the right of petitioners to be heard.

It has been suggested, by Senator Marchand for example, that there is a difference between the situation where the House of Commons passes a bill and sends it to us without a vote, without dividing the house, and where this is not the situation. I do not follow that argument, because the fact of the matter is, of course, that the vast majority of amendments that have been made by the Senate to bills have been made with respect to those that were sent here without a vote. The record will show that of the hundreds of amendments that have been made by the Senate during the last few years the majority have not been made on the basis of division of the other place.

● (1550)

I congratulate the Leader of the Government, of course, on the fact that he has moved a long way from the apparently adamant attitude he was taking last night, when he indicated very strongly that he opposed at first Senator Flynn's adjournment of the debate so that it could be discussed today. He gracefully receded from that position—

Senator Langlois: I am sorry, but in all fairness to my leader, I was the one who did that.

Senator Grosart: I will have to take Senator Langlois' word for that. I am quite sure he was the one; I would have been very surprised if he was not. However, I noted, and I believe the Leader of the Government will agree, that he did indicate at first, very definitely, opposition to the motion to adjourn. I congratulate him for consulting with his colleagues and changing his mind on that.

Senator Perrault: An agonizing reappraisal.

Senator Grosart: Yes, an agonizing reappraisal, at which the Leader of the Government has recently become an expert, and I congratulate him on that. He has recently on many occasions given consideration to motions which have been put forward and which might have appeared to have been in opposition to government policy. However, he has been very flexible, and on this occasion he has been more flexible than usual.

He has suggested many alternatives, which would certainly improve the situation, with which I agree entirely. He has gone so far, I take it, as to obtain a message from the minister, which shows definite concern for the points which have been raised by our petitioners. Senator Roblin has made a suggestion, with respect to which I saw the Leader of the Government nodding. I am not saying that he was prepared to accept it, but I believe he regarded it as another interesting alternative.

There is another, of course, which has been mentioned, and that speaks to this question of whether the approval of this motion which I have made would unnecessarily hold up the proceedings on the bill to the point at which the bill would not be given royal assent before dissolution, if we are to have dissolution. On that point I was interested in the very positive statement made by the Leader of the Government that we are going to have dissolution soon and, as far as I know, that is the first time we have had such an announcement from the government. I have been wondering for some time, as have many Canadians, whether the announcement of the writ might be made this week, next week, or months from now.

An Hon. Senator: October.

Senator Grosart: I am interested—I will not say whether I am glad or otherwise—in the definite statement by the Leader of the Government that there is going to be dissolution soon, and that that is a reason for—

Senator Perrault: There is always a possibility.

Senator Grosart: I believe the record will show that the Leader of the Government went further than saying it is a possibility. I believe he said the house will be dissolved soon.

[Senator Grosart.]

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Opposition in the other place says so.

Senator Grosart: No, I did not refer to any statement on the matter by the Leader of the Opposition in the other place. I was referring to government announcements, and the leader thinks there will be.

Senator Perrault: Mr. Clark said there will be.

Senator Phillips: Is Mr. Clark already Prime Minister?

Senator Langlois: Never.

Senator Grosart: Having said that, honourable senators, I return to the principal reason for making this motion. It was to maintain what I believe is one of the finest traditions of the Senate, that we will not deny any petitioner under reasonable circumstances his, her or their right to a day in court. For that reason I am not discussing the merits or otherwise of the bill. I rest my case entirely on that fine tradition of the Senate, that we will hear witnesses who take the trouble to inform us that in their opinion if the bill is passed in its present form their interests will be jeopardized.

All that we have been asked is to grant them a hearing. There is no petition here that we bring in a bill, or that we amend a bill. All that we are asked in the five communications that I have in my hand is that people who think their interests are affected deleteriously by the bill be heard. It has been said that this might delay the eventual passage of the bill, and I agree that that would be a mistake. I would not as a senator wish to take the responsibility for having placed this bill and the government in a situation in which the bill would not become an act of Parliament by receiving royal assent before dissolution.

However, another alternative has been suggested. If the Leader of the Government were to propose an amendment to my motion to limit the terms of reference of the standing committee to clauses 171 and 62, he would certainly find me very interested, and I would consider very carefully whether I would be prepared to accept such an amendment. This, of course, would remove the argument that we would have to call all those, the long list of those, who appeared before the committee of the other place. It would narrow it to those who are at this moment petitioners, and it has been our practice not to deny petitioners their day in court.

It has been said they came in at the last minute. Of course they did; they came in as soon as they possibly could. One of the petitions is by telegram. The petitioners are saying that they have just heard that there has been a last minute change in the bill and are concerned about it. Some of the letters go beyond that, but it might satisfy the carrying out of our tradition if we were to limit the reference to the standing committee to those two particular clauses. I am thinking on my feet, but that is my feeling at the moment. I suggest to the Leader of the Government that this is only one small step further than the concessions that he has already made and on which I congratulated him, and continue to congratulate him.

● (1600)

I think the statements he has made, the efforts he has made, to understand the feelings and to meet the requirements of these petitioners make this whole debate worthwhile. We are a long way from where we were last night. We are along the road to giving justice, if I may use that term. It is probably an extravagant term in the context, but I feel it is common justice, having in mind the tradition of the Senate, having in mind the fact that a standing Senate committee is the agency of Parliament to which people normally come when they object to what is happening or has happened in the House of Commons. After all, it is very seldom that we have petitioners before us, unless it is on a bill originating in the Senate, requesting that they be heard by a Senate committee.

With that, honourable senators, I rest the case as far as the motion is concerned. I would ask that we do not, in this important case, deny the traditional position we have taken over the years. It is not my intention to discuss the bill itself. I did not take part in the debate last night because I do not know anything about the bill. I have no position on it at all. However, it has been said, in some of the representations that have been made, that labour, management and the provinces are concerned. Whether they are concerned specifically with these matters, I do not know, but there is at least evidence before us that the concern is widespread.

We are being asked to grant a hearing to some important organizations in Canada. I might say I would take this same stand if the organizations in question were unimportant, because I think it would be—well, I will not say a disgrace, but certainly it would be regrettable if on any occasion the Senate departed from its long-held principle of a person's day in court and his or her right to be heard, especially when the request is made of us in such specific terms and with such sound rationale. These individuals or organizations could not have petitioned on these points before this time and they have nowhere else to go.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, perhaps I might be permitted to respond to the invitation extended by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. At the outset, I want to welcome the conciliatory spirit of the presentation made by the distinguished Senator Grosart. All of us, wherever we sit in the house, are interested in maintaining the traditions of this assembly, our continuing concern that minority rights, the rights of individuals, the rights of organizations, are going to be adequately protected in this country. That is the spirit of the Senate, and I think we are all imbued with that spirit.

Senator Grosart, in one of his preliminary remarks, used the words "where reasonable grounds exist for referral to a committee." What we should consider, honourable senators, is the meaning of the word "reasonable" under present circumstances. Of course, it is never unreasonable to discuss the views of people who wish to appear before committees of the Senate. From the standpoint, however, of the parliamentary deadlines which confront us—the possibility of a very early dissolution—even the referral of these two clauses, which are important clauses, could invite a great many time-consuming submissions and briefs, and requests for appearances.

Given the possible imminence of dissolution—and I am not making any specific statement on that subject; it would be impossible for me to do so because that is the prerogative of the Honourable the Prime Minister—given the possibility of dissolution, long committee hearings would constitute an unreasonable proposal if we are to advance this measure into statute form where it will undoubtedly confer great benefits on the working people of this country.

In this bill we are looking at an instrument which, in many ways, will be a pioneering piece of legislation. There are some concepts in this bill which are new and innovative. They have been brought in with the co-operation of the great labour movement in Canada as well as management representatives from coast to coast, and representatives of the various governments in Canada.

I have no doubt whatsoever that when enacted this may not be perfect legislation. I have yet to see a bill which is perfect. In this session alone, we have made in excess of 162 amendments to House of Commons bills—a fact which indicates our belief that perfection does not emanate from the other place, and the acceptance of those amendments by the other place certainly indicates that they are in agreement.

I have no doubt that at some point in the future there will be amendments to this bill, as there are every year to taxation and other legislation. The Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment bill—

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Perrault: Well, Senator Goldenberg admitted the other day, in response to a suggestion from the Leader of the Opposition, that some mistakes had been made—

Senator Flynn: Yes, but he was speaking of minor errors. We are speaking of serious errors.

Senator Perrault: Yes, there can be minor errors in bills and serious errors. All we can strive for is an approximation of perfection. We can only attempt to produce the best legislation possible, given the human resources we have from across the country.

I want to reiterate, in response to the suggestion—a suggestion which I know has been advanced in good faith and in a conciliatory fashion by the Honourable Senator Grosart—that we refer these two clauses to committee, the statement of the minister, which is that he intends to confer with interested and affected parties, both as to the effective date of significant provisions of Bill C-8 and their views concerning administrative policy in connection with their application.

What does this mean? It means there will not be any proclamation on these two controversial clauses until the minister has consulted with the groups who have these concerns. That is the government's response, given the political imperatives which exist at the present time; namely, the imminence of dissolution.

Honourable senators, a more satisfactory course of action, undoubtedly, as Senator Everett, Senator Sparrow and others have pointed out, would be to refer this measure to committee for long and detailed hearings. However, in weighing the action which the Senate may wish to contemplate in respect to any proposed measure, surely we must take into account the advantages which will flow from a given proposal, even if such proposed legislation may not have been developed to its highest and most perfect form. That is a judgment we have to make. We are continually asked to balance where the greatest good lies in relation to the time and resources available in Parliament.

I have cited a commitment from the minister that there will be no proclamation of these controversial clauses until he has met with the interested parties, and I have been assured by the minister's office that, should this bill receive third reading today or tomorrow, communication will immediately go forward to these organizations and they will be invited to come to Ottawa to meet with the minister in order to discuss their concerns. Secondly, honourable senators, let me repeat that both of these commitments are handwritten from the minister's office. It is rather unusual to have this kind of commitment from ministers. It rarely happens. The Minister of Labour—this is handwritten on his behalf—says that he will re-establish:

● (1610)

... a labour-management advisory committee within federal labour jurisdiction which will... pay particular attention to the effects of these amendments to the Canada Labour Code—

Particularly the controversial ones to which reference has been made; and, secondly, to:

... maintain, in collaboration with the minister and his officials, an ongoing scrutiny of legislation and programs in this field.

That is a commitment which will be kept by the minister if the Senate gives approval to this legislation.

An Hon. Senator: If he is there.

Senator Perrault: Within the time frame available to this Parliament in its remaining days, it seems to me that this is a fair, practical, and reasonable proposal. It is a commitment which I give on behalf of the minister and the government.

Honourable senators, a number of senators who have spoken today have said that they want a full exposition of certain allegedly controversial clauses. I can only express my regret that more honourable senators were unable to be in the chamber last night as we met in committee until midnight. Those clauses were dealt with by the minister almost to the point of exhaustion. Indeed, he was losing his voice toward the end of his testimony. He dealt with all the controversial clauses, such as those relating to retroactivity. His explanations may not have been to the ultimate satisfaction of all honourable senators, but when a democratic vote was taken among those senators who took the time and trouble to remain and listen to the arguments and to vote, the bill's clauses were approved. Yet I wonder if some of those honourable senators who have been very vocal today have taken the time and trouble to read the transcript of last night's proceedings.

Honourable senators, we are faced with the task of passing an important bill, and I would urge all honourable senators to undertake that process as quickly as possible. For the reasons I have stated, I cannot support the amendment and proposal made by Senator Grosart, but I certainly support the spirit of his recommendation.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Grosart, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., that Bill C-8, intituled "An Act to amend the Canada Labour Code," be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it. And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

FARM CREDIT ACT

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE'S ADVANCE STUDY OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

On the Order:

Consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture on the subject matter of the Bill C-29, intituled: "An Act to amend the Farm Credit Act".—(Honourable Senator Argue.)

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, if I may rise on a point of order, last evening when Order No. 5 was called, which was for the second reading of Bill C-29, to amend the Farm Credit Act, it was pointed out by the Leader of the Opposition that the next order, Order No. 6, was consideration of the report of the Agriculture Committee on its advance study of the subject matter of Bill C-29. He suggested at that time that the logical way to proceed would be to reverse the sequence and deal with the report first. I said that I had no objection to our proceeding in that way, and, as a matter of fact, the orders have been reversed as they appear on today's order paper.

Honourable senators, I believe that Senator Argue is prepared to proceed with the consideration of this report, but I do not see him in his place at the moment.

Senator Grosart: He is not prepared, then.

Senator Flynn: Do you want to do it in his place?

Senator Molgat: I can. I was at the committee and I can explain what went on, if it is so desired, or we can stand the order and proceed to the next one.

Senator Phillips: On the point of order, honourable senators, I asked the establishment who would be moving second reading of this bill and I was told that it would be the Honourable Senator Molgat, although I had assumed that it would be the Honourable Senator Argue. It is rather puzzling when you do not really know who is interested in a bill.

I would suggest that we are agreeable to having anyone move the bill and explaining it. But, for heaven's sake, move it. Don't be Grits. Just move it.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, on the point of order, I certainly intend to move second reading of the bill, but we are not at that order yet. We are at Order No. 2. In any event, I see that Senator Argue is now in the chamber, so if he is prepared to proceed I will sit down.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, the committee was quite pleased with the bill, in that it brought about the implementation of most of the recommendations that the committee had made a couple of years ago with regard to the bill that we had before us at that time. Under the present bill, capitalization is being increased from $100 million to $150 million. The increase in loan ceilings is going from $150,000 for an individual to a maximum of $200,000. In a family operation loans may be made equal to double the ceiling on a single loan, namely, to a maximum of $400,000.

In its report, our committee said that it felt that the Farm Credit Corporation should monitor loan sizes in that situation, because we felt that with the capitalization of some $263,000 being the average for farms in which the gross income is above $10,000, soon we would be at the point where the $200,000 should be raised to $250,000.

Senator Phillips: Excuse me, senator. That is gross?

Senator Argue: Gross, $10,000.

Senator Phillips: I understood you to say the gross above $10,000.

Senator Argue: Farms with a gross above $10,000 have an average capitalization of $263,000.

Senator Phillips: Can you tell me what the net would be at $10,000?

Senator Argue: No. We were not given that information. This figure was an average for farms with a gross income above $10,000.

Senator Phillips: Did you ask for it, Senator Argue?

Senator Argue: The present legislation provides for a maximum loan of $150,000 to persons under 35 years of age, and in this bill the 35-year age limit has been removed, so that anyone whom the corporation feels is worthy may be given a loan up to $200,000. The 35-year provision will remain in effect only for a person who lives off the farm and whose principal occupation is not farming. They will be given five years to establish their principal occupation as farming, provided they are under 35 years of age. They must be back in farming by age 35.

● (1640)

There are other minor amendments. Under this legislation there is recognition that loans may be made up to the full market value of the property involved. There is the removal of the $25 supervisory fee, and the increased penalty rates on arrears. The interest rate on arrears will merely be at the regular rate.

The committee felt—and this was a major point in our recommendation—that legal costs are excessively high. For example, legal fees for the sale of a farm might amount to as much as a thousand dollars. We asked the Farm Credit Corporation Board to make a report to us at a later date as to what steps they feel can be taken to reduce the cost of legal fees. Incidentally, legal fees are borne by the borrower. They must be paid at the time of the loan and are not covered by the loan itself.

There was one provision in the bill to which we objected. This is found in clause 3 of the bill, which repeals section 12 of the act. It is subsection (2) of section 12. This is found at the top of page 2 of the bill. That subsection reads:

(2) Any provision of an Appropriation Act authorizing an increase of the aggregate amount referred to in subsection (1) stands permanently referred to any Committee of the House of Commons established for the purpose of reviewing matters relating to agriculture.

We felt that there should not be an exclusive reference to the House of Commons committee, but that it should be either a committee of the Senate or a committee of Parliament.

We made these representations to the minister and to certain members of the House of Commons. Because of those representations, I am pleased to say that an amendment was provided in that committee and subsequently approved by the House of Commons which removes this reference to the House of Commons committee and substitutes the following wording:

... permanently referred to any committee of the Parliament of Canada established for the purpose of reviewing matters relating to agriculture.

That amendment puts the Senate on the same footing as the House of Commons in relation to this particular feature.

The committee was generally favourable to this legislation. We support it wholeheartedly. The only particular thing to which we objected was the reference to the House of Commons committee. Since that has been amended, I would certainly commend the bill to the house.

Senator Roblin: May I ask the honourable senator whether he said that the amount of loan could be up to 100 per cent of the appraised value of the property concerned, or did I misunderstand him on that?

Senator Argue: The market value.

[Senator Argue.]

Senator Roblin: One hundred per cent of the market value?

Senator Argue: Yes. We thought that was a good idea. The Farm Credit authorities explained to us that they have to be convinced that there is repayment ability by the borrower. If a farmer asks for a loan of $100,000 to buy a farm, the authorities must be satisfied that he is able to repay the loan, either from income derived from his present farm or income he might derive from the farm which he is purchasing. As long as there is repayment ability, they are empowered to loan to full market value. This would not happen in every case.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, there being no other senator wishing to participate in this debate, this order is considered as having been debated.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved the second reading of Bill C-29, to amend the Farm Credit Act.

He said: Honourable senators, before going into the details of the bill itself, I wish to briefly go over the background of the Farm Credit law in an attempt to show you the importance of this bill.

The Farm Credit Corporation has been in operation for approximately 20 years. It is the successor to the Canadian Farm Loan Board, which had its origins back in 1929. In the 20 years since the Farm Credit Corporation has been in operation, it has made 192,000 loans, accounting for approximately $3.1 billion. At the end of its last fiscal year it had outstanding loans of $2.2 billion. When one recognizes that this covers approximately 60 to 70 per cent of the needs for farm credit, one will appreciate the importance of this particular legislation.

In recent years provincial farm loan boards have filled in some of the gap, but still the bulk of farm credit comes from this source. If one were to look for one principle in this bill, I suppose the principle of flexibility would be the one to look to. It will allow much more flexibility to the board in its loan-granting activities.

There are a number of amendments, but I will deal with the three most important ones. The first is the increase of capital from $100 million to $150 million. This will mean that the corporation's borrowing capacity will increase from its present $2.5 billion to $3.75 billion. There is urgency in this particular amendment because, as was indicated to us in committee, at their present rate of lending funds the agency will be out of funds within the next month. It will have exhausted its supply of capital and will be unable to continue to make loans.

The second most important amendment is that the majority of age restrictions in the present act are being phased out. Where there were special provisions at age 35, these are being removed, except in one particular area; that is, new persons entering the farming profession and not being full-time farmers.

● (1650)

The third major amendment increases the maximum loan for a single-family enterprise to $200,000 if there is one qualifying applicant; and increases it to $400,000 where there are two or more qualifying applicants. I will explain the reasons for these three main proposals in a little more detail because they are really the heart of the bill.

The present authorized capital for the corporation is $100 million. Under the act their borrowing capacity is 25 times their authorized capital. That gives them $2.5 billion. The last increase in capital was in 1975 when there was an increase of about 50 per cent from $66 million to $100 million. Between 1971 and 1976 the total value of farm capital in Canada increased from $23.7 billion to about $57 billion—an increase close to 140 per cent. Therefore, we did not really keep pace in that area.

Similarly, the number of farms with annual sales of $5,000 or more per year has increased by 18 per cent; and the number with sales exceeding $10,000 increased by more than 63 per cent. Therefore, the corporation needs further capital to keep pace with the changing farm picture.

In order to meet future demands, we are also proposing that henceforth requests for additional capital could be authorized under an appropriation act. Any provision of an appropriation act authorizing an increase in the aggregate amount would stand permanently referred to any committee of Parliament for the purpose of reviewing matters relating to agriculture.

On this item I want to refer back to Senator Argue's report and the discussion we had in committee where, at that time, the bill read, "to a committee of the House of Commons." After our discussion in committee, the suggestion was made in the other place that that ought to be changed, and the amendment was made. As a result of our request it reads, "committee of Parliament" rather than "committee of the House of Commons."

Again our committee has indicated, as have other committees of the Senate in the past, their concern with this whole question of appropriation acts and the method by which they are handled. We believe it requires further consideration. However, for the time being the position and responsibility of the Senate certainly have been protected and covered by the amendment that has been made since the original act.

Although there have been these substantial increases in the amounts, I want to make it clear that the FCC will continue to be restrictive in its lending guidelines in order to stay in line with the government's restraint program. Therefore, applications will continue to be assessed according to the applicant's need for funds from the Farm Credit Corporation.

The second major amendment removes age as a qualifying factor for the lending limits. You may recall that in 1975 the Minister of Agriculture had proposed a number of amendments to the Farm Credit Act. The main thrust of that bill was to help young people to get started in farming. Since then the FCC's total lending to young farmers has steadily increased. This year almost three-quarters of all loans went to persons under 35 years of age. This represented some $410 million.

A great number of farmers, the farming organizations and the FCC advisory committee, have made recommendations to the minister on this subject in the past few years. One of the points they have made regularly is that the need for farm credit does not magically stop at age 35. The present amendments extend these advantages to all farmers. Nothing is taken away from young farmers by these amendments. Their position is in no way decreased. The advantages are really extended to all others.

Experience has shown that under the previous legislation there was a tendency to force people into restructuring their farm operations because of the age 35 provision. It meant that sometimes legal changes had to be made to qualify a spouse or a child, and it was needless legal work that imposed costs and did not achieve anything. Now the corporation can deal with the subject as each case comes up.

The 35-year age limit will remain on what is called Part IV or beginning farmer loans. That is where a borrower retains an off-farm job for a period of up to five years but before he principally becomes engaged in farming.

The third major amendment is the one regarding the amount of each loan. Capitalization, in all its forms, has been increasing steadily in agriculture, and every indication is that it will continue. Many of the costs of technological change cannot be paid for immediately out of current income; time is required.

We are all familiar with the cost-price squeeze that farmers have found in the past few years, and in many cases they have been forced to get more capital to extend their repayment period. Therefore, the third amendment deals with the increases in the lending limits.

At the moment the limit is $100,000, as I indicated, for a standard farm loan; and $150,000 for young farmers. The new limit is going to be $200,000 for any single farmer.

This loan limit applies to farm units as well as to applicants. So the maximum loan for a farm operated by a farmer and a child, or by partners, presently is $100,000 or $150,000, depending on age. If this bill is approved, the Farm Credit Act would provide a new loan limit of $200,000 for each qualifying operator, or $400,000 for each farming unit if there are two or more qualifying operators. We feel this will facilitate joint operations. It will encourage greater efficiency, and it will provide for a smoother phasing of the young operators into the family farm business.

These amounts, I know, appear large if you do not look at what farm costs really are today. For example, for a grain livestock operation in Alberta of some 1,000 acres or so, the present capital cost is something in the neighbourhood of $400,000. In Saskatchewan, on the Regina plains, a two-section wheat farm, which is not an excessive unit under present circumstances, would probably cost over $500,000. In Ontario a 75-cow dairy farm would cost more than $300,000. Therefore, it is obvious that the present capitalization, while it sounds like a large amount, is not at all out of line with the needs.

On looking at the proposed amendment, I recognize that some may say that raising the loan limits, removing the age limits and adding capital to the corporation, may have an inflationary effect on land values. This has always been a problem in the provision of capital for farm purposes. However, farmland gets its value mainly because of its capacity to produce income, and it is really the economic conditions and the level of income produced that is the main long-term determinant of land prices, not credit. This excludes, of course, the pressure of other activities, such as the growing need for housing near big cities, that tend to artificially increase farmland prices. In the final analysis, the farmland price per se is based on long-term productivity.

● (1700)

There are a number of other smaller amendments included in the bill which will actually streamline the operations of the act. One is the use of market value to assess all the loans. At the moment there are two possible methods of assessing the amount of the loan; one can be market value and the other can be appraised value. This has created confusion in the minds of some borrowers. It is felt that it would be much better if the corporation had one system only, and that that be market value. However, I hasten to add that the amount of all loans is, in the final analysis, determined by the repayment ability of the proposed operation, so even if it were an inflated market value, if the productivity is not there the amount of the loan will be limited to the repayment possibility.

Another amendment concerns the supervision fee of $25 for supervised loans under the present act. Those are loans that exceed 75 per cent of the appraised value. This fee has been found to be more of a nuisance than anything else, and it frequently gets in the way of having a good relationship between the borrower and the corporation staff. It is suggested that it be removed.

Another change is the provision for losses on loans. This follows a recommendation from the Auditor General, which recommendation the corporation proposes to follow. Provision will be made for losses according to accepted accounting principles. In the past there was a separate fund for this purpose, and that will be changed.

The last amendment proposes that penalty interest be dropped. It is believed that the removal of penalty interest would make the Farm Credit Act more compatible with the spirit of the Interest Act, which prohibits penalty interest except under those acts which specifically provide for it. The act does presently provide for penalty in the case of arrears, and that also is being removed.

Those are the main provisions of the bill. I want to make it clear, as I am sure all honourable senators know, that, although sometimes people interpret legislation for farm purposes as providing gifts to farmers, this is no gift to farmers. This act does not provide grants to farmers; it provides loans which the farmers repay with interest. True, the interest is slightly lower than the market rate. The present interest rate on the loans is 9½ per cent, and the market rate would probably be some 2 per cent higher.

Senator Phillips: What will it be in six months?

[Senator Molgat.]

Senator Molgat: That will depend on the cost of money. However, this is still higher than the cost to the corporation of the money it borrows, so in those terms it is not by any means a gift to the farmers.

Over the years the Farm Credit Corporation has been a great boon to farmers throughout Canada. Under the act, loans have been made from one end of the country to the other. It is true that the large proportion has been in the prairie provinces, but by no means have loans been made only in those areas; other provinces have made substantial use of the loan facilities as well.

I believe the amendments will substantially improve the act and provide help to farmers at a time when it is badly needed, and I commend the bill to the Senate.

As a normal rule I would be proposing that we refer the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture. However, in view of the fact that the committee has already studied the subject matter of the bill, on this occasion I think there would be no purpose in referring it to the committee. I would, however, be more than pleased to answer any questions that I can at this time.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Does the election have anything to do with it?

Honourable senators, I very much appreciate the explanation of the Honourable Senator Molgat. It is always a pleasure to hear him on a matter dealing with agriculture, and it really does not matter whether it is under rule 46(g) or on the Orders of the Day. Sometimes he gets to be almost interesting on both.

I was rather intrigued by one statement he made when he said that the interests of the Senate were protected by an amendment made in the other place. I find it rather strange that a Grit would get up and say the Senate has been protected. I thought we were dealing with farmers. Would it not have been much better, Senator Molgat, if you could have risen in your place and said that we have protected the farmers? I think you would have been happier, and I would have been much happier.

Senator Molgat kept referring to the greater efficiency of farmers. He said that this legislation will make farmers more efficient. Is he saying that farmers are not efficient now? Are you suggesting, Senator Molgat, that the farmers in the prairies are not efficient? I would not dare to go back to my area in the Atlantic provinces and tell the farmers there that they are not efficient. Yet you say the basis of the legislation is more efficiency from the farmers. This I find rather strange, and I hope that later on you will explain to the Senate what you mean by your statement that farmers have to be more efficient.

● (1710)

Honourable senators, Senator Molgat stated that the Farm Credit Corporation is running out of funds, if I understood him correctly. If I am wrong, I would like the honourable senator to correct me. Since the Farm Credit Corporation is running out of money, the natural thing to do is to turn to the estimates and, honourable senators, I would ask you to take a look at the estimates, the so-called blue book, where you will find on page 2-56, under the heading "Agriculture", that for some yet unexplained reason the budget for the Farm Credit Corporation has been reduced by approximately $32.5 million. To me, it takes some sort of miracle to arrive at a situation where the amount of money available is being reduced but, on the other hand, the amount of the loans is being increased. I believe it is known that I do not look on this government as being miraculous, but it will need some sort of miracle to explain how with less money they can lend more.

Senator Langlois: You have a lot of faith in this government.

Senator Phillips: No, my honourable friend, I am sorry, you have been missing the point, or I have been wasting my time. I have no faith in this government.

Senator Langlois: You said the opposite a little while ago.

Senator Phillips: If I did, I thank you for correcting me, senator.

The Honourable Senator Molgat was very careful in his explanation of the bill not to make any reference to agriculture generally. The whole tenor of his remarks was, "We are being generous, the government is generous, the Grits are generous." Honourable senators, I do not know of any business that can borrow itself into prosperity, yet this is exactly what the government is asking the farmers to do. It is saying, "Borrow yourselves into prosperity." Later on I will mention the cost of borrowing, but I just cannot believe that the Liberal Party would be saying that at this time, when there is what Senator Buckwold described as a general malaise of the agricultural industry—and that was said in the debate we had under rule 46(g).

I do not really believe that the government is taking this bill too seriously; it is a propaganda measure. I point out to you, honourable senators, that on March 20 last the Minister of Agriculture introduced the bill in the other place. He made his speech and the matter was adjourned. But then let us go to April 6, when my colleague from Prince Edward Island, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, rose in the House of Commons, moved the same motion and gave, word for word, the same boring speech that was made by the Minister of Agriculture. Now, you may think that that was due to a misunderstanding, but I would ask you to look at the record further. The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture rose in the House of Commons and said that the Minister of Agriculture never made the speech and never moved the motion. So I do not believe that this government is too interested in farming. We on this side can readily understand the need for farmers to borrow money, but, then again, as I have already stated, you cannot borrow your way into prosperity.

Honourable senators, let us take a look at the record. Between 1973 and 1977 the costs of farm production increased by 80 points, but at the same time the returns to farmers increased by only 50 points, and I am sure that my honourable friend will wish to explain the difference. Then let us take a look at a couple of matters that are really important to farmers. At the same time the costs of labour increased by 160 per cent. The costs of building—and every farmer is aware of building costs—have increased by 92 per cent. We are left in a situation, honourable senators, in which the farmer is expected to meet 1978 costs on his 1974 income.

● (1720)

The Farm Credit Corporation, in its annual report to the minister, expressed the same view regarding the increase in the cost of farming. In its report it stated:

Lending at this time in our history is not without difficulty. The Corporation has the freedom to lend the full market value in some cases but repayment capacity remains the first consideration. Unfortunately, the capital required to establish a farm is so great that the income generated from the farm cannot always support a high debt load.

I suppose that is what Senator Molgat was getting at when he mentioned the cost of buying a farm. I do not remember the figures he used, but I am sure he would agree with the Farm Credit Corporation that unless the farmer makes a profit, there is no use in farming.

When considering a bill of this nature, the question of the farmer's debt situation arises. In 1966, the agriculture community owed $3.4 million. Today, after 10 years of Liberal Trudeauism, the agriculture community owes $9.5 million—three times what it was before the present Prime Minister took office. If some mortgages today were three times what they were 10 years ago, we would not accept it. Yet, we are asking our farming community to accept it.

Senator Molgat, during his remarks, made mention of interest rates, which is something that causes me a great deal of concern. In 1976 the average interest rate was 6.75 per cent; in 1977 the average interest rate was 7.1 per cent. When this bill was introduced in the House of Commons, the minister stated that the interest rate was 9¼ per cent. Senator Molgat says that today it is 9½ per cent. As honourable senators are aware, the interest rate is adjusted every six months. What is it going to be in October, Senator Molgat? Is it going to be 9½ per cent? Is it going to be 10 per cent? What is it going to be?

How can we expect the farmers to operate without knowing what the interest rate will be? I suppose Senator Molgat will come back and say that they can operate on the rate in existence at the time of their application. However, the average application will take far longer than six months to process. When dealing with the total cost of the farm, we must consider the interest rate. Consider, for example, that the average dairy farm in Ontario costs $300,000. With an interest rate of 9¼ per cent, that farmer would pay to the Government of Canada interest in the amount of $27,750. After he has paid $27,750, the government comes along and tells him that he cannot produce beyond a certain point. In other words, the government will lend him whatever he wants, but he had better not attempt to repay it by producing milk. To me, this is rather ridiculous.

Senator Molgat, in his explanation, said that one of the amendments would result in the Farm Credit Corporation, in its generosity, forgetting the $25 that it used to charge for supervising the loan.

Honourable senators, I suppose it is within the rules to ask a question of the chairman of the committee. I am not sure whether I should do so at this time, but I would like to ask Senator Argue whether he considers a $25 reduction really important on an interest payment of $28,000. It is going to go a long way, isn't it?

I would ask any honourable senator here whether he is prepared to borrow $400,000 to purchase a farm, and then repay it at an interest rate of 9½ or 10½ per cent. If so, I wish him the best of luck.

Another amendment in this bill deals with market value as opposed to appraised value. I suggest to honourable senators that the reason "appraised value" is being removed is simply that "appraised value" means profit, and farmers are not making a profit.

Another amendment that interests me is the idea that the interest penalty is being removed. I do not wish to embarrass the sponsor of the bill, but I would ask him whether this has anything to do with the situation of some two years ago in the province of Quebec when the government assured the dairy farmers of Quebec that they would not have to pay interest in the event that they were unable to repay their loans. I do not object to that idea. I think it is reasonable. After all, it was the federal government that created the situation in the first place.

● (1730)

I would like to ask the sponsor of the bill how many loans are outstanding. I do not want the total amount; I want the number of farm loans outstanding—the number of individuals, if he wishes. I would like to have them for the various regions of Canada.

Honourable senators, we will not deny the farmers of Canada this small titbit in the bill, but we would ask the government to have a good long serious look at the situation.

Senator Michaud: Would the honourable senator permit me a question?

Senator Phillips: I would be delighted.

Senator Michaud: I appreciate Senator Phillips' great concern for farmers' efficiency. Does not Senator Phillips think that experimental stations, new ones particularly—

Senator Phillips: I am sorry, I missed the word after "experimental."

Senator Michaud: Experimental stations. Does not the honourable senator think that a new experimental station—like the one in Kent County, for instance—can be of great value in assisting farmers to be more efficient?

Senator Phillips: In reply to the Honourable Senator Michaud, I would point out that in 1945 my father-in-law was operating an experimental station, or whatever he would like to call it. I would return a direct question to the honourable senator. If experimental stations have not been successful from 1945 to 1978, are they likely to be successful in the next ten years? Perhaps the honourable senator can answer that.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I hope you will forgive a Newfoundlander for standing on his feet to speak about farming in a fish-orientated province, but I am prompted to say a few words on the amendments to the Farm Credit Act because the honourable sponsor indicated that the Farm Credit Corporation was making vast loans throughout Canada.

In my time as a member of the House of Commons I always criticized the Farm Credit Corporation for taking the banker's hard line view of credit and its lack of attention to the provision of venture capital, and taking a chance on those whom we hope will become farmers.

Honourable senators will probably be surprised to learn that we do have rich agricultural territory in Newfoundland. In this day of high transportation costs, when we have to bring in all our vegetables, and the high cost of energy, it is vital—and this has been recognized—that a province such as Newfoundland, which is so isolated, must try to become self-sufficient in its production of farm commodities. This is necessary, and corporations such as the Farm Credit Corporation should get away from the hard lines they take and should be a little more flexible in helping farmers rather than sending out formal letters telling most prospective Newfoundland farmers that for some stupid reason they do not qualify.

I say to the honourable sponsor that he can increase the capital all he wants, he can increase the loan all he wants, but if there is no compassion and no endeavour to develop, motivate, produce and support the initiative of the prospective farmer, who can produce for an island like Newfoundland and help to reduce costs to the consumer, to become self-sufficient—as honourable senators know, a large majority of low-income people are in Newfoundland—then this bill might as well not be on paper. I appreciate the fact that it helps farmers in other parts of Canada, but there has to be a more concentrated effort to help isolated provinces such as Newfoundland become self-sufficient, and this is one way to do it.

I have not had a chance to look at the annual report of the Farm Credit Corporation for this year, but I have followed the monthly reports showing the schedule of loans granted, and the breakdown by province. If I had a breakdown of the monthly reports here, honourable senators would see that every year the amount of the loans going to Newfoundlanders is negligible. Indeed, it is a crime. It shows the passive attitude that is taken by government bureaucrats who, rather than try to help on a one-to-one basis, decline to help Newfoundland achieve self-sufficiency in the production of foodstuffs so necessary to low-income earners in the province.

I certainly have no objection to the principle of the bill, but I hope that the honourable sponsor will understand what I have said. I have not had much success in the House of Commons in pointing out the lack of attention, lack of compassion, and lack of responsibility that bureaucrats show in the provision of loans under this act. Although I commend the bill, I hope the honourable senator will point out that fact to his colleagues in the government.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Molgat speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I am prepared to answer what questions I can. Starting in reverse order with the last speaker, the Honourable Senator Marshall, I want to make it clear that the Farm Credit Corporation is a lending institution. It is not an institution charged at this point with the development of farming activities. That belongs in other departments of government. The Department of Agriculture certainly has a responsibility in that regard—

Senator Marshall: It is part of the process.

Senator Molgat: —at both the federal and provincial levels, but it is not the prime responsibility of the Farm Credit Corporation, as I understand the act.

However, there is provision for the supervision services. At the present time, until this bill is passed, they are mandatory in certain cases. Basically, those services provide advice on farming operations, business arrangements, and financing problems, and they are available to farmers who want them. I recognize that at the moment that is not the thrust of the act. It is not considered to be a development agency; it is basically a lending agency. We could properly consider that as being something that might be changed.

Referring to loans in Newfoundland, I recognize that the honourable senator, being new to the Senate, may not have the documents, but the annual report for 1976-77, at pages 26 and 27, gives the breakdown of outstanding accounts in all provinces. Newfoundland, at March 31, 1977, had outstanding loans of $4,180,000. That is in total.

Senator Phillips: Only $4 million in Newfoundland?

Senator Molgat: Yes. The interesting comparison there is in the fact that outstanding loans in Nova Scotia amounted to only $5.4 million. There is really not that much difference between two provinces, one of which would be considered more highly agricultural than the other. There is another interesting figure in that comparison as well, and that is that in Newfoundland the $4 million outstanding was in 68 loans, whereas in Nova Scotia the $5.4 million was in 238 loans. That would indicate that the Newfoundland loans were for larger enterprises.

● (1740)

I might say, as well, that when we were discussing the subject matter in committee with the officials of the Farm Credit Corporation, one of the very concerns expressed by senators—this was brought out in particular by senators from the Atlantic region—was as to how the Farm Credit Corporation apportioned its money. Did it in fact treat each region fairly? And I think we were satisfied by the replies given by the corporation, that they did, in fact, try their very best to see to it that there was proper distribution across Canada. But they, of course, can only respond to the requests that come to them from farmers for loans, and to that extent they have to ensure that they do not, early in the year, give very large sums in one part of the country, to end up later being short elsewhere. I was satisfied from their replies that they do not do this. The additional capital that they will have under this act will, of course, put them in a position whereby they should not have to restrict any area at all which may want loans.

I think that covers the specific points raised by Senator Marshall.

Coming now to the questions raised by Senator Phillips, I was not quite sure at the outset of his comments whether he was suggesting that he always likes to listen to me on farm bills, on any bills, or on none at all.

Senator Phillips: If I had the choice, Senator Molgat, it would be on none at all, but it is always a pleasure, in the alternative, to listen to you.

Senator Molgat: Whichever it was, I thank him for his comments. He covered a large number of items. I made note of some of them and I may have missed others, but I shall answer as best I can. Again, these may be in reverse order of their presentation.

Senator Phillips asked a specific question as to the total number of loans outstanding, and here I would refer again to the annual report of the corporation, where on page 6 are the highlight figures—not all the details—indicating a total at March 31, 1977, of 71,282 loans. That is the number outstanding at that date. And that compares to the total number of 192,000 loans granted since the beginning of the Farm Credit Corporation in 1959.

On the question of the penalty interest amount, I assure Senator Phillips it has nothing to do with problems of the dairy industry in the province of Quebec. The reason for the change is that this was a recommendation under the Interest Act. This, I think, is one of the very few acts still existing where there is such a penalty, and this amendment is to bring it in line with that recommendation.

As to the $25 fee for supervision, I certainly agree that if you are paying out $10,000 or $15,000 in interest per year, then $25 is not going to change the picture. The reason its elimination is being proposed is that it is not a significant amount; it does not do anything; it does not provide any revenue; it is a very annoying element in so far as some of the borrowers are concerned and, in fact, it results in a costly administrative procedure for the Farm Credit Corporation, so it was judged to be unnecessary.

Senator Phillips referred several times to “borrowing into prosperity”. That certainly is not the purpose of the act, nor is it the view of the corporation. On the other hand, it is certain that if the farmers of Canada are under-capitalized, and if they do not have access to sufficient sources of capital, then they cannot be successful.

He made a point as well about my comments regarding the efficiency of farmers. I do not believe that I said anything that was in any way derogatory in that regard. In fact—and I think most of us would agree—agriculture is probably the industry that has shown the greatest increase in efficiency and productivity since the end of the Second World War. The record of Canadian farmers is unsurpassed, and that is something we should always keep in mind as being a very important element of Canada's position in world affairs and trade. Canadian farmers are to be congratulated for that. They are the ones who did it. All the Farm Credit Corporation can do is to give them the tools whereby they can keep abreast of modern practices.

Senator Phillips mentioned my comments regarding the Senate and its role under the appropriation act. If my words were not well chosen in that regard, I extend my apologies to the Senate. What I was trying to point out was that in the first bill, when it came to us, there was a clause whereby appropriation acts would be referred only to committees of the House of Commons. This, in my view, is wrong. We do have a responsibility. I think the Senate can honestly take credit for having been the body that urged the present changes in the act. I think Senator Argue indicated this in his comments with respect to the committee, whose recommendations in 1975 are largely being acted upon in this bill. So the Senate has a role to play in this regard, and it has played its role. But if these matters are not to be referred to the Senate in future because appropriation measures will be going only to the House of Commons, then quite obviously we will not be in a position to do our job. That was all that was meant by that.

Then, as a last comment, my honourable friend referred to this bill as being a propaganda measure. Well, I did not think I presented it in that way. However, if he chooses so to take it, then I certainly agree that it has great potential as a propaganda measure. I say to him that I would think that the 865 farmers in Prince Edward Island who at the present time have loans of some $17 million would agree it is a worthwhile bill, and that it should receive support.

● (1750)

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, before the debate is concluded may I direct a question to the Honourable Senator Molgat? He referred to a number of points that I brought up in my scattered remarks, except for one. That was the reduction of the $32.5 million in the estimates for the Farm Credit Corporation. Would the honourable senator explain that to me, please?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I regret I do not have my blue book here, and I do not know what the figure refers to. All I can say about the matter is that section 13 of the present act spells out the lending powers of the corporation. It can lend up to 25 times its capitalization. The present capitalization being $100 million, it can lend up to $2.5 billion. We are now increasing the capitalization to $150 million, so it will be able to lend up to $3.75 billion. That is the total amount the corporation can lend. It borrows its money from government and proceeds to lend it out. I do not know what the figure in the blue book is. I do not have it here.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Senator Molgat.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Molgat moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of the 1977 Report of the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism, issued by the Minister of State (Multiculturalism).

Copies of Report entitled "Multiculturalism and Ethnic Attitudes in Canada," issued by the Minister of State (Multiculturalism).

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, because of my particular interest in the policy of multiculturalism, and because of my position as National Chairman of the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism, I should like to make a few remarks with regard to the tabling by the Leader of the Government of these two reports, one being entitled "Multiculturalism and Ethnic Attitudes in Canada", and the other being the report of the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators, to allow Senator Bosa to go on, since it is after 6 o'clock?

Hon Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bosa: This will not take more than a few moments.

Since the first report was tabled in the House of Commons in 1974, the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism has undergone some profound and fundamental changes in its structure. There are now five standing committees. These committees are known as follows: Media; Grants; Human Rights and Humanitarian Concerns; Immigration Policy and Orientation; Language and Cultural Development and the Relationship between Multiculturalism and Bilingualism.

The human rights committee was subdivided into four areas, dealing with the administration of justice, education, immigration and the media.

Part I of the report summarizes the findings of the committee and contains the committee's recommendations. Part II is a progress report taking into account the recommendations put forth in the council's report. Since the recognition of cultural diversity and its acceptance are interdependent concepts in the eyes of the public, the two are related in this discussion.

The council also found in its studies that the cultivation of cultural diversity and the public acceptance of cultural diversity are no simple matter, and that the government must take the lead in these tasks.

I hope honourable senators will lend their support to the council's endeavours in this area.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Senator Forsey, Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented the following report:

Thursday, April 13, 1978

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its Fourth Report as follows:

1. In its Third Report for the 1976-77 Session your Joint Committee reported that in its judgment the Postmaster General Authority to Prescribe Fees Order, SI/76-101, section 6 of the Domestic First Class Mail Regulations, SOR/76-552, and Items 1 and 2 of Schedule A to the Second Class Mail Regulations, amendment, SOR/76-553, constituted unusual and unexpected uses of section 13 of the Financial Administration Act, R.S.C. 1970 C.F-10, in that they invaded the traditional rights of Parliament to set by statute the rates of postage for letters of one pound or less and for Canadian newspapers and periodicals transmitted by mail in Canada. Your Committee also reported its doubts as to the validity of the Postmaster General Authority to Prescribe Fees Order, under the authority of which the other two statutory instruments reported were made.

2. In accordance with its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72 C. 38, your Joint Committee has reviewed and scrutinized SI/78-60, Postmaster General Authority to Prescribe Fees Order, SOR/78-297, Domestic First Class Mail Regulations, amendment, and SOR/78-298, Second Class Mail Regulations, amendment. These three instruments purport to effect further increases in the rates of postage for letters of one pound or less and for Canadian newspapers and periodicals transmitted by mail in Canada "notwithstanding" sections 10 and 11 of the Post Office Act. The instruments are claimed to be grounded in the same authority as those instruments included in your Joint Committee's Third Report for the 1976-77 Session. Consequently, these new instruments are drawn to the special attention of the Houses as constituting unusual and unexpected uses of section 13 of the Financial Administration Act and, further, as being of doubtful validity. Your Joint Committee affirms its reasons as contained in its Third Report.

3. Since your Joint Committee's Third Report for the 1976-77 Session was tabled in the two Houses, no further explanation has been made available by the Postmaster General's Department as to the validity of proceeding by Order under paragraph (b) of section 13 of the Financial Administration Act, notwithstanding Parliament's will as to the level of postal rates expressed in sections 10 and 11 of the Post Office Act, as enacted by S.C. 1970-71-72 C. 53, section 3, and S.C. 1968-69 C. 5, section 4, respectively Nor has there been any announcement that an amendment to the Post Office Act will be sought, either by specifying new rates or by granting power to the Governor in Council or the Postmaster General to set by regulation the rates now dealt with in sections 10 and 11 of the Act.

4. Your Joint Committee reaffirms its objection in principle to the use by the Crown of subordinate legislation under section 13 of the Financial Administration Act to prevail against Parliament. It reiterates its grave doubts as to the validity of relying on the general power in section 13 of the Financial Administration Act to set postal rates, to override the special enactments contained in sections 10 and 11 of the Post Office Act, to overcome the will of Parliament as to the domestic letter rate expressed subsequently to the enactment of section 13 of the Financial Administration Act, or to empower the Postmaster General to set rates when Parliament has empowered neither the Governor in Council nor anyone else to do so.

Respectfully submitted,

EUGENE A. FORSEY
Joint Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Forsey moved that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

CONFERENCE ON ALTERNATIVES CANADA

PROPOSALS CONCERNING THE SENATE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Hazen Argue rose pursuant to notice of Monday, April 10, 1978:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the recent Conference on Alternatives Canada, sponsored by the Canada West Foundation, and in particular to the proposals made at the Conference concerning the Senate of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I have been waiting for some time to move the inquiry now standing in my name. I think this inquiry is an important one to the Senate. I should like to be allowed to introduce it and then adjourn the debate. I may not be here tomorrow, and another senator might wish to speak. In this way it will be before the chamber.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate on the inquiry standing in my name.

Motion agreed to.

● (1800)

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it was anticipated that we would have before us later this day a bill respecting the postal service in Canada. I have a report from the other place indicating that progress has not been as rapid as had been anticipated on this proposed measure.

Therefore, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, April 14, 1978, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

Senator Forsey: May I ask what has happened to Senator Connolly's motion made this afternoon? It was supposed to be taken up later this day.

Senator Perrault: It is our intention to proceed with that early tomorrow morning.

Senator Rowe: Would it be advisable to meet earlier than 11 o'clock?

Senator Perrault: An attempt was made to advance the time to 10 o'clock, but the difficulty is that the other place will not convene until 11 o'clock in the morning, and there being no anticipated major action tonight, it may be impossible to obtain from the other place the proposed legislation which we hope to have before us at 11 o'clock. If it were feasible to meet at 10 o'clock we would certainly do so.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

THE SENATE

Friday, April 14, 1978

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MESSAGE FROM HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the following communication has been received from the administrative secretary to His Excellency the Governor General, which reads as follows:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

April 13, 1978

Madam,

The Governor General has directed me to to send you the enclosed message which has just been received from Her Majesty The Queen.

I have the honour to be
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa

The Hon. the Speaker: The message from Her Majesty the Queen reads as follows:

To the Speaker of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Commons,

"I have received with great pleasure the loyal and dutiful expression of your thanks for my speech at the opening of Parliament on October 18, 1977.

Elizabeth R"

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Dinsdale had been substituted for that of Mr. Hnatyshyn on the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Northern Transportation Company Limited, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the year ended December 31, 1977, pursuant to sections 75(3) and 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of Report of the Administrator under the Anti-Inflation Act, pursuant to section 17(3) of the said Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada, 1974-75-76, respecting compensation plan between School District No. 70 (Alberni), Port Alberni, British Columbia and the group of its non-teaching employees, represented by the Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 727. Order dated April 11, 1978.

List of Commissions issued under authority of section 3 of the Public Officers Act, during the year ended December 31, 1977, pursuant to section 4 of the said Act, Chapter P-30, R.S.C., 1970.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I should like to inform the Senate that later on today I will be asking for leave to revert to Notices of Motions.

Senator Flynn: With reference to the adjournment?

Senator Langlois: Yes.

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Langlois moved the third reading of Bill C-18, to amend the Anti-Inflation Act and guidelines.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FISHING AND RECREATIONAL HARBOURS BILL

THIRD READING

Senator Cottreau moved the third reading of Bill C-2, respecting the administration and development of certain fishing and recreational harbours in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

THIRD READING

Senator Marchand moved the third reading of Bill C-8, to amend the Canada Labour Code.

[Translation]

Senator Jacques Flynn: Fear not, honourable senators, I am not rising to dwell on the arguments already made on this bill but merely to voice my regret that imminent dissolution of Parliament has been accepted as valid reason to rush the passage of this bill. It is the main argument used by the mover of the bill and the government leader and this is why the Senate decided yesterday that the bill would not be referred to a special committee and that no amendment would be made to various clauses of the bill, clauses whose deficiencies, flaws and even scope have been brought out very clearly. I submit that the argument is not valid in the case of a measure that innovates very boldly in various fields.

To my mind, it would be far better for this bill to be passed in four or five months rather than too hastily. In the case of complex laws, such as the Bankruptcy Act, the Combines Investigation Act, Parliament took its time with the result that in the end when the bills were passed, we had much better legislation than had originally been introduced.

If by any chance dissolution were to be postponed, well, we would have deprived those who wanted to be heard, which is their right, to expose their grievances, and deprived the Senate of the possibility of amending certain clauses of the bill, of changing them in ways repeatedly suggested, and which almost met with the approval of the sponsor of the bill. Had dissolution of Parliament interrupted our examination, the bill would have been held in abeyance for perhaps six months, at the most; but six months is not that long when, I say it again, the legislation concerned is important and innovates very boldly.

I feel we should not adopt that attitude under the circumstances. With some bills we may be justified in proceeding quickly, taking dissolution into account. In the case of some financial bills or bills of technical nature, I agree. But, with this type of legislation, I am sorry the Senate allowed itself to be convinced that it should accept the possibility of dissolution as good enough reason to pass this bill quickly, to refuse hearings to those who had grievances to make and to refuse consideration of certain amendments. I am sorry, but I do not feel that is good enough a reason. That is why, though the bill will surely be adopted, it will be passed on division.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, I do appreciate the fact that the opposition leader has been so reasonable in his comments. For myself, it was a first and rather trying experience in the Senate. I think I come out of it enriched. I have still higher regard for the senators who took part in the debate. I do not know whether my colleagues opposite intend to have a vote or merely record their dissent. In any event, I am convinced that the Minister of Labour has appreciated the way things developed in the upper chamber. For several, I think it was an eye-opener. We can uphold our views and stand up for them while respecting one another. I think the discussion was extremely intelligent and always based on the general interests of the country.

JAMES BAY AND NORTHERN QUEBEC NATIVE
CLAIMS SETTLEMENT ACT

MOTION FOR REVOCATION OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL NEGATIVED

Leave having been given to proceed to Motions:

Hon. John J. Connolly, pursuant to notice of Thursday, April 13, 1978, moved:

That orders P.C. 1978-503, P.C. 1978-504 and P.C. 1978-505, dated February 23, 1978, made under paragraph 4(1)(a) of the James Bay and Northern Quebec Native Claims Settlement Act, approving, giving effect to and declaring valid certain agreements amending the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement be revoked; and

That order P.C. 1978-502, dated February 23, 1978, made under paragraph 4(1)(b) of the said Act, approving, giving effect to and declaring valid an agreement to which the Government of Canada is a party with the Naskapi Indians of Schefferville, Quebec, concerning the native claims, rights, title and interests that such Indians may have had in the territory defined in the Act prior to its coming into force be revoked.

He said: Honourable senators, I shall simplify this motion, and in doing so, perhaps I will over-simplify it at the beginning. The motion deals with four agreements respecting groups of native peoples in northern Quebec. If I may say so, I think these agreements are helpful to those people and should become effective as soon as possible. However, it is not immediately clear from the wording of the motion that this is the result, and that is why some explanation is required.

Honourable senators may recall that in the spring of 1977 the James Bay and Northern Quebec Native Claims Settlement Act was passed by this Parliament. It is now chapter 32 of the statutes of 1976-77, and it approved the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement which, during the course of my remarks, I will refer to as the "Mother Agreement." That agreement is dated November 11, 1975. It was amended on December 12, 1975 and approved, as I indicated, by Bill C-9 of the last session, which is now chapter 32 of the statutes of 1976-77.

Section 4 of the act provides for approval by order in council of supplementary agreements made pursuant to the general provisions of the act. We have before us today four such supplementary agreements. There are three made—and I am saying this for the record—pursuant to section 4(1)(a), and these are amendments to the mother agreement. There is one made pursuant to section 4(1)(b), and this is an agreement provided for specifically in the mother legislation, in which reference is made to a future agreement between the federal government and the Naskapi Indians of Schefferville.

All of these supplementary agreements must be approved by the Governor in Council. Thereafter the orders in council must be tabled within 15 days, and the agreements would automatically come into force 30 sitting days after the tabling, if there is no parliamentary action taken.

I should like now, before I move on to the procedural part of the problem, to say something in respect of the four supplementary agreements we have before us. Three of them, as I have said, are made under the provisions of section 4(1)(a) of the act. The first of these, Complementary Agreement No. 1, provides for the implementation of an agreement called the Northeastern Quebec Agreement, which deals with the Naskapi Indians. Complementary Agreement No. 1, would not be required were it not for the fact that the Naskapi Indians, under the mother agreement, were deprived of any rights to participate in what is known as the environmental regime. This is an agency for monitoring environmental conditions affected by projects that might occur in the area. The agency is a joint creation of both the federal and provincial governments concerned. This agreement is really a pro forma agreement to validate the rights of the Naskapi to participate in the provisions of that part of the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement.

● (1120)

The second of the complementary agreements deals with the rights of the people of Port Burwell in Quebec only. The people of Port Burwell are Inuit who have lived on Killinek Island in Hudson Strait, which is at the northern tip and just off the north coast of Quebec.

The mother agreement to which I referred earlier extinguished the rights of the Port Burwell people in all lands for all of Canada. This, of course, included certain islands off the east shore of James Bay, the east shore of Hudson Bay, and in Hudson Strait. The Inuit of Port Burwell in fact have, I am told, long-standing native rights in these islands, and Complementary Agreement No. 2 re-establishes those rights. These rights are the right to fish, to hunt and to trap, and they are very important and valuable rights to these people.

Complementary Agreement No. 3 has to do with the relocation of the community of Fort-George, which is on the west coast of James Bay, from a site which they now occupy on an island called Ile du Gouverneur. Ile du Gouverneur is at the mouth of a river called La Grande. With the development of the James Bay project, the establishment of the dams and the flooding of the countryside, this island would have been cut off. I am told it would have cost some $5 million to connect it to the mainland with a bridge. There are some 1,200 people living on that island, and that seemed to be a considerable amount of money to service them, although if all else failed this work would have been done. However, an agreement has been made with these people to relocate them elsewhere on the mainland. I am told, too, that the island is subject to severe erosion and inundation.

The agreement provides for the relocation of the people on a site acceptable to them not too far away on the mainland, and the cost, not only of relocating but of establishing the services that have been agreed to between the people on the one hand and the federal and provincial government representatives and the James Bay Energy Corporation on the other, will come to approximately $50 million. So the natives are going to get a great deal more out of these arrangements than would have been the case if the bridge had been built. It is a very important agreement for these people.

I come now to the fourth agreement called the Northeastern Quebec Agreement. This is the agreement which was concluded, and dated January 31, 1978, with the Naskapi Indians. These people, some 400 of them, were not ready, at the time the mother agreement was negotiated, to participate in those discussions to a conclusion. By that document and the subsequent legislation their rights were extinguished subject to the provisions of section 4(1)(b) of the act, which allows a future agreement to be made and recorded to modify the mother agreement. This is the future agreement now being brought into being, and this agreement confirms to the Naskapi the specific rights which they actually had at the time the mother agreement was negotiated.

I am told that as a result of this agreement they will be given the exclusive use of some 126 miles of territory and exclusive hunting, fishing and trapping rights over another 1,600 square miles of territory, plus the cost of the provision and installation of social services, schools, a hospital, health services and even a court. In addition, they will receive $9 million in cash compensation.

I am told that there is a program to be initiated, if possible early this summer, called the Hunter's Support Program, and the budget for this program alone is $60,000. Apparently it means a great deal to these people that this program should get started at a very early date.

Honourable senators, that is a brief account of the agreements with which we are concerned. Section 4 of the act which was passed a year ago by this Parliament requires this type of agreement to be approved by order in council, and on February 23 last four orders in council were passed. No. 502 of 1978 approves the agreement called the Northeastern Quebec Agreement with the Naskapi Indians; and Nos. 503, 504 and 505 of 1978 amends the mother agreement, the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement, as I have just explained.

Section 5(1) of the act requires that these orders in council be tabled in Parliament within 15 days of their issue. The orders in council, as I have said, were all passed on February 23, 1978, and they were tabled in the House of Commons on March 2, 1978, and in the Senate on March 7, 1978.

● (1130)

As I indicated earlier, the orders in council approving these agreements become effective 30 sitting days after they have been tabled in Parliament, unless a motion to revoke them has been filed with the Speaker of the appropriate house within 20 days of the tabling. The twentieth day for a motion to be made in the House of Commons expired on April 10. So the time for anyone in the House of Commons to move to revoke these orders in council has now expired. April 13 was the twentieth day for the Senate, and a motion signed by more than 20 senators was filed with the Speaker on April 12.

Senator Flynn: Name them.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Are you serious?

Senator Flynn: No, not really.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): If you are, I will do so. I was afraid someone might ask me to do that, so I had the signatures deciphered. I would be happy to put them on record.

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I gather you do not want them. At any rate, you have all heard of them. They are all estimable ladies and gentlemen.

If the motion to revoke had not been made yesterday, today would have been too late to do so in the Senate. However, it was filed with Her Honour the Speaker on April 12, and the Senate most obligingly gave me permission to make the motion yesterday and waived notice.

The long and short of the situation is that the Senate can save these agreements and put them beyond reach and beyond peril by proceeding in the way the statute indicates, and that is precisely what I propose to ask the Senate to do after a few more words of explanation.

I have said that the House of Commons is now precluded from moving to revoke the orders in council which approve the agreements. This is important. The orders in council can only become effective on the thirtieth sitting day after tabling in Parliament. If Parliament should continue to sit, that day would not be reached until April 27.

Senator Flynn: In the Senate.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Well, a sitting day is a sitting day. Let me put it the other way. If either house sits on a given day, that counts as a sitting day. So if Parliament is dissolved before April 27, the agreements will not automatically come into force. As a result, the order in council would have to be retabled in the next Parliament, and thereafter thirty more days would have to elapse before they would automatically come into force. No one knows when Parliament will be dissolved; no one knows when the next Parliament will be convoked. In any event, whenever it is, an additional thirty days will have to elapse before anything can be done under the agreements.

So what the Senate is asked to do now is apply section 5(7) of the James Bay and Northern Quebec Native Claims Settlement Act. To this end there is before us a motion to revoke the four orders in council approving these agreements. If this motion is defeated by the Senate, the orders in council and the agreements, by virtue of the provisions of section 5(7) of the act, come into force immediately.

May I read the pertinent part of section 5(7) for the purposes of the record? I shall not read the whole of subsection (7), but only the part that applies to the proceedings in which we are now engaged. It provides:

Where a motion taken up and considered in accordance with this section is not adopted by the House in which it was introduced—

That is, this house.

—the particular order to which the motion relates comes into force immediately upon the failure to adopt the motion—

Honourable senators, this seems to be a ridiculous situation, but having obtained your permission to make this motion, I now solemnly ask you to defeat it!

This is a purely formal motion. It is a process based upon the negative resolution procedure set out in section 28(1) of the Interpretation Act. I believe we all know that some regulations and orders are subject to a negative resolution of Parliament. This means that they must be tabled within 15 days after they are made, and they may then be annulled by a resolution of both houses.

Honourable senators, as I visualize it, what will happen is that at the conclusion of this debate Madam Speaker will say, "Those in favour of the motion will please say 'yea', and very quietly Senator Macnaughton and I will say, 'yea.'" Madam Speaker will then say, "Those against the motion will please say 'nay'," and I hope there will be much more noise.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, it is a very nice scenario that has been described by the mover of the motion. I was wondering whether he would tell us what to do under the circumstances. It is not a bad solution, that he and Senator Macnaughton, his co-sponsor, should say, "Yea," but what about the other 18 senators who approved this motion? Are they too going to say, "Yea" in a low voice?

I see that the Leader of the Government is back in the house. His presence will be very helpful in obtaining a resounding "Nay." I am sorry that Senator Guay is not here, because with the two of them together saying, "Nay," it is obvious that Madam Speaker would have to say, "The nays have it."

There is only one point on which I am not too clear. Perhaps it is not too important, because, after the explanation given by the sponsor of the motion, we realize the reason for it and the way that is has to be done. However, the way that I understand it is that in the other place the delay for a motion to revoke has elapsed, and that in the Senate it has not.

The orders in council were tabled on March 7. Since then, the Senate has sat for only 15 days. We would have to sit for another 15 days, which would bring us to April 27. If the delay is counted only on the basis of the sitting days of Parliament, including all the sitting days of the House of Commons, the delay would have expired here also.

● (1140)

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): That is true. It starts from the date of tabling in the Senate.

Senator Flynn: If the time allowed has expired, I would have preferred that this motion not be put, because as you say, it is somewhat silly to move something in order for it to be defeated. In any event, that is the way I understand it, and dissolution—which in this particular case is a better argument than it was when it was used yesterday in another matter—is certainly a good reason not to deprive these people of the advantages contained in these agreements, which have been signed by all concerned. There is, therefore, no problem in this regard. I agree with the scenario. I would have been happier if it could have been avoided, but it seems it cannot be, which is why I say that the sitting days from the date of tabling have to be considered for each house, and not for Parliament as a whole.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Quite so.

Senator Flynn: In the circumstances, not being one of those who signed the motion or resolution, I will be able to join with the Leader of the Government in saying, "Nay", and it will be clear that the agreements will come into force.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I thank Senator Flynn for his comments. I would just like to say that Senator Molson has sent me a note to the effect that I said that Ile du Gouverneur is on the west coast of James Bay. Actually, it is off the east shore of James Bay. It is on the east side of James Bay and of Hudson Bay.

Senator Langlois: That is quite right.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): That makes it clear. I thank Senator Flynn for his comments.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it. I declare the motion lost.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

CONSIDERATION OF FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Consideration of the Fourth Report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.—(Honourable Senator Forsey).

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator Forsey, I ask leave to give a brief explanation of this report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, in its third report, in the second session of this Parliament, your committee reported that in its judgment the prescribing by the Postmaster General of increased fees for domestic mail, and items in schedules I and II of the second class mail regulations, constituted an unusual and unexpected use of section 13 of the Financial Administration Act. At that time, in our report, we quoted the opinion expressed by two previous postmasters general to the effect that an increase in fees should not be carried out through order in council. Since then, under a succeeding postmaster general, another instance of this has occurred. His attention was drawn to the matter in a committee of the other place, and he agreed at that point in time that the Post Office Act should probably be amended in order to collect this amount. This was not done.

Now, with still another subsequent and very new postmaster general in office—

Senator Flynn: There is always a new one.

Senator Lafond: —we have the same procedure being repeated. Your committee asked for explanations, and asked the present Postmaster General whether there was any intention of amending the Post Office Act. The reply was a flat no.

In the circumstances, your committee is using the only ammunition at its disposal by reaffirming in this report its objection in principle to the use by the crown of subordinate legislation under section 13 of the Financial Administration Act to prevail against Parliament, which still has the only right to do that under the Post Office Act. The only channel open to your committee is to report the incident to both houses, which we are doing through this special interim report.

That is the case, and that is all there is to it. I do not propose to pursue it any further. Unless any honourable senator wishes to speak, or unless there are any questions, I would propose that this debate be adjourned in the name of Senator Forsey, who may be back on Monday and may wish to add something to these remarks.

Senator Flynn: That will also give a chance to the Leader of the Government to consider a reply or make some comments.

Senator Perrault: Yes, indeed.

On motion of Senator Lafond, for Senator Forsey, debate adjourned.

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege.

During the debate on Bill C-18, to which we have third reading today, I criticized certain clauses on the grounds that they were retroactive, and stated my objection at all times to retroactive legislation. In doing so I suggested that because of the retroactivity of those clauses the bill itself was retroactive, and a certain order in council to which it referred was also retroactive. Senator Hicks, the sponsor of the bill, subsequently showed me the order in council, and it is now clear to me that the order in council itself was not retroactive.

My reason for rising is that I believe that if Senator Hicks had been able to be here he would have drawn the attention of the Senate to this during the debate on third reading. It is, therefore, only fair that I should say at this time that the statement I made was not correct, although I believed it was. I thank Senator Hicks for drawing this to my attention, and enabling me to correct the record.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, April 18, 1978, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Senator Flynn: What is expected from the other place?

Senator Langlois: I do not have much of a statement to make today because there is not much expected from the other place. The only piece of legislation which is likely to come to us on Tuesday is Bill C-45.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 18, 1978, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, April 18, 1978

The Senate met at 8 p.m., Hon. Maurice Bourget, P.C., Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

Prayers.

POSTAL SERVICE OPERATIONS BILL, 1978

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-45, to provide for the continuation of regular postal service operations.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, leave will not be refused, but we have been here for some weeks now with dissolution hanging over our heads like the sword of Damocles, not knowing how much time we can take to consider the bills we are sent. Last week it was absolutely urgent that we go through all stages of the Canada Labour Code amendments and other bills. I should like the Leader of the Government—the government, in fact, because I do not blame the leader for that—to be frank with us. When do they want to dissolve Parliament? How much time do we have to deal with these four bills that are apparently coming before us tonight? Perhaps Senator Marchand knows more than the Leader of the Government. He used to know more, but apparently he has lost his touch. I should like to know from the Leader of the Government how much time we have in which to deal with these bills. Some of them are not important. We could possibly dispose of the three readings tonight if dissolution is going to come tomorrow.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): When do you want it?

Senator Flynn: As soon as possible, because the situation is becoming intolerable, if not in this chamber then certainly in the other place. Conditions are unacceptable when the Prime Minister is not able to keep his cool and walks out of the house saying, "I am going to see the Governor General."

Senator Croll: Maybe.

Senator Flynn: The situation has become rather ludicrous.

Senator Denis: If you are sure you will win the next election, what are you worried about?

Senator Flynn: The only worry Senator Denis ever has is about who will win the next election.

Senator Denis: It is not the sword of Damocles if you win the next election.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Order. I must ask honourable senators not to interrupt the senator who has the floor.

Senator Flynn: It is not a question of winning an election; it is a question of having an election, which is quite different. It is a question of clearing the air one way or the other. Perhaps in a way it will not clear the air. In any event, we would like to know where we stand, and that is the only question I ask the Leader of the Government. Tell us what you want us to do. Do you want us to rush these bills through?

Senator Côté: Yes.

Senator Flynn: I might have known Senator Côté would say we should rush these bills. If all contributions were like his we would always be rushing bills through. Fortunately, some of us think we should give some time and some reflection to these bills that are sent us. To us on this side the question is a fair one. It may not appear useful to Senator Côté, but it may be useful to others.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, of course the question posed by the Leader of the Opposition is fair, and it is precisely the same kind of question that those on the government side would ask were they in the position of the Honourable Leader of the Opposition. I regret to say that I can provide no definitive information on the subject of dissolution, apart from the fact that I believe it may come sooner rather than later. I know that that reply can bring little satisfaction or solace to the Leader of the Opposition but, of course, his was a fair question. I can only state that a number of bills will be coming before us which those in the other place, regardless of party, have regarded as quite important at this time, and I would hope that we can give these bills fair but speedy consideration. However, I can think of no measures coming before us in the next few days which will be of a highly partisan or highly controversial nature.

In saying this, I wish to express on behalf of the government our appreciation to those in the Opposition who have been co-operative and helpful in dealing with the measures which have come before us during the past two or three weeks. Honourable members of the opposition as well have had in mind the possibility of dissolution. Certainly, there is no mystery about the possible imminence of that event. We have this evening four bills which will come before us for consideration. Later there may be two or three other bills, depending upon the decision taken by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister with respect to dissolution. In this regard I can say now that there has been no decision yet taken on the subject of dissolution, so in all candor I cannot answer the fundamental question posed by the Leader of the Opposition. I reiterate my hope that speedy consideration be given to the measures which are coming before the Senate tonight. Certainly, of first importance is that fair consideration be given to these measures by all members. I am not suggesting that we waive the right of the opposition or of government members to speak on any of these measures, but I would hope that we could have royal assent for at least some of them tomorrow night or Thursday night. However, it really depends on the views of honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-19, to amend the Petroleum Administration Act and the Energy Supplies Emergency Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault, with leave of the Senate, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

● (2010)

TAX REBATE DISCOUNTING BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-46, relating to the discounting of overpayments of tax under the Income Tax Act and related payments.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault, with leave of the Senate, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with

[Senator Perrault.]

Bill C-35, to establish the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault, with leave of the Senate, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of Via Rail Canada Inc. for the year ended December 31, 1977, together with the auditor's report on the accounts and financial statements.

Report of Air Canada for the year ended December 31, 1977, pursuant to section 27 of the Air Canada Act, Chapter A-11, R.S.C., 1970.

THE BUDGET

ALLEGED REMARKS BY PRIME MINISTER—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to put this question to the Leader of the Government: In view of the fact that all those who criticized the implications of last week's budget with regard to the provincial retail sales tax cuts were accused by the Prime Minister of siding with the separatists, I wonder whether the Leader of the Government considers Claude Ryan, the new leader of the Liberal Party in Quebec, a separatist because he had some reservations about that particular aspect of the budget.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I know that the Leader of the Opposition would never quote out of context any remark made by the Prime Minister.

I suggest that the quotation attributed to the Prime Minister is not accurate. Certainly, a recent statement made by the Prime Minister related to the attitude of a number of provincial premiers with respect to the reduction in the sales tax. His statement was not confined solely to one province. Indeed, the quotation attributed to the Prime Minister with respect to the province of Quebec, I do not believe—

Senator Flynn: It was attributed by the opposition in the other place.

Senator Perrault: It may be attributed by the opposition. I do not have the full text of the Prime Minister's remarks before me, and I would not wish to comment on a truncated and fragmentary report which may have appeared in a newspaper or magazine, or have been heard over a radio station.

Senator Flynn: I based my question on what appears in Hansard.

Senator Perrault: But what is most heartening, I think, to most Canadians is the excellent reception accorded the budget presented by the Honourable Jean Chrétien the other evening. There has been a substantial body of editorial and other support from Canadians from coast to coast. Consumers are now having placed in their hands substantial amounts of purchasing power, which will create jobs all over Canada.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but I was asking whether the government considered Mr. Claude Ryan's observations or reservations as being in the class of the separatist. That is the only question I put to the Leader of the Government, and he can reply yes or no.

Senator Perrault: I suggest that Mr. Claude Ryan enjoys substantial support from people of all parties in the province of Quebec who are dedicated to the ideal of a practising and working federalism.

Senator Flynn: In that event, I suppose that those who share Mr. Ryan's views should not be considered separatists.

An Hon. Senator: They are Canadians.

PROVINCIAL RETAIL SALES TAX—QUESTION

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I would like to put a question to the Leader of the Government regarding the retail sales tax problem that has arisen between the Minister of Finance and the Quebec Minister of Finance.

I should like to know from the Leader of the Government whether the government has found any solution to the problem existing between Quebec and Ottawa regarding the reduction in the provincial retail sales tax and, if so, when an announcement in that respect will be made by the Minister of Finance.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators are aware, of course, that the matter of the reduction in the sales tax was a subject of discussion among provincial premiers and the federal government a number of months ago. The suggestion that somehow this recent retail sales tax action was a unilateral decision taken by the Government of Canada, and imposed upon the provinces, is not correct.

Honourable senators, of course, are equally aware of the position taken by Mr. Parizeau, the Minister of Finance of the Province of Quebec. The representations made by Mr. Parizeau are under study by the Minister of Finance at the present time. There is a determination, however, on the part of the government to treat all Canadian provinces equally and the same.

STUDENT LOANS

NEWSPAPER ARTICLE—QUESTION

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. I was stunned to read in the Toronto Star yesterday that students owe $60 million in loans they will not repay. This amount represents loans made to students attending university and, presumably, other educational institutions to help them pursue their education. They are interest-free, and become payable six months after leaving university.

I am sure those of you who may have read that news item share my deep concern about the fact that this almost elitist group of Canadians—

Senator Grosart: Question.

Senator Buckwold: —are able to get away with not meeting this financial and, indeed, moral obligation.

Senator Flynn: They are unemployed.

Senator Buckwold: The honourable senator says they are unemployed. There are, in fact, certain names in the newspaper report. I do not intend to disclose those names, but they include an alderman of the City of Toronto and a chartered accountant. I do not know whether the names of any senators are included, but the fact is that there are some very prominent people involved.

My question to the Leader of the Government is: What further steps is the government taking to have these moneys collected, and to instil a sense of responsibility in those who use government funds?

● (2020)

Senator Perrault: This question must be taken as notice. However, as honourable senators are aware, education is a provincial responsibility under the British North America Act. Consequently, a reply to a question of this kind can only be framed in terms of possible actions of two levels of government. However, information will be sought and will be brought to this chamber as soon as possible.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

CONSIDERATION OF FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate resumed from Friday, April 14, the debate on the consideration of the fourth report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, in the present circumstances—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, before the Honourable Senator Forsey starts to speak, may I ask him if he would like to move the adoption of the report.

Senator Flynn: But the debate was adjourned.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: I was told that it was probably necessary to have Senator Forsey move the adoption of the report. He does not have to, but I was just asking him.

Senator Flynn: My understanding is that Senator Lafond moved the motion and adjourned the debate in the name of Senator Forsey since he could not be here. So Senator Forsey is just resuming the debate.

Senator Forsey: I should be very happy to move the adoption of this report because I think it merits adoption. However, this is a technicality which I leave to the higher authorities to decide. I am perfectly prepared to move the adoption of the report, but if that is not technically possible in the present circumstances, I am perfectly prepared merely to resume the debate, and I might add, in the present circumstances, to be very brief about it.

This report, as honourable senators will have noted—and I hope they have managed to glance over it at least—this report is concerned with the raising of the postal rates once again by a method which appears to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments to be of very dubious legal validity, to put it mildly. We have the gravest doubts of its vires and it is certainly an unusual and unexpected use of the powers, the possible but doubtful powers, to take this action under the Financial Administration Act, section 13, instead of by an amendment to the Post Office Act. In sum and substance, we think it is highly improper that the raising of postal rates should now for the second time—we protested against this once before, and so reported to the two houses—we think it is highly improper that the raising of postal rates should be done by administrative action, by subordinate legislation, when in our view it should be done, legally it should be done and certainly morally and constitutionally it should be done, by amendment to the Post Office Act. I don't propose to go into the detail here which we have recounted in the report as grounds for these views.

But I certainly commend this to the attention of the Senate for such action as this honourable house sees fit to take. I think it strikes the members of the committee unanimously that this is highly improper. I might add that at the request of one member of the committee we specifically approached, through the co-chairman, the Postmaster General, to ask if he had any intention of proposing an amendment to the Post Office Act, because of course, if he was prepared to do that, we were prepared to say, "Well, perhaps, for the moment, this irregularity, much as we disapprove of it, might be allowed to proceed."

But the answer we received from the Postmaster General was that he and his officials, and presumably the government, were perfectly satisfied of the legal validity of what they were doing and perfectly satisfied that what they were doing was altogether right and proper, and that there was no intention of moving an amendment to the Post Office Act.

I feel very strongly myself about this, because it is the second time it has been done. It has been done in this dubious and probably illegal fashion even in the teeth of our previous report drawing the attention of both houses to the action the government had taken. I very much hope, therefore, that the Senate will give its imprimatur to our view of the impropriety of the action which has been taken in raising the postal rates by a decision of the executive rather than by an act of Parliament.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Do I understand that the Honourable Senator Forsey is moving the adoption of the report?

[Senator Forsey.]

Senator Forsey: Yes, honourable senators. If that is in order, I certainly wish to do so.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is there any other senator who might wish to speak on this report or who would wish to adjourn the debate?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I would like to adjourn the debate, because I want to be sure what exactly the situation is. I understand that the proposition moved by Senator Lafond last week was that consideration be given to the report, but not that it be adopted. If the motion is made to adopt the report, I have no particular objection, but I should like to adjourn the debate in order to consider exactly what has happened.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

POSTAL SERVICE OPERATIONS BILL, 1978

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold moved the second reading of Bill C-45, to provide for the continuation of regular postal service operations.

He said: Honourable senators, you will recall that Senator Laird once made a famous remark about a bill being a simple bill, and then we ran into all kinds of trouble with it. I should like to say that Bill C-45, which I am now proposing for second reading, may not be a simple bill, but at least it is short. It represents just one page. Despite that, in the opinion of many of us it is a most important bill.

I am sure that members are aware that this bill has just come through the House of Commons where it was introduced by the Minister of Labour, the Honourable John Munro.

Unlike some other bills we have dealt with recently, this one, as I have just said, is brief and can be easily summarized: it provides for the continuation of regular postal service operations during the period of dissolution of Parliament.

Probably, one of the reasons I was given the responsibility of proposing this particular bill and carrying it through the Senate was that I had the privilege of being the Co-Chairman of the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Employer—Employee Relations. One of the major problems we looked at, among many others, as a committee, was the question of what to do in the public interest when, legally—or sometimes illegally—public service employees go on strike at a time when Parliament has been dissolved. The only way to bring them back would be by an act of Parliament, and if there were no Parliament there would be this vacuum, this hiatus.

• (2030)

It might be of interest if I quote briefly from two or three paragraphs of our report, which, in fact, resulted in this particular legislation which applies just to the postal service, whereas Bill C-28, which we would have considered had it reached us, would have included an all-encompassing opportunity by order in council to bring back striking workers of the Public Service at a time of dissolution.

The report of the committee, which I believe was concurred in unanimously by all members of the committee with the exception of the one NDP member, says:

It is perhaps appropriate that your committee's study should have been conducted during the course of the longest strike that has occurred since the collective bargaining in the Public Service became law. We have been obliged to consider very carefully whether Parliament in 1967, in its concern that public servants should not be deprived of rights granted to others, went too far. Experience over the past eight years allows us to examine the consequences of granting the right to strike for the Public Service. Your committee decided to determine where to draw the line between the rights of public servants and the rights of the public: at what point the public, through the Government and then Parliament, should be prepared to intervene in the collective bargaining process; and, if intervention is appropriate, whether it should be by a continuing statutory prohibition or by an ad hoc response to a particular situation.

Your committee concluded that where the activities of the parties engaged in collective bargaining do not adversely affect the public interest, the collective bargaining process should be free to operate without government intervention. But when the public interest becomes adversely affected, Government and Parliament should be prepared to intervene.

And further paragraphs:

With respect to the national economic or social impact of a strike by public servants, or indeed by any other group of employees, your committee has no doubt that where the welfare of the community as a whole is concerned, the right to strike is not sacred and its suspension is the responsibility of the Government and Parliament or the appropriate Legislature.

The continued protection of the national economic or social interest can be provided by statute at the cost of a total denial of some rights now available to persons providing services to the public; or it can be protected by granting a statutory right to strike and imposing on Government and Parliament the responsibility of determining when a strike has so affected the public interest that the right must be suspended.

Your committee recognizes that the public interest can be adequately protected by Government and Parliament determining when and where the public interest is adversely affected. When Parliament is dissolved, the Governor-in-Council should be similarly empowered.

And the ninth recommendation of our report at that time was:

That when Parliament is dissolved, the Governor-in-Council be empowered to suspend the right to strike, whenever in its opinion a strike is adverse to the public interest.

I have quoted at some length so that honourable senators may be aware of the overall scope of what I am proposing in regard to this bill and the references which I have given.

I am sure that the distinguished Leader of the Opposition will probably indicate that this is ad hoc legislation, that it should have been introduced earlier, that it has been brought in just before—

Senator Flynn: Do not steal my speech.

Senator Buckwold:—the possibility of an election. I would have to say that, as co-chairman of that committee, I was disappointed that this was not introduced earlier. We recommended it, and, as I say, it is included in the section 102.2 referred to in clause 10 of Bill C-28. However, that bill, which is a complicated and complex piece of legislation, has not reached us. I believe that this particular aspect should be supported by all members of this house, as it was to a great extent by members of the other place.

The contract of the postal employees—I refer, of course, to the Canadian Union of Postal Employees—expired on June 30, 1977. Negotiations were continued, have since broken down, and now the government has asked for conciliation. The conciliation board has just recently begun its hearings. Hopefully there will be no further breakdown and no strike.

It must be stressed that the introduction of this bill in no way interferes with the negotiating process now being conducted. The sole application of this bill would be in the future, in the event of a breakdown in negotiations that might occur in the course of a federal election. It is to be hoped that there will be no such occurrence and that we will be able to resolve the differences which presently exist between the union and the employer, the Government of Canada. In the event that such a meeting on minds does not occur, however, then a strike in the postal service would, quite evidently, affect the due process of the election system and present the Canadian public with an unacceptable situation that would be disruptive, costly and basically unsupportive of the public's situation at that time.

A strike would therefore have to be deferred until after the election campaign had been completed. The emphasis here must be on the word "deferred," because the bill seeks only to defer the right to strike, and not to withdraw it or impair it in any other way.

A further point which should be made is that the proposed legislation does not represent a departure from legal principle or practice. For example, the Canada Labour Code, in section 181 of Part V, already provides that a strike or lockout that would adversely affect the national interest during an election could be deferred until after the return of the writs.

It should be made manifestly clear that the government continues to view the collective bargaining process and right to strike, as vital and fundamental aspects of our democratic procedures. The government will not countenance any withdrawal or reduction of these hard-earned rights, in the absence of anything less than crucial consequences to the public at large. This statement reaffirms the government's traditional commitment to a system of industrial relations that will continue to possess its entrenched and respected democratic rights and privileges. The statement at the same time refutes absolutely any suggestion of a trend or pattern of government intervention. Such a trend would, as I have indicated, be repugnant to the government. I say this so that there can be no doubt whatever that the course of action upon which the government has embarked is one that is necessitated by the very particular circumstances and demands of this period.

Honourable senators, with those relatively few words of introduction I ask for your support in passing this legislation.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY ACT

Bill to Amend—Second Reading—Debate Adjourned
On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill C-19, intituled: "An Act to amend the Petroleum Administration Act and the Energy Supplies Emergency Act".—(Honourable Senator Perreault).

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, there is a verse in Gilbert and Sullivan which begins:

When I was a lad I served a term
As office boy to an Attorney's firm.

Further on the character makes vows which include:

Ere I go into court I will read my brief through.

Senator Flynn: Do we not need a motion?

Senator Lang moved the second reading of Bill C-19, to amend the Petroleum Administration Act and the Energy Supplies Emergency Act.

He said: I think I should read my rules through.

Senator Walker: Let's have some more Gilbert and Sullivan.

Senator Lang: I remember many years ago when I first came to the Senate, Senator Sydney Smith forgot his motion on second reading, and I thought, with all his experience, that was an unusual oversight. I now find myself doing the same thing. I guess one's age catches up on one.

Honourable senators, when I was referring to Gilbert and Sullivan it was my intent to mention this self-imposed injunction:

Ere I go into court I will read my brief through.

I am afraid, with the pending dissolution of Parliament, I have had very little opportunity to do just that.

Bill C-19, which I have to present to you tonight, is not a "Senator Laird simple bill"; it is a very complicated piece of legislation. In fact, this afternoon I had some competent departmental officials attempt to explain the intricacies of this bill to me. After they had finished, I found I was more confused than when they had started. This puts me in a difficult position tonight.

[Senator Buckwold.]

I am convinced that if you look at this bill in terms of the economy of Canada, the economic problems we are in today, our potential for resource development, the need for energy self-reliance, this bill, in principle, could not but receive the unanimous support of this house.

I am not for one minute going to suggest that there are not certain clauses in this bill that are objectionable and, in particular, one of them is on page 7. This was an amendment which was inserted in the Commons. I am going to deal with it at this point because I may as well face it head on.

It was an amendment inserted by the House of Commons and it was not introduced by the government. There is a discretionary power in this clause. A discretionary designation was circumscribed by the House of Commons by standing that discretion and referring it to the committee of the House of Commons which normally considers oil and gas matters. Honourable senators will realize that this completely disregards the concept of Parliament, which includes not only the Crown and the Senate but also the House of Commons.

This kind of amendment to legislation is creeping into our system today, and will ultimately erode some of the very fundamental principles upon which our Constitution is founded. I am not going to defend that. I am just going to bring it to the attention of the Senate so that when someone raises the point they cannot say I did not mention the issue.

I come now to the bill itself. As I said, this is not a "Senator Laird simple bill"; it is a complicated piece of legislation. It has wide-ranging economic ramifications for the country. I think it is an important bill to pass; in fact, the government feels that it is one of the most important bills on the order paper today, and it should be passed before we dissolve.

If I am right in my assumption, the importance of the passage of this legislation is because it is anticipated that in June of this year oil will be produced in Canada from the tar sands of Alberta. This will be the first oil produced from that source in our history and, in a sense, it is an unprecedented experience.

First, let me try to bring into perspective, as I see it, the importance of oil tar sands development. Experts say that the potential recovery from these oil tars is greater than all the reserves of oil in the Middle East. That is a staggering assumption. It means that Canada has the potential of competing with the OPEC group of oil cartels. In the long run, that idea boggles the imagination. If one recognizes this huge potential, one will understand why in 1974 the federal government and the governments of Alberta and Ontario made certain commitments in connection with the Syncrude project.

Oil production from the tar sands is an expensive proposition. The other day, in the other place, one of the members there for whom I have the greatest respect in terms of insight and foresight, Mr. Alvin Hamilton, said it was very probable that the OPEC countries were basing their pricing of oil to the Western World upon what the production costs would be from the Canadian oil tar sands. That is probably an accurate guess.

If we look at our energy picture today, perhaps the imposition of the pricing system by OPEC countries was a blessing in disguise because it will force us into the development of a potential which would not have become possible otherwise, or for many, many years.

I go back now to the basis for this piece of legislation as presented in the bill before us tonight.

Honourable senators will recall that in 1974 the Syncrude or tar sands production became a problematical matter when one of the companies involved in the consortium withdrew. I think it was Atlantic Richfield. In order to save the project, various governments moved in to support it. The federal government bought a 15 per cent equity in the consortium, the Alberta government a 10 per cent equity, and the Ontario government a 5 per cent equity. There was a loan of $200 million to the consortium by the Alberta government over and above the equity commitments. These moves by the various governments I have mentioned made the consortium a viable proposition, at least for the immediate future. To implement the federal commitment this bill is a necessity.

● (2050)

What the bill really does is to impose a levy or tax on foreign oil being imported into Canada in order to subsidize—and I use that word with thought—oil produced from tar sands so that the price received by the producers is the same as the “international price of oil”. If I tried to get into delineating what is meant by the “international price of oil” I am afraid I would be going beyond the depth of my expertise. It is a differential involving the laid-down price of foreign crude oil in Montreal as opposed to the laid-down price of domestic oil in Toronto, plus all the variations and gradations involved as to quality, quantity and so on.

I am in sympathy with Senator Forsey in that I do not like legislation by order in council, but in this area the matter is so complicated and the ramifications are so great that I wonder whether we are not into a field which is impossible to deal with adequately through the ordinary legislative process. However, the government is committed to this method, and for that I am very pleased.

This bill will produce anomalies which will have to be dealt with by amendments from time to time in the future. The important thing right now is to get legislation into place so that a levy can be imposed which will produce the differential necessary to maintain the economic viability of the tar sands project.

Senator Walker: Perhaps the honourable senator could answer a question. For twenty years now we have been told that this can be done economically. With the extra levy he speaks of, is it possible that it can be economically produced? Could the honourable senator go into that a little more fully? This is what we are all concerned about.

I remember twenty years ago the president of Sun Oil out at Jasper Park told me it would be the greatest bonanza ever within a period of five years. Well, twenty years have passed, and it has still not produced in quantity. Could the honourable senator give us some idea of how it can be done economically?

Senator Lang: That is a question that begets its answer. In terms of energy, I do not know whether you can say anything is economic or not economic. We have got to survive, and to the extent that we become self-sufficient, that is where we should be directing our efforts. When the honourable senator asks whether it is economically viable, does he mean as against the present OPEC prices or as against OPEC prices as they might be twenty years hence? Or does he mean as against a projected energy deficiency of something like 80 per cent for non-tar sands domestic oil production in 1985? It may be non-viable today, but ten years hence we may think it is cheap oil. It depends on the supply and demand situation. A prophet of the stature of Jeremiah could not predict our situation ten years from now.

Senator Grosart: He was a pessimist.

Senator Lang: We must have confidence in ourselves. If we cannot rely upon ourselves to develop these resources, then we have no country worth mentioning. This is one of the most fascinating natural resource potentials we have.

Senator Walker: I enjoy hearing these generalizations and I enjoy hearing about Jeremiah. I think we had all forgotten about him. Getting back to the predictions of the president of Sun Oil twenty years ago, and the fact that so far the project has been a complete failure so far as being economically viable is concerned, is the honourable senator telling us that it is now economically viable at present world prices, with the addition of the tax which is being levied on imports from Venezuela and so on in order to help its operation?

Senator Lang: To answer I am going to have to repeat what I said before, and I do not want to bore the Senate.

Senator Walker: It was not clear the first time, so don't repeat it.

Senator Lang: The question was just as unclear as the answer may be.

Senator Walker: That could be.

Senator Lang: Economics is, of course, the science of the obscure.

Senator Lamontagne: Oh!

Senator Walker: The whole speech is obscure. I do not know what you are talking about.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I am not going to comment further on the economics of this situation.

Senator Walker: Why not?

Senator Lang: If anybody else wishes to direct a question of that nature, I shall be glad to move that this bill be referred to committee, where the top economists in Canada, including any member of the House of Commons who is not liable to run again, may be present to give evidence.

What we are looking at here is a measure to carry out the commitments made by the government to bring these tar sands into production. This bill is not confined to the subsidization of the Syncrude group; it has the potential of providing subsidization to other groups that are considering developing tar sands in Saskatchewan and Alberta. This is also to support the Great Canadian Oil Sands Company, which has been operating now for a few years on a fairly limited, as I understand it, production schedule.

● (2100)

If I am to recommend this bill to this chamber, I do so not on any basis of the potential economic viability of these projects, about which I can make no surmise, not even an intelligent estimate. I do not do so on the basis that the subsidization program or the maintenance of a lower than world oil price in Canada is a policy that should be maintained or gradually worked out of our system. I only do so on the basis that our natural resources today can be and will be not only the economic salvation of our country, but the maintenance of our country as a political entity. These tar sands have the ability to make us one of the most powerful industrial nations in the world and I, for one, am quite prepared to gamble on any support we can give to the exploitation of those resources and the intermediate concomitant benefits which will flow in terms of research, development and employment in the western provinces.

Senator Walker: Very interesting indeed, but why are you prepared to gamble? I have not heard one word from you as to how it would be viable; not a word. I have not heard a word about how it would pay for itself, or how it could be properly undertaken, or how it would make money. What are your reasons for this great assertion—not from Gilbert and Sullivan, but from Lang and Lang—that you are quite certain in your own mind, and you are prepared to gamble? Why? Can you give us the reasons—any reasons? You have given us none so far.

Senator Lang: Would the honourable senator like me to refer the bill to a committee?

Senator Walker: Well, it might get you off the hook, because you certainly have not given us any reasons tonight.

Senator Lang: Well, I do not need to get off a hook. You might find yourself on one, but I don't.

Senator Walker: Do not worry about me. I get along all right. However, instead of smiling, can you answer the question? If you will get off the hook by referring the bill to a committee, where you can look it up and find out what you are talking about, then refer it to a committee; otherwise explain it at the present time.

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, for the accuracy of our proceedings there is one point that should be clarified before the debate proceeds further. Senator Lang referred to the Syncrude plant's coming into production this year as the commencement of commercial production from the Athabasca tar sands. I think we should have on our record the fact that the Great Canadian Oil Sands Company has been in commercial production for ten years, and has a production capacity of 60,000 barrels per day, which works out at between 15 million and 20 million barrels per year, so it is no small contribution to the oil supply of Canada. After the Syncrude plant comes into operation it will have a commercial production capacity of 120,000 barrels per day, or twice that of the Great Canadian Oil Sands plant, but the Great Canadian Oil Sands plant will be producing one-third of the commercial production of the oil sands for quite a few years to come. I thought it only right that we have that in the record, so that there is a complete picture of what the production is and will be when the Syncrude plant comes on stream.

[Senator Lang.]

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I merely want to ask the Honourable Senator Lang a question relating to what I understood him to say, that this would be a levy on foreign petroleum, because on page 1 of the bill I find in clause 1:

The purpose of this Part is to provide legislative authority for the imposition of a levy on

(a) domestic petroleum processed or consumed in Canada—

Did I just miss something in his explanation, or is there something further that ought to be made clear to the house?

Senator Lang: Perhaps I can just refer you to section 65.1(b).

Senator Forsey: Yes, you can, but I thought that in your speech you said a levy on foreign petroleum and I would like to get it cleared up.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I will just have to refer to my canned speech, which I did not wish to inflict upon you tonight. Clause 1 of the bill provides for the establishment of a levy on domestic petroleum and on petroleum and petroleum products imported into Canada, so it is conjunctive rather than disjunctive; I am sorry.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, in a moment I propose to move adjournment of this debate, but I do find it difficult to refrain from making a comment which I hope the Honourable Senator Lang will not take adversely. I would have thought it better had he stuck to Gilbert and Sullivan. Having made that general comment on what his speech sounded like, I move that this debate be now adjourned.

On motion of Senator Smith (Colchester), debate adjourned.

TAX REBATE DISCOUNTING BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill C-46, relating to the discounting of overpayments of tax under the Income Tax Act and related payments.

He said: Honourable senators, I was very anxious that I should make this motion right away so that there could be no imputation that I had neglected to do so because of any element of years.

Now, what I would tell you is that this bill is to be cited as the Tax Rebate Discounting Act. Its main purpose is to provide for an offence on the part of any discounter who discounts a tax refund contrary to clause 3 of the bill, which is a definition I will refer to in a moment. That is made an offence if the taxpayer does not receive 85 per cent of the actual amount of the refund. The 15 per cent which is left for the discounter must include all his charges, which would include the cost of preparation of the tax return and any incidental charges thereto, plus, I would submit, the cost of money which was used to pay for the purchase of the right to the tax refund.

● (2110)

We had a sample of how this business of tax discounting is carried on in the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, when we dealt with Bill C-16, the Borrowers and Depositors Protection bill. At that time we heard from witnesses who were engaged in this business of tax discounting. The question which was involved in their testimony was part of a much larger picture, because we were dealing with the rights, benefits and privileges of borrowers, and the duties, obligations and responsibilities of lenders in borrowing transactions. The main thrust of the committee's consideration and the committee's report had to do with general definitions of the rights of borrowers and lenders, rather than touching on this particular subject.

If I appear to have any understanding at all about the subject matter of tax discounting, I gained it from our foray into that issue during the hearing of testimony given before the committee.

When one thinks of tax rebate discounting, one thinks of a tax refund in the accepted sense—that is, relating to income tax. But, if one looks at clause 2 of the bill, it will be noted that the definition of "refund of tax" includes much more than the amount of overpayment of tax under the Income Tax Act. It also includes overpayment of unemployment insurance premiums paid under the Unemployment Insurance Act; overpayment of contributions paid under the Canada Pension Plan; and any interest paid on any such overpayment or payment. There are numerous references to the definition of "refund of tax."

The administrative procedures which are outlined in this bill, and the procedures for the carrying out and enforcement of this bill, would appear to be fairly reasonable. They may not be the only way of getting at the subject.

For instance, there might be some discussion relating to the amount of refund which the discounter acquires. If it turns out that, as a result of certain miscalculations, the refund is larger than that to which the taxpayer appeared to be entitled, with the right to refund having been transferred to the discounter, the discounter must pay the additional amount of refund to which he became entitled to the Receiver General for Canada; otherwise, he would be subject to prosecution under the provisions of this bill. In that case, the Receiver General for Canada is entitled to retain the overpayment, which is then put to the credit of the taxpayer. If at some future time the taxpayer has liability to the Crown, this credit could be used to offset the obligation that would then be payable by the taxpayer.

All in all, the procedures are not too different from what one might normally expect. If more time were available for consideration of the bill, a different approach might bring about different procedures.

Insofar as income tax is concerned, a great many people—I am not sure of the total number—such as students and part-time employees working four, five, or six months during the year, have deductions from their salaries made on an annual basis. If they have no other income, they automatically become entitled to a refund, but the refund takes place at the end of the year. Students, in particular, are desperate for money, and I am sure they would want it promptly. The others I mentioned might be unemployed for four, five or six months, and are also in need of money.

I think that Revenue Canada should short-circuit that approach and give a final and quick disposition of all these cases, whether the claim is based on the fact that the taxes have been deducted on the basis of yearly employment, or deducted on a four, five or six months basis. That might be a solution to the problem. At least it is worthy of consideration.

I am not critical, and do not wish to be taken as being critical, of this bill simply because it was dealt with in one afternoon by the House of Commons and had the unanimous consent of all the parties represented in the House of Commons. That unanimity resulted from the fact that many discounters charge exorbitant rates, and they gouge the individual entitled to a refund who is in a hurry to get his money, perhaps because he needs it to live or, if he is a student, he needs it to continue his education. Those discounts might run to 50 or 60 per cent.

I am not going to explain the procedure by which these discounters operate, unless it is the wish of honourable senators that I do so. If there were no gouging, no unreasonable rates of discount exacted, there might be said to be some place for such an operation. If such an operation could live within a 15 per cent income base, there might be some place for it, because that is all the discounter would be entitled to receive under this bill for whatever service he renders, and regardless of the number of failures to collect he may run into. Taxpayers in these categories have a tendency to move around and, as some of the witnesses who appeared before the committee in respect of the Borrowers and Depositors Protection bill explained to us, some of these people become difficult to locate following the preparation of their returns and their signing that they have received their money. This bill would require the discounter, even working within this 15 per cent limitation, to make the payment in one amount, either by cash or by cheque. There will be no more instalment payments. It will be one amount.

Presumably, most of the individuals who would be affected by this are Canadians, and, that being so, I think one has to make certain assumptions. My own opinion is that there is a place for this type of measure. Notwithstanding that, I would like to hear some evidence from those who are engaged in this field of operation in terms of what it is possible to do in carrying on that business. Also, I should like to hear evidence concerning other areas where similar relief may be granted—that is, the extent to which the banks or the various investment houses may come into this picture and be prepared to take on some of this operation. That is a thought that should be fully explored.

There are questions that could be answered by the hearing of some evidence on this. I think people who request to be heard on a bill that affects their operation, regardless of any feelings honourable senators might have about the subject matter and the nature of their business operation, should be heard. I think a Senate committee has a duty to hear them.

A number of these organizations have been in touch with the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee today. A number of them tried to reach me during the course of the day, but I was en route to Ottawa. They have come to Ottawa in order to present their case. If they had any thought that they could present it in the Commons, they were foredoomed, because the Commons dealt with this measure and disposed of it in one afternoon. Since they are in town and are available, and since they have asked to be heard, my feeling is that they should be heard, and to that end the bill should be referred to committee. The committee could meet tomorrow morning for that purpose.

I have made some observations this evening about other approaches toward relieving the hardship in the case of students and other people who find the government indebted to them by way of a tax refund as a result of their having worked for a short time. While their need for money is more imminent, it may be a year or longer before they can get that tax refund from the government, and I am wondering whether the possibility of an earlier refund has been explored, and what the difficulties might be in dealing with it in that fashion. These are observations that I think could be included in the report the committee makes to the Senate on this bill. Whether or not the committee proposes any amendments, it could make observations in that regard.

It is not a matter of life and death, nor is it a matter of national emergency. However, it is an important area and one that should be disposed of and dealt with in the best way possible. I think we have to give some cognizance to the fact that there was unanimous support for this bill in the House of Commons which means support from all the different cross-sections of Canada. While I do not think we need to feel bound by that, we certainly have to give it a good deal of weight.

While we would not want to interfere with any timetable in the march towards dissolution—something about which Senator Flynn spoke earlier this evening—we do want to satisfy ourselves that we have afforded an opportunity to those who wish to be heard, and I think that is a function of the Senate that should be carried out whenever possible. For that reason, I would ask that the bill be referred to committee this evening to enable the committee to meet tomorrow morning, which would not disturb any of the routine. The decision of the committee will either be to report the bill with amendment or without amendment, and it would be then up to the Senate to deal with it. Regardless of what form the report of the committee might take, there would be an opportunity to include in it some observations as to taking a longer and deeper look at the principles involved in this measure.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I was glad to hear Senator Hayden place as much emphasis as he did on the duty and obligation of the Senate to hear witnesses. I must recall, however, that the last occasion this matter came before the Senate, which was last week, the very opposite position was taken. He has made an eloquent case for us to maintain—

• (2130)

Senator Hayden: If I may ask Senator Grosart a question, when you say “a very opposite position was taken” you mean by the Senate?

Senator Grosart: Of course. As a matter of fact, when the vote was taken, I was looking in that direction. So it is quite correct to say it was taken by the Senate. And it was an exactly parallel case, because in that case we discussed the bill in Committee of the Whole, and much the same problem arises here. This bill was discussed in Committee of the Whole in the Commons, where witnesses could not appear. Senator Hayden said it took an afternoon. It took a very small part of an afternoon for this bill to go through the House of Commons, both in the house itself and in Committee of the Whole.

Senator Hayden has also emphasized the fact, of course, that this bill was passed without much objection, without any adverse vote by any party in the other place. This is not an argument that impresses me very much, honourable senators, and earlier today in replying to the Leader of the Opposition, the Leader of the Government stressed this to some extent when he said these four bills before us are not partisan and are not controversial. I have never believed that that is a good reason for the Senate not giving full consideration to any bill.

Senator Hayden: I did not offer either of those reasons.

Senator Grosart: I am not saying you did. I am discussing the principle that is before us at the moment arising out of your remarks, and I am attributing any criticisms I have to the position taken by the Leader of the Government on these two occasions. The position he has taken on these occasions makes no sense to me, because surely the Senate has on many occasions greatly improved bills that were not in themselves either partisan or controversial. Surely our function here is to improve bills if we can without consideration, I hope, to purely partisan attitudes, towards a vote or the criticism we make. I try to follow that rule myself; I think whenever a bill is assigned to me my job is to see if I can suggest any way that the Senate can improve it.

I am in a difficult position with this bill; I am most anxious to accede to Senator Hayden's request that we get this bill to committee tomorrow. Of course, on the other hand, again because of this rush which we do not understand and which is not explained to us, I am in the position—and I think Senator Lang was in the same position—that I first saw this bill at about 6.30 tonight.

Senator Hayden: That is about the same time as I saw it.

Senator Grosart: I am quite sure. But this is not the way the Senate should be operating unless we are given a better excuse than we have been given that there may be dissolution some time soon. I object to the whole procedure for those reasons, because I believe that this does not give an opportunity to the Senate to do its duty.

The bill, although it appears to be simple, I find quite complex. Perhaps this is because I do not understand the tax rebate discounting business and how it operates, and from two readings of the bill I am not quite sure what the bill intends to do to solve some of the problems that appear to have arisen. So although I would much sooner take more time to read this bill, because it is in one sense, at least, a very complicated bill, I intend to accede to the suggestion of Senator Hayden, and particularly for the reasons that he gave, that witnesses may be here and they should be heard. I hope the Leader of the Government is listening when I say that this is a principle so important to me, as a senator, that in spite of my reluctance to proceed tonight, I am going to maintain that very important principle. I hope that when the matter arises again in another connection, the Leader of the Government will find it in his heart, in his mind and in his timetable to reciprocate on that very important point.

Senator Hayden has given us his usual excellent explanation of the bill. I must say it was a much better explanation than was given in the other place. I was amazed to read perhaps a five-minute speech by the minister introducing the bill where he made no attempt whatsoever to explain this bill. For example, I will ask Senator Hayden a question which I hope he will be able to answer. Honourable senators may have noticed that I was in and out of the Senate. I was trying to find a mathematician here who could explain to me and resolve a mathematical equation proposed in the schedule to the bill and which is essential to the bill. The formula is this, and it will be found on page 5 in English, on the left-hand side, the bottom item, item E. It says, "The discount rate as an annual rate"—and I shall have something more to say about that in a moment—and then it goes on with a bracket followed by "calculated as, percentage rate equal 100" followed by large black brackets incorporating  $A$  over  $B$ , 3—which I take to be cubing that part of the formula—minus one, and then another bracket and the whole to be multiplied by a hundred.

I have tried this out with several senators whom I would regard as much more skilled in mathematics than I am, and no one of them could explain the formula to me. But it is essential to the bill, and I hope that perhaps even before we go to committee Senator Hayden will be able to explain it to me.

There are several other matters that come to mind. One is that clause 3(2) seems to say that in certain cases other services, including the cost of the discounter preparing the income tax return or "any other service directly related to the discounting transaction," may be deducted from, and the words are "the consideration paid by the discounter." For example, where the taxpayer claims or believes that he has a refund of $100, the maximum in the bill—or to put it the other way round, the least the taxpayer could receive after his arrangement with the discounter—would be $85. Yet this clause seems to make it clear that he can subtract from the consideration other amounts.

• (2140)

I have been trying to rationalize this in my mind. It has not been explained. I take it that it may mean that this is a situation where the consideration given by the discounter is, let us say, 90 per cent. If it is 90 per cent, he can add these charges but he must not go beyond 85 per cent. I am not sure if that is the explanation, but it seems to me that this matter should be cleared up because, as I say, on two readings of the bill it is not too clear to me what the relation of clause 3(2) is to the statement on page 5, again in the left-hand column in the English at the letter C: "Payment as a percentage of expected refund (must not be less than 85 per cent)." Yet, the other clause seems to me, if I am reading it correctly, to say that there can be deductions other than the consideration arranged between the taxpayer and the discounter.

I do not see any direct relation in the bill to the time that may expire between the payment of the consideration to the taxpayer and the receipt of the money either by the taxpayer or by the discounter.

If we think of the 15 per cent more or less as the interest on a loan, which I think is a fair description of it because it is interest and other charges, is there any relation of this charge, this 15 per cent, to the time that the loan is outstanding? Perhaps this formula does it. I don't know. It may be that that is the purpose of the formula. But, obviously, if the time between the payment of the consideration and the repayment of the loan is one month, then 15 per cent would appear to be very high in terms of annual interest. Obviously, this has been taken into consideration, because the schedule—which so far I have not heard explained—requires—and this is where the complex formula comes in—requires that the discount rate be shown as an annual rate in one of the documents that must be prepared. I presume this formula does it, because it says that  $A$  is the expected refund and  $B$  is the amount paid to the taxpayer. So these two are taken into consideration and somehow we come up with an assessment of the discount rate. I do not think the word "rate" is used in the bill, but it is really referring to the discount rate as an annual rate. This would be important for the Senate to know, of course, and particularly important for any taxpayer seeking to avail himself of the services of a discounter.

As Senator Hayden explained, the bill extends its provisions beyond merely normal income tax returns. It extends it to the unemployment insurance contributions and it extends it to the Canada Pension Plan and the interest thereon, and it extends it to some other areas.

It also occurs to me to wonder what would be the situation where the discounter actually realizes less than the amount for which he has given whatever consideration he has given. Again I am really looking for information here, because I am quite sure this has been taken into consideration.

Senator Hayden: It is his tough luck.

Senator Grosart: Senator Hayden says it is his tough luck. That does not seem to be quite fair, and one question that I would want to ask is this: Although it is 85 per cent, what is it 85 per cent of? Is it 85 per cent of the taxpayer's belief as to what his refund is?

The bill obviously contemplates the discounter making up the income tax form, or at least checking it; but what is the situation, if the taxpayer has not made a complete return?

Senator Hayden: Will my friend let me deal with that now?

Senator Grosart: I will be finished in a minute, Senator Hayden, at which point I presume you will wish to deal with all my questions, but if you wish to deal with this particular point now, perhaps that would suit your convenience.

Senator Hayden: On this question, first of all you look at clause 3(1) of the bill. It says:

Any discounter who acquires a right to a refund of tax from the person entitled to the refund for a consideration that is less than eighty-five per cent of the refund of tax is guilty of an offence.

With respect to the refund of tax, of course the discounter has to get his information from the taxpayer. He may be able to get some information from the taxpayer, if the taxpayer will give a direction to the income tax authorities to furnish the information; but usually, from the evidence we had during the hearing I referred to which took place about a year ago, the taxpayers were not keen to make any contacts with the income tax division, other than those contacts they actually had to make. In some instances, when the taxpayer was asked to provide those directions, he then disappeared, and I suppose did his business elsewhere.

Obviously, the 85 per cent is 85 per cent of the refund which, it appears from the information obtainable from the taxpayer and from the best judgment that the discounter can apply to it, is the refund that he is entitled to. But it must be a by-guess-and-by-God theory or practice, because the discounter does not know whether the taxpayer has any liabilities from a previous year which would be carried forward and first satisfied, which would therefore mean that the refund would be less than what it appeared to be. Therefore, the 85 per cent would produce a lesser figure and that would be the tough luck of the discounter.

Have I made that point clear?

Senator Grosart: Yes. That was the question I was raising. It is still not quite clear in my mind just what the relation between the two is, that is, between an actual refund where the taxpayer had been persuaded to get information directly from the Department of National Revenue, then you would have complete security, apparently. If the department said, "All right. This is your refund," and wrote him a letter, or sent him a cheque, it seems to me that the taxpayer would not have to go to a discounter. He could simply go to a bank, surely. With the 15 per cent interest, I believe that most banks, trust companies and lenders of various kinds would be pleased to lend money on 100 per cent security.

[Senator Hayden.]

• (2150)

There are various forms to be prepared. As I understand it, the discounter must mail one, filled out, to the last known address of the taxpayer with whom he is doing business. That is a very important detail. He must also provide a copy to the department, so that the department has a complete record of all these transactions.

Senator Hayden: He must send it in with the taxpayer's return.

Senator Grosart: That is what I am saying. It must be sent in. So actually there are three documents, because, as I read the bill, the discounter must keep one for his files—it must be available for, I believe, three years—the government has one, and the taxpayer has one. Why would there be any necessity for people to go to discounters, if they could get a clear statement from the Department of National Revenue to the effect, "We will refund this amount to you"? At 15 per cent, I believe that any bank would lend the money. Perhaps in the evidence in committee on Bill C-16 there may have been an explanation.

I raise this question merely to indicate that there are some questions that need to be asked—and I am glad that Senator Hayden feels the same way—because a reading of the bill that I have been able to do during the last hour would indicate to me that, to quote Senator Hayden, there could have been a better way to achieve what is obviously a very important purpose, which is to protect citizens from loan sharking. Naturally, I agree completely with that principle, but I question whether the 15 per cent is right. When one considers the addition to the number of forms which will have to be filled out, one begins to wonder whether there could not have been a better way devised. I do not know.

One other matter which is of concern to me is clause 4(3) where there would appear to be a very dangerous precedent—if it is a precedent; I am not sure—which gives access to income tax returns. The marginal note is: "Copies or information may be disclosed." I am sure that all honourable senators will be concerned about any bill which says that information provided by a taxpayer can be disclosed; and the areas of disclosure are extremely wide.

I leave it at that, and, with some reluctance, I say that if Senator Hayden so moves, I do not think anyone on this side will object to the bill going immediately to committee in order that it might be dealt with, and witnesses heard, tomorrow.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: I must inform all honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Hayden speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, I shall try to deal with all the important points raised. I can understand the honourable senator's problem, in that receiving the bill at 6.30 p.m. has not given him much time to read it. Certainly we have started out even, because that was approximately the time when I began to look at it.

Senator Grosart: If we wind up even, I will be happy.

Senator Hayden: As to what is included in the 15 per cent, it is to cover all services which the discounter may have to provide, such as all services in connection with the preparation of an income tax return for the taxpayer, and whatever the cost might be, and also for other appearances, et cetera. Clause 2(3) provides for that.

The language is quite simple. So far as the banks are concerned, I agree with my honourable friend that it would be helpful if we could simplify procedures to the extent that we could line up Revenue Canada, the taxpayer and the proposed discounter so that they would coordinate their efforts and disclose all the information. The taxpayer may not have some of the information. The information will be in the files of Revenue Canada.

The purchase of a tax refund, in those circumstances, might be very attractive to a bank or some other lending institution. Here there is an element of a gamble. One has to accept the fact that the taxpayer is looking for fast money—in fact, he wants it quicker than “fast”—so he goes to a discounter. He tells the story to the discounter, who has to size up the man's credibility, determine how much of what the man is telling him is a fact, and what discount he is going to give in case there is exaggeration or understatement by the taxpayer.

In those circumstances, of course, one can understand that a transaction is partly a gamble. So long as that element is in it, I would say that it is not a very attractive field for institutions such as banks, loan companies and other investors. I do not think there is any way in which a government could devise a bill which would make the situation absolutely attractive to those institutions.

My honourable friend referred to the minister's opening statement. The purpose of the bill, as outlined by him and other speakers, is to shut out the loan sharks from this field of tax refund discounting. They have not prohibited this sort of transaction. What they have done is to regulate it on the basis of 85 per cent and 15 per cent. The prohibition does not necessarily mean that those who are engaged in this business at those very high discount rates will not still engage in it. The bill says that if one wants to be legally correct and not be prosecuted, one must conform to that 85 per cent and 15 per cent rule; and if one does not, one faces possible prosecution.

I suppose that those who gamble say, “Well, I cannot win them all. I am bound to lose some.” The fine, if you get caught, can be as much as $25,000. Depending on the size of the transaction, it might be well worth the gamble. I do not know, but I do not think you can develop a perfect piece of legislation that would make this field of operations attractive to the regular financing and lending institutions.

● (2200)

My honourable friend talked about clause 4(3) which appears to permit a breach of the secrecy provisions in section 241 of the Income Tax Act. The limitation on this is that the information, including a copy of a form that is in the possession of the Income Tax Department, and which corresponds to Schedule I of the bill, can be given only to an official or authorized person, or an officer or employee of the government of a province who is engaged in the enforcement of the law in that field. So there are some limitations.

Disclosure, of course, has always been a debatable subject, and one hesitates to approve extensions of it, because the language may be devised a bit hastily and may open up a wider area than one might, at first glance, suppose would be the case.

As regards the last item in the proposed form, “The Discount Rate as an Annual Rate”—that, to me, is so much Greek. I think I would do better if it were Greek, because when I was at university I studied that language for four years.

Clause 3 of the bill, which I read to you, says that the 85 per cent is 85 per cent of the amount of the refund that is claimed. It does not say that it is annual, or anything else. The 15 per cent is not more than 15 per cent of the amount of the refund which is claimed. There is, therefore, an area there that certainly requires an explanation.

Senator Grosart: I would just like to clarify one point that I raised, the answer to which I did not quite follow. This again is in connection with clause 3(2), which reads:

(2) In determining for the purposes of this Act the consideration paid or provided by a discounter for the acquisition of a right to a refund of tax from the person entitled to the refund, there shall be deducted from the consideration as otherwise determined the amount of any fee or charge levied or made by or on behalf of the discounter—

This seems to me to say quite clearly that that fee can be deducted, with the result that if it can be deducted from the 85 per cent it could be as much as 83 per cent, 82 per cent or 80 per cent. I do not know whether I am right or not, but this is such a clear statement that, unless there is some explanation, it would seem to be contrary to the schedule and the rest of the bill.

Senator Hayden: I think the bill indicates with absolute clarity that you cannot deal with more than 85 per cent of the amount of the refund. You cannot give less than that without committing an offence, no matter what deductions you may make for services rendered. Conceivably, if you paid 90 per cent, there would be room for the extra charges.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, may I ask a question about that?

As I listened to this discussion it seemed to me that what clause 3(2) says is that there may be deducted any fee or charge levied for the service of preparing a person's return of income, which is rather distinct from discounting, is it not? It seemed to me that you may get the 85 per cent, but if the chap, besides doing the discounting, had prepared your return, then he could charge something for that as a separate thing. Is that a correct interpretation or am I just getting off the track?

Senator Grosart: Not over the 85 per cent.

Senator Hayden: I would say to my friend that if that is the interpretation to be given to this, then he would have to add the additional words that he did read, to the effect that it is also deductible from the 85 per cent "for any other service directly related to the discounting transaction." It makes a mess of the whole thing.

Senator Forsey: Yes, it does.

Senator Hayden: So the language is not too clear, unfortunately.

Senator Grosart: That was the point I was making.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Hayden moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved the second reading of Bill C-35, to establish the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

He said: Honourable senators, it is a pleasure to present Bill C-35. I will not say that it is either simple or that it has been accepted unanimously in the other place, although those who are a little braver might say that of this particular bill.

The name of the bill is "An Act to establish the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety." Its purpose is set out in clause 2, as follows:

The purpose of this Act is to promote the fundamental right of Canadians to a healthy and safe working environment by creating a national institute concerned with the study, encouragement and cooperative advancement of occupational health and safety, in whose governing body the interests and concerns of workers, trade unions, employers, federal, provincial and territorial authorities, professional and scientific communities and the general public will be represented.

Among the main functions of the Centre will be the establishment of an integrated information system for all aspects of occupational health and safety, the dissemination of authoritative information and the stimulation of research in this particular area. At the present time there is no vehicle, honourable senators, for the co-ordination of the information that issues from a multitude of agencies both federal and provincial.

I would like to stress two major aspects of the legislation. The first of these is the uniquely independent nature of the proposed centre, and the openness with which it must operate. The second is the support which it has received from some 350 public and private organizations across the country which have recognized the great need for this type of centre.

• (2210)

Let me underline that the centre will have no regulatory powers, but rather will be a mode of communications among all of the interests. It will not compete with any existing jurisdiction but will exist to serve them all. It will be self-governing, reporting to Parliament only through a designated minister, otherwise it will be free from controls at any level.

The centre, if it is to perform its function in the best interest of Canadians, must possess real autonomy and it must be empowered to conduct its affairs openly and with evident neutrality. For that reason it has a very broad representation among its governing council.

The governing council will consist of 10 representatives nominated by the Lieutenant Governor in Council in each of the provinces; two chosen by the commissioners of each of the territories; 11 selected in consultation with the workers' organizations; 11 selected in consultation with employers' organizations; and four from federal departments and agencies. Therefore, the very great representation is from the provinces, the territories, and from worker and management organizations.

The chairman of the council, a part-time position, will be appointed by the Governor in Council. The full-time president will be the chief executive officer of the centre.

The legislation empowers the centre to publish information openly and, indeed, requires it to consider briefs from groups and individuals, and to account for its action or reaction to those briefs. The centre will make factual information, as opposed to value judgments, available to the public so that all individuals will have the right to know about the risks they face at work.

There has been much support for the concepts embodied in this legislation because of the real need perceived by concerned Canadians for a national focus and impetus in the field of occupational health and safety.

Canada is the only major industrialized country that has no such national body at the present time to promote joint planning, collaboration and priority setting; yet, in our large, diverse and multi-jurisdictional country, such co-operation is absolutely essential.

I do not want to take up the time of honourable senators tonight by repeating the many horrifying statistics on injury, illness and death suffered by working Canadians. I have a substantial dossier of those statistics. Surely those horrifying statistics show that regulation has obviously not been a sufficient answer to the problem. We have some 220 federal and provincial laws, 400 sets of regulations, and 90 different administering departments and agencies. Yet each year more Canadians are injured and made ill. The severity of those injuries and illnesses grows as does the loss to the economy. We do not even know the number of victims of long-term industrial diseases in this country.

Let me close by saying that as a country we must find new solutions to these problems. Concern alone cannot change the picture without an active channel for that concern.

I ask honourable senators to give serious consideration to this bill.

On motion of Senator Choquette, for Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, before putting the motion to adjourn, may I ask you to note that there has been a bloodless coup and a change of leadership on this side. Things will flow very smoothly from here on. Having said that, honourable senators, I move that the house do now adjourn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, April 19, 1978

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the house that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Hnatyshyn had been substituted for that of Mr. Dinsdale on the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Document entitled "Canadian position with respect to Conventions and Recommendations adopted at the 59th and 60th Sessions of the International Labour Conference, Geneva, June 1974 and June 1975", issued by the Minister of Labour.

Senator Flynn: That is rather old. Three or four years.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Senator Flynn: Explain.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, the committee did not complete its consideration of Bill C-46 this morning, and it is proposed that the committee should meet again at 3 p.m. when the minister will return to answer further questions.

Perhaps Senator Hayden would like to add a few words to that.

Senator Hayden: Do you wish any further explanation?

Senator Flynn: Yes. I was wondering whether the committee wanted to sit this afternoon because it is urgent as far as the witnesses are concerned or whether it is urgent as far as the Senate or Parliament is concerned.

Senator Hayden: It is urgent, firstly, because the minister was before us this morning, and we had arranged for him to return at 3 o'clock; secondly, it is urgent because of certain legal issues that developed this morning, and in respect of that a representative from the Department of Justice will be present this afternoon. How successful he will be in dealing with the problems the passage of time will tell.

Once you embark on a bill there is always the consideration that you like to carry it through. We heard the witnesses from the west and the east who were before us this morning; they asked if they could return so as to hear what the minister and the Department of Justice had to say, and we assured them that we would give them that opportunity. They did not want to be held over for longer than necessary, and I think one of the qualities of Senate committees, and the Senate itself, is a concern about the well-being and the welfare of those who appear before us.

Senator Flynn: I take it from Senator Hayden's explanation that the urgency is with regard to the witnesses, but not with regard to the Senate or Parliament.

Senator Hayden: That is what my friend has said.

Senator Flynn: That is my understanding.

Senator Hayden: I thought the work we were doing was work the Senate had assigned to the committee.

Senator Flynn: Yes, I agree.

Senator Hayden: We work under a direction; we must pay attention to the direction from the Senate, and then use our best judgment in carrying that through.

Senator Flynn: I understand, but my point is that this could be done tomorrow morning as easily as this afternoon.

Senator Hayden: No, I don't think so.

Senator Flynn: You don't think so?

Senator Hayden: I don't think so.

Senator Flynn: As far as the witnesses are concerned, I agree, but the Senate did not direct the committee to sit this afternoon; it did not put any limit on the time.

Senator Hayden: No, that is why our own judgment applies, and we think it is necessary. If the Senate wants to overrule our judgment, that is fine.

Senator Flynn: No, I have found out what I wanted to know. Motion agreed to.

POSTAL SERVICE OPERATIONS BILL, 1978

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Buckwold for second reading of Bill C-45, to provide for the continuation of regular postal service operations.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I wish Senator Buckwold who has sponsored Bill C-45 were here, for there was something I wanted to tell him personally. When I was selected to reply to Senator Buckwold on this bill, I nearly hesitated doing so in French because of comments he is reported to have made at a conference which was held out west on April 3, 1978:

[English]

Saskatchewan Senator Sidney Buckwold caused a minor flap at last week's Canada West Foundation Conference in Banff when he said French Canadians do not speak very good French. Mr. Buckwold was commenting on the need for more English Canadians to learn French when he complained about the poor French spoken in Quebec.

Senator Walker: He is an authority; no question about it.

● (1410)

Senator Asselin: The result of his remark was predictable; the only Quebec delegate at his workshop walked out in protest.

Senator Flynn: Don't you do that.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I checked the Parliamentary Guide very carefully because I wanted to know if Senator Buckwold is qualified and if he has any expertise enabling him to make a judgment on the quality of the French we speak. Since I did not find anything in that respect, I will make my speech in French.

Honourable senators, the legislation before us today is, of course, an emergency legislation and any such legislation is always dangerous since it creates a precedent.

[English]

Senator Flynn: Senator Buckwold, it is too bad you have just come into the chamber; you have missed everything.

Senator Buckwold: Did someone say something nice?

Senator Asselin: I hope you will read Hansard and you can reply sometime later.

[Translation]

I had a look at the proceedings of the committee in the other place on the various provisions of this legislation. As Senator Buckwold said, the bill before us is not complex, but it does have some importance. If one reads closely the remarks made by the Minister of Labour, the Honourable Mr. Munro, when appearing before the committee, one can detect some reluctance to sponsor such a legislation. That is also surprising because negotiations between the government and public servants generally are almost always handled by the President of Treasury Board. So we were expecting the President of Treasury Board to sponsor that legislation, and the remarks made by the Minister of Labour, the Honourable Mr. Munro, would seem to indicate that the legislation before us did not gain full cabinet support and that not all ministers share the view of the Minister of Labour that a significant sector of public servants should be temporarily deprived of their right to strike.

Obviously, as happens every year, we have the same scenario over again: when we have an important piece of legislation to discuss, the government tries to rush it through at the end of the session. Again this year, important legislation is before us in the Senate, including this bill and others we will study this afternoon, and we are being asked to act quickly, to shorten the debate because it is urgent since an election might be called. In any case, I say it creates a dangerous precedent and, just when the negotiations between Treasury Board and the postal union seemed to go well, when conciliation was under way, suddenly last Monday they found themselves confronted with this bill which, to my mind, is an extremely provocative move, given the relations between the postal workers and Treasury Board. How do you expect to maintain a good relationship with a group of public service workers when you tell them you will take away from them, even temporarily, an important aspect of the collective agreement negotiation structure, that is, the right to go on strike when they have the right to do so under the law? We are told this legislation is introduced to serve the public interest, but the public interest does not exist right now, we are not facing an election. We may be passing this bill this week. It may receive royal assent and become a law, yet there will be no reason to enforce it. There is no election at this time and no election has been called.

So I say that we are stating a principle in anticipation, that we are denying a fundamental right to this class of employees, a right which has been recognized by the present government and which is recognized by all political parties in the House of Commons, that is, the right to strike in the public service. I wonder if it is necessary to introduce such a legislation. I am no expert in labour legislation but I wonder if the government might not think of some other ways to solve the problem it is afraid to face. There might be some senators here who could enlighten me but that is what I find in the Labour Code, and one might say that under the circumstances it does not apply to the postal union but I would like to know why. It may be because of the delay. On consulting the Canada Labour Code, I find that section 181 stipulates, as follows:

(1) Where (a) a strike or lockout that would not be prohibited by this Part may occur during a period commencing on the date of a dissolution of Parliament and ending on the date fixed for the return of the writs at the general election of members to serve in the House of Commons next following that dissolution of Parliament, and

(b) the strike or lockout would, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, adversely affect the national interest if it occurred the Governor in Council may, at any time during the period referred to in paragraph (a), order that the period of seven days referred to in paragraph 180(1)(d) shall elapse upon the expiration of the seventh day following the end of the period referred to in paragraph (a).

(2) Where the Governor in Council makes an order pursuant to subsection (1) during a period described in paragraph (a) of that subsection, the Minister shall, on any of the first ten sitting days of the first session of Parliament next following that period, lay before Parliament a report stating the reasons for the making of the order.

When I read that as a layman, or as a lawyer who is not familiar with labour relations, I wonder whether the government could not have referred to the Labour Code—

Senator Côté: This does not fall under the Labour Code.

Senator Asselin: I should like to know why it does not fall under the Labour Code. I am told that it does not. Of course, that is what the minister was trying to say in committee, but he explained it in such a vague way that members kept on asking him why section 181 had not been amended so that it would come under the Labour Code. As for me, I do not know. Anyhow, Senator Buckwold will explain it to me or Senator Marchand or maybe Senator Côté who has been Postmaster General and who may know more than I do. But the fact remains that we are putting the union in a position where it can defy the law. It is obvious, as everybody knows, that if the house is dissolved, there is no way of passing legislation without Parliament. Surely something could have been done, but why wait until today? We have been sitting since October. Why did they not introduce some other measure to make conciliation possible with the members of the postal union? So I say that this legislation will pass, but will it be obeyed?

Senator Marchand: Who knows?

Senator Asselin: We hope so. We hope that the postal workers will obey the law. If not, what recourse does the government have to implement it? There are two. There are injunctions. But we know how the courts have treated injunctions in the last few years.

Rulings are handed down in the superior courts in Montreal and in Quebec City which deal in a rather peculiar manner with the injunctions that come before those courts. I need not refer to specific cases here. I could have brought a ruling handed down by Judge Deschênes in Montreal on an injunction which was rejected for very strange reasons. Fortunately, his ruling was reversed by the Court of Appeal. But his ruling on the application for injunction puzzled us as lawyers. We wondered how far an application for injunction could go.

So, it seems that an injunction could be used to get workers back to work. And they could also be fined. Of course, the act does not subject the workers to a fine. But I think the Public Service Staff Relations Act does, in section 101, which provides for fines in cases of non-compliance. However, I do not think such fines will compel the union leaders to send the workers back to work. The fine provided for an employee under section 101 is $100. No mention is made whether it is $100 per month or per year. There is no mention at all. For the leaders, the fine is $300—

Senator Marchand: Per day.

Senator Asselin: The fine is $150 for the unions. Well, I say that if the workers want to challenge the legislation, it is obviously easy for them to do so. Of course, we do not suggest to them at all that they should. At any rate, the opposition is not here to filibuster that legislation. We are here to tell the government that it could surely have found another formula to achieve the same purpose. It was said that since 1968, within ten years, there have been five or six ministers and even seven responsible for the Post Office Department.

Senator Flynn: They deteriorate fast.

Senator Asselin: In any case, I think that seven ministers have been responsible for the Post Office. There is still a record deficit of $700 million per year and we are told that another formula will be considered. Listen, if Senator Marchand does not stop interrupting—so, it was not you, Senator Marchand? I apologize. Is it you Senator Côté? Well, it will be your turn a little later.

Senator Choquette: He has a grudge against you.

Senator Asselin: He has a grudge against me, but I do not have any against him.

It was said our deficit was $700 million every year. There has been talk for years of making the Post Office Department into a crown corporation. They have been saying for years that under that formula the deficits would be lower and the Canadian people would have a better service. When this bill was passed in the other place, the Postmaster General and the Minister of Labour appeared on television and said: "Now, it is true, a task force has been set up and will work on this immediately; it will then submit a report on the possibility of making the Post Office Department into a crown corporation."

They could have made that announcement earlier. It seems that the postal union leaders are in favour of such a formula. If that announcement had come earlier, the bargaining process between the postal workers and Treasury Board might have gone faster and the dispute might have been settled by now.

If I remember well, this legislation provides for its repeal seven days after the return of the writs. Well, I think that last time the writs were returned five weeks after the election results. When the writs are returned, you learn about it through an order of the Governor General in Council, through the cabinet. If the writs were to be delayed for such a long time after the next election, it would mean that these employees would have waited for nearly twelve months for a collective agreement to determine their wages and conditions of employment.

I think that this is going too far. I am not saying, however, that the government is wrong all the way. I am not saying either that the CUPW has always tried to co-operate with the government. I am not saying that the postal workers have not used the work to rule method, because the general public has complained about this. What I am saying, however—and I suggest the opposition think the way I do—is that steps should have been taken, before this bill was introduced, to favour more harmonious negotiations with the CUPW. I do not know whether other honourable senators want to deal with this bill. We do not intend to ask that this bill be sent to a committee. If Senator Buckwold wants to reply to some of my questions, I should see if there is anything else I can say. If other honourable senators want to speak now, I should be pleased to listen to them.

● (1420)

[English]

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege.

[Translation]

I would like to correct an impression I might have created.

[English]

Apparently I made a disparaging reference, according to what I have just heard expressed by the honourable senator, about the French language. I have not seen the report, but I think it is important that I correct any such impression.

At the recent Conference on Alternatives Canada, sponsored by the Canada West Foundation in Banff, sitting around in a seminar with people from across the country, in a humorous way I indicated that my ear was gradually being trained to the French language. Although I did not say I could understand Senator Flynn, I said, "I am beginning to find he makes some sense when he speaks French." In a very casual humorous way I said, "I am beginning to learn a little, but when I stand on a corner in Montreal or Ottawa I find it very difficult to understand the language." It is the type of comment that we often make. At noon today, for example, I said to my friend from Newfoundland, our whip, the Honourable Senator Petten, "When are you going to start to speak English?"

● (1430)

This is just sort of a common joke. I want to make it clear that in no way was there any intention on my part of creating any impression that I was disparaging the French that is spoken here. I had no intention of in any way downgrading the French language as we hear it in Canada.

I want to emphasize that in every respect what was said was really a sort of gesture of humour—a gesture which most people seemed to enjoy, with the exception of one separatist friend who was deeply insulted and walked out.

Senator Asselin: In listening to the words of the Honourable Senator Buckwold, I am happy to hear that he has corrected the impression that he certainly gave French Canadians that in his opinion we speak poorly in French.

Senator Flynn: Senator Buckwold, would you suggest that the interpreters do not do a good job when we speak French here?

Senator Buckwold: No, I would not want to leave the impression that it was because of the interpretation that I was having difficulty in understanding Senator Flynn. Indeed, I have been able to follow his French to the point that he is now beginning to make sense.

Senator Perrault: That is impossible!

Senator Buckwold: Maybe something is wrong. I don't know.

Senator Grosart: Quit while you are ahead.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand: Honourable senators, if you will allow me, I should like to make a few brief comments about the bill now before us. I would have liked to retrace the history of the right to strike in the public service, beginning with the right of coalition which was abolished in Canada, as you know, in the last part of the nineteenth century, and to deal also with the evolution of the right to strike, how the legal provisions on the limitations of the right to strike were gradually abandoned in the public service in almost every province and also at the federal level. But, of course, I am not here to give a lecture on history, and all honourable senators have probably heard that before and know all about it. However, as I was personally involved in the amendments to the Quebec legislation to allow public servants to organize and thus obtain the right to strike; as I was one of those who advocated here at the federal level that public servants should also have the right to strike and, on the other hand, as I intend to vote for this bill, I should like at least to try to clarify the situation, so that the public will not get the impression that I am simply a puppet moving from left to right as the wind blows. I hope the translation is good!

Senator Flynn: Are you speaking in French or in English?

Senator Marchand: If Senator Flynn does not know that I am speaking in French, then you know why Senator Buckwold had problems.

In any case, honourable senators, I am still in favour of the right to strike in the public service. I am sorry to have to vote for a bill like this. I would have preferred a bill dealing not only with the postal workers but with the whole question of the right to strike in the public service, so that we might have some day a common philosophy on an issue as important as this one.

As I listened to Senator Asselin, I thought he was going to give us a magic answer to the problems facing us. Of course, he is only putting the question without giving the answer, which is usually the easy part. But if we take a broad look, in the way of Molière, if you want—not with Molière's talent but with Molière's technique, which is different—a broad look at collective bargaining, what sanction is usually imposed on parties which do not agree? In the private sector, it is an economic loss, that is for the employer, a loss of production together with a loss of profits, and for the workers, a loss of salary and related fringe benefits. So, it is in the interests of both parties to agree so as not to lose the economic advantages they want to keep. Now, there is not the same motivation in the public service. That is because the government is not after profits. Hospitals are not after profits but to serve the population. The penalty is therefore not the same. Of course, in government, you could leave marginal groups indefinitely on strike at a given time without disturbing anyone, because neither the government, the ministers, the members of Parliament nor the honourable senators, will suffer personally from the fact that some workers are on strike. Who suffers? It is the public who is not a party to the negotiations. So, this is a completely different situation. Therefore, when someone talks about the right to strike, the first question I ask is: What strike are you talking about? Are you talking about a strike in the public service or a private service where the motivation is the economic advantage of both parties, because there is no answer otherwise. One thing is impossible, and that is negotiations on an equal footing. If you look at our labour legislation, there is the whole ideological evolution of collective bargaining. You can see that the purpose of all that has been to try to restore a balance between the parties, so that an employer can close down his plant and the union can do the same, which means that both have the same advantages and are of equal strength to bargain. When they are not, someone must keep quiet; those are the rules of the game. But which party in Canada can be of equal strength with the state? I am not talking only about the federal government, or even of the provinces. How can you strike a balance between a government that represents the population as a whole and has the right to collect taxes, and a particular union which represents only its members? Equality is not possible. A while ago, the teachers on strike were saying: The government does not want to bargain with us as equals. Of course, it could not do so. Either you have a government in a country or you do not, and if you have a government, those with the constitutional authority have priority over any given union. Therefore, there cannot be equality. What would be the penalty in such a case? The penalty against government employees is the same as in the industrial sector: there would be what we call a lockout, the employees lose their wages, and that is all right. I mean that this is easy to understand. But for the government, what can the penalty be? There is only one action that can be taken against the government besides the legal sanctions provided in the statutes or the Constitution. The only sanction which can be taken on the political scene is that of public opinion, or an election.

Senator Flynn: The sanction of an election in the case of a marginal group is somewhat illusory.

Senator Marchand: Yes, of course, that is what I am saying. The penalty against the government, except penalties provided for in the law itself, in some cases is meaningless, and in any event when we talk about equality there is no collective equality even among workers. You know it is a delusion when some people say the working class is going to do this or that. I feel like asking them: Which working class? Is it the working class of 747 aircraft pilots who earn $65,000 a year or is it the working class made up of people sweeping the floor here for $5,000 a year? Is it the working class of machine tenders who earn $35,000 a year or is it the working class earning $3,500 or $4,000 a year? Which working class are you talking about, and where is that equality? It does not exist among groups. But, that is besides the point; it is a digression I should not have made and I will stick to the right to strike.

Now, if it is conceivable that the government will not at some time act as a government, even with its employees, what recourse will the employees have? Can they negotiate with the government? Yes, they can negotiate with the government; I believe and I insist that the right to strike in the public service is a good technique, provided of course those using it in the public service are convinced and aware that they cannot use it as in the private sector. The objective of a strike in the public service is to attract the attention of the public, and to say: Look how the government is treating us; look at our working conditions and try to penalize this government which denies us proper conditions. But the objective cannot be and will never be to crush the government and say:

[English]

"You lost the strike, so you're going to accept our conditions." That means that from that moment on you no longer have a government; it means the other party is the government, which is nonsense.

● (1440)

The real recourse that should be used against the government is to let the public know that the government is unfair towards its employees. Thus it might be a good thing to have a one- or two-day strike so that the media will take notice and say, "What has gone wrong? All the airports in Canada are closed," or whatever the case may be. In those circumstances there would be a lot of publicity and the public would be able to form its own opinion on the situation.

The remedy for this kind of thing is at the ballot box, and nowhere else.

I was listening this morning to Mr. Parrot, and all he talked about was politics. He was not talking about collective agreements at all. He is, of course, against the Liberal government. This is his own opinion, and of course I do not mind that. He can be against the Liberal government, he can be against the Conservative government, if ever there is one, or he can be against the NDP government. He is free, as an individual, to do that. But it is another matter when he represents the workers. The legislation has been drafted in such a way that the purpose of the certification of the union he represents is so that it can negotiate labour agreements, and not so that it can change the government. This is why, even in Germany, for example, you have what is called "co-operation committees," and I think we are going to talk about that in Toronto tomorrow. That is completely different from unions, which negotiate agreements. I think this is a good way to do it. How can you engage in a "strike to the death"?

[Translation]

I do not know if the interpretation is good so I will say it in French to avoid any mistake. Is it possible to strike to the death, for instance, against a hospital? Is it reasonable to strike to the death against a university unless, according to the philosophy of the labour movement, its purpose is to defeat the government rather than negotiate labour agreements? However, the labour movement in North America owes its existence—I would not say existence de facto but legal existence, under the Wagner Act in the United States—to our labour legislation and also to the collective agreements which enable them to collect union dues.

[English]

They are directly integrated in the whole system. This is why, for me, it is a joke when a labour organization says that the purpose of the labour movement in Canada is to break down the system. That is not true. If you want to break down the system, get outside the law. Do not enjoy the privileges that you ask for in collective agreements. Do not ask the employer to collect dues for you, collect them yourselves, and having done so, do not ask the government to certify you and give you the exclusive right to represent all workers, even if they are not members of your union.

If you take away all those privileges, they will fight; I agree with that; but from that moment on I would say, "Well, if they want to act like a political party, this is their choice." It seems, however, that they want to do both at the same time. What Mr. Parrot said this morning on TV had nothing to do with collective agreements. He was speaking about wage controls, and about the Liberal government in that way. It is not a matter of a Liberal government or a Conservative government. I would probably make exactly the same speech if the NDP were in power.

[Translation]

Even if the New Democratic Party or the Conservative Party were in power, that is not the question.

So, I am still in favour of the right to strike in the public service. Why? Because, honourable senators, the only other alternative in labour relations to the right to strike is compulsory arbitration. This is the solution advocated in all circles, in select circles, by people who know absolutely nothing about it, but talk about compulsory arbitration. Why does not an arbitrator come along and say, "By gosh, this is justice, because it so happens that there are conflicts of interest".

This is not a case where they apply legislation with precise terms and criteria. Conflicts of interest are involved. And nobody has the power to say that this is justice. Moreover, there is arbitration in the public service. Considering the size of the public service today, what does it represent? It affects almost one million workers directly or indirectly. No one in Canada has the right to act as if he were speaking for the House of Commons and the Senate and say: "Even if as a government you believe that $2 an hour is too much, I agree to give it and you just have to tax more". And this is the problem that all union movements in the world have been facing.

[English]

In Sweden, you know, when the civil servants' association wanted to be affiliated with the ILO, the problem facing the ILO was that they were supporting the labour movement in Sweden, and they said, "If ever there is a strike between the civil service and the government, what stand are we going to take?" So there you have a contradiction between the two.

[Translation]

The problem is there. You know that the House of Commons and the Senate are, of course, the bodies responsible for the common interest of the people. And there is no man to whom that power should even be delegated. I believe that the House of Commons does not have the right to delegate that power and to say, "Gentlemen, you are going to tell us what should be the working conditions of civil servants." And if those gentlemen happen to be "wicked Tories" in power while I am a good Liberal and I say that "the wicked Conservative government is going to pay outrageous salaries or higher wages," that leads to distortions not only in the public service but in the whole private sector which, as you are aware, is being influenced by the public sector. That is why I am against compulsory arbitration in public services. There is a responsibility, and perhaps the responsibility of the government belongs to no one else. Otherwise, a particular grievance can be arbitrated and a formula such as that one can be found. But when it comes to determine the basic pay structure in a country, you cannot let it be done by a third party; that is simply not possible. It is the government which in the last resort must assume that responsibility.

I therefore find it regrettable that we have to partially deal with this issue in such a manner. There is no doubt that the postal workers by themselves alone can destroy the democratic process. You know how the Post Office is used during election time. Most of you have gone through elections. Try and imagine an election without mail service. This means that you can paralyze the process which leads to the designation of the supreme authority of a country, the authority which not only governs the country, but appoints judges and is, in fact, responsible for the whole management of the country. Is there a group of individuals who can have that power and not be accountable before the public?

[English]

If at this moment I were president of the postal worker's union I would probably today send a wire to the Leader of the Opposition and say, "Gentlemen, we are ready to make a public pledge that we are not going to go on strike if there is an election. Withdraw your bill." I would be the happiest man in the world, and I think the government would not be willing to refuse that stand, for then they would have shown their responsibility. They would say, "We cannot exercise this right," which would be quite a good move, and we would not have to vote on this bill, which deals only partially with the problem, and, as Senator Asselin says, for only a very short time. However, we did not have the choice. I suggested that at one time, but I presume it did not reach the right person at the right moment, although it would not have been new.

● (1450)

Do you think, for example, that in Paris, or even in London, you would have the same problem, or in Germany, in Bonn, or in Prague? Do you think the unions there, some of which are communist unions, are going to paralyze le Metro, the subway, for days? No. They will have a one- or two-day strike; they will shut down the gas or electricity for one or two days. They are free to call a strike. They can strike for as long as they want; there is no restriction to it. But they know very well indeed they will do it only once, because the public, and even the workers, are not going to stand for that.

I discussed this matter with Reynaud in Paris; I asked, "How come you refused those workers the right to strike?" I was told, "They decide to strike not only for themselves but for myself too, because I cannot go to work if le Metro does not work in Paris." It is not only him they are affecting; they are affecting the whole public, so it is normal in those circumstances to say, "It's just too bad. They are going too far."

Like Senator Asselin, I have not found a solution. A few years ago we had a commission, presided over I think by Professor Woods from McGill University, on disputes in the public service. That commission did not find any magic solution. We do not have any magic solution. There is only one solution, and that is the responsibility of the unions when the public interest is at stake. If the union takes that into consideration, then I think we can have decent negotiations in this country. But if the unions think they can behave in the public sector the same as they behave in the private sector, then I tell you we are due for trouble.

I am going to vote for this, but I tell you that if ever they want to remove permanently the right of those workers to strike, I will be the first to fight against that and try to convince the union to give some pledges that there are certain things it will not do because it is unfair for the population, and not the government as such. This is a problem, and I do not see any other solution, after spending 25 years in the labour movement.

I have to vote for this. I regret it, but I will do so, and I hope that the next time we will have some kind of policy that will be agreed upon by all labour organizations in Canada, so that when we are faced with a situation like this it will not be possible for any specific group to starve the nation. Do you think the 500 employees in Manicouagan, for example, can close down the plant in wintertime, in February, and freeze the whole province of Quebec from Montreal to Gaspé? This is what it means. In February nobody has this right, not even the government.

When we talk about the right to strike, the expression does have a meaning, and when some members of the union consider they have the right to strike in exactly the same way as they do in the textile industry, the sawmills or other sectors, that is not practical.

I do not know if I have made myself clear. Even though I am in favour of the right to strike, I am against the way the right to strike is exercised when it is only blackmail. I am one who has prevented a strike. I very well remember that in Sorel, when a ship was being launched by the Governor General, my organizer phoned me the night before and said, "Hey, we are going to paralyze the shipyard tomorrow. We will have some bargaining power." I told him, "If you paralyze the shipyard tomorrow you will have to look for another job the following day." It is just too bad. This is not normal negotiation; it is blackmail. To paralyze the nation during an election is, I think, blackmail, that is all; it is not negotiation. This is why I support the bill. The rest of my speech, which will be for another hour and a half, I will give at some other time.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I rise on a point of order to give some explanations to the Senate. Senator Marchand seems to have indicated that in my opinion the solution is compulsory arbitration. I never referred to compulsory arbitration in the public service. What I deplored in my speech were the delays in the negotiations between postal unions and the Treasury Board. Had the negotiations been progressing more rapidly, perhaps we would not have to vote today on such wretched legislation.

Senator Marchand: Does Senator Asselin know who is responsible for those delays in the negotiations?

Senator Asselin: Well, there are always two sides. The unions are not the only ones to blame; both sides are.

Senator Marchand: If you know that for a fact, fine. Otherwise, perhaps it is better not to talk about it.

Senator Flynn: Anyway, it has nothing to do with the point which was raised.

[English]

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I want to say something very brief about this legislation. I share a good many of the feelings that Senator Asselin expressed about it. I think it is deplorable that we have had such a delay in the negotiations, and it is deplorable that we have had such a delay in the legislation coming to us. Further, I am tired of this exceptional emergency legislation. I think it is time we got some permanent legislation, some long-run legislation, to deal with matters of this kind.

I said in this chamber the last time we had emergency legislation—on that occasion also I followed, at a much more inconvenient hour than this, an eloquent speech by Senator Marchand, and I am not going to repeat what I said then—that I think it is possible to get a permanent solution; possibly not an ideal one—but then, what is ideal in this world?—a sub-ideal one to this problem, some solution to this problem by way of permanent, well thought out, well considered legislation. But these ad hoc measures leave me very uneasy indeed. That's the first thing I want to say.

● (1500)

Senator Goldenberg: Will you allow me a question?

Senator Flynn: One expert to another.

Senator Goldenberg: I wish to ask Senator Forsey a question, with his permission.

Senator Forsey: Yes. Go ahead.

Senator Goldenberg: Would you tell the Senate in what country of the world a solution has been found to the problem we are discussing?

Senator Forsey: I said, deliberately, Senator Goldenberg, that there was no ideal solution, but, I think we can do something better—if you look up the speech I made on the last emergency legislation debate, you will have some idea of what I am suggesting—I think we can do something better than this perpetual series of emergency measures, most of which are accompanied by the utterly fatuous remark that this, of course, is not to be regarded as a precedent. It is like that utterly fatuous remark that they append in the House of Commons when we amend money bills and they accept the amendment, “that this is not to be drawn into precedent.” Of course, it means precisely nothing, because it is always drawn into precedent. However, that is by the way.

I am not suggesting for one moment that there is a country in the world that has found an ideal or perfect solution to this problem. I doubt if there is such a thing. We live in an imperfect world, but I think we can do better than have a succession of pieces of emergency legislation, and I think we should have had some long-term proposal on this subject presented to us long ago when we could have had time to consider it properly.

The second thing I want to say is that I am rather afraid that this measure may not work. I am rather afraid that we may find that we are faced with a wildcat strike. I don't think we can leave that out of account as a possibility. I hope it won't happen, but it won't greatly surprise me if it does happen, especially in view of the character of this particular union, which is not a very experienced one, and which has had some leaders who, in my judgment, were not always well advised or responsible.

The third thing I want to say I can, perhaps, sum up by quoting what Lord Melbourne said to the Whig magnates when Peel repealed the corn laws, “My Lords, it is a damned thing Peel has done, but you have all got to vote for it.”

I think this is imperfect legislation. I think it is regrettable legislation in various ways, for reasons which have already been set forth at length by Senator Asselin and by various people in the other house, and which I sketched very briefly a moment ago myself. But I do not see really how we can avoid it. I don't see how we can leave the country in a situation where, perhaps for a prolonged period during an election, it is impossible to maintain postal service. The government has to make the effort to maintain the postal service. If there is a wildcat strike and it can't do so, well, then, it can't do so. There is always the possibility that the effort will fail. But I think we have got to have some legislation of this sort. We are cornered now, and put in a position where it is really virtually impossible for responsible legislators to say, “No, we can't pass this.”

So while I share some of the misgivings of Senator Asselin, a good many of them, I think, nevertheless, I am reluctantly compelled to agree with what I think is his final position, and that of his party, that, however much we dislike this thing, we will have to vote for it in the circumstances in which we find ourselves.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I wish it were possible to work up a little enthusiasm for this sad little bill. We are here to discuss on the occasion of second reading the principles that are within it. In that case, I suppose the debate should not detain us long, because there is precious little principle in it. However, it seems to me that consideration, not so much of what is in the bill but what isn't, not so much of what it does do but what it doesn't do, and what it tells us about the government that proposes it, would, perhaps, be worth a few minutes for discussion in this chamber.

The bill tells us that the intention is to bar postal strikes when Parliament is dissolved. I presume that is done on the assumption that we can't have an election without a postal service: One can, perhaps, make strong arguments to that effect, but I recall that in the quite recent past, the ordinary folk of this country found out that, when they had to, somehow they managed to get along without a postal system. There was plenty of practice in that kind of extemporized activity, to be sure, because, in the last few years, there have been a number of occasions when postal industrial action, if I can use the “Britishism,” has been a matter of economic survival for many people in the private sector. They have had to find alternatives, which they improvised, which they found difficult, which were expensive, but which enabled them to carry on in some degree or another.

While these activities were going on and the private sector was in this pickle, the government allowed itself to take a very relaxed view of the proceedings. As I recall, the last major strike of two years ago went on for some 50 days. During that time the public struggled to deal with the enormous inconveniences which were presented to them. Now we have the present concern of the administration—perhaps laudable in some respects—to protect the electoral process, but I suggest to this house that it is a very late conversion, indeed, to the principle of public interest and necessity.

But even if we accept that description of the situation in which we find ourselves, and this departure from their previous unconcern in matters of this sort, what about the other public services which we might consider to be in an analogous or similar situation in which strikes may be possible?

Those of us who come from western Canada have a great disinclination to suffer a railway strike, as we have had to do from time to time. We do not like it when the people in the grain handling business bring that trade to a halt. Those of us who use the airlines do not like it when the air traffic controllers decide not to work. These are all matters of public interest, and matters where the federal government has a deep concern and responsibility. Why, then, in this bill, the rather invidious selection of the Post Office? What particular principle can one discern in this argument? It is all right, apparently, to decide that one particular branch of the public service or public activity in which the federal government has responsibility is to be inhibited in this way during an election period and, perhaps, a good argument can be made for it, but one has to wonder why the line was drawn precisely where it is drawn. We haven't much choice in the matter at this particular stage of our discussion. The bill is before us unsatisfactory as it is, but I wonder whether it is likely to prove effective in its present form.

In this respect I should like to support some of the arguments previously made on this particular point, because to think it is going to be entirely effective in its present form is questionable. It is perfectly true that we can, by law, tell the leaders of CUPW that they can't go on strike, but the idea of approaching the problem in that way seems to gravely underestimate the ability of the leaders of that union. I suspect they know as well as anybody here that if they were to go on strike at this particular stage in the parliamentary proceedings, it would certainly be counterproductive to their desires.

One of the tasks of a union in the public service is to secure public support for what they are going to do. The bringing in of a postal service boycott does not seem to be the right way of getting this support.

I don't estimate the leaders of the postal unions on such a low degree as to expect that they would be liable to do that. They probably understand, as well as I think I understand, that such a move would have a very beneficial effect in returning the present administration, a development which probably does not have a very high position on their list of priorities. It is likely that this prohibition against legal strike, as I think Senator Forsey has suggested, is most likely to be an empty gesture, and a very empty gesture, indeed. The real risks, as has been said and as is underlined by newspaper reports, will probably come in the form of an unofficial strike. It is the shop stewards and other union officials on the floor and in the various postal depots who are the folk from whom we must expect problems in this connection. Perhaps they are viewed by some of us as being irresponsible and indifferent to government and union leadership alike.

● (1510)

It seems to me that this bill provides a pretty poor protection against a probability of that kind. But I suggest to you, honourable senators, that the real significance of this legislation, certainly to me, is that it is a sort of a petition. It is a petition in bankruptcy; it is a petition in bankruptcy with respect to postal matters and the industrial relations policy which the administration has been following. As someone has said, this government is not new to this problem. They have been in office for the last 10 years and they have had many occasions on which they have faced the same kind of thing.

Senator Flynn: Fifteen years.

Senator Roblin: Fifteen years. And how many talented political leaders have assumed the office of Postmaster General? I hear it is six; I hear it is eight. It certainly seems to be enough. But if they cannot find the capacity to solve these problems by combining the talents of these six or eight, or whatever it is, estimable gentlemen, it looks to me as if we should be looking for new material for postmasters general.

[Senator Roblin.]

And how many inquiries have there been? Is it 16? Is it 17? I don't know, but it is going to be 18, because we hear that there is going to be another inquiry as to how to handle the postal affairs in this country.

So here we have a situation, a government 10 years in office—you give them 15, I'll say 10—how many postmasters general, how many inquiries, how many investigations? And they have yet to settle the basic problem which is at the root of all our discussion here, and that is how to organize the pay and conditions of work for the people in the Post Office. Surely it is an industrial problem that ought not to tax the abilities of this talented administration. It is one that is handled every day of the week by people in other circumstances.

And so, honourable senators, we get this bill presented to us as a priority, a priority of the Parliament of Canada. We have heard what some other senators think about that particular way of doing things at this instance. Certainly, to me it is evidence of pathetic ineptitude in the management of the affairs of the Post Office, and it comes to us, I think, with the trademark of this particular administration and it is fully consistent with their general economic record. That record, I suggest to you, is patchwork, patchwork extenuated by expediency, and if that is not an accurate description of this bill, I never heard one.

Alas, honourable senators, we have come to expect this kind of economic decision-making on the part of the government, and alas, that is what we get. I detect from what I have heard in this house, although this bill may receive the votes of many, that it certainly will be passed with no enthusiasm and more reluctance.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have no intention to resort to the same arguments which have been put forward so eloquently by previous speakers in this debate. I simply want to say that Senator Marchand's speech was excellent but beyond the scope of this legislation. Whatever difficulties there may be in labour-management relations, they are well known. There is no doubt about them. I do not think that it would be opportune, while we are discussing a specific bill dealing with one temporary and sporadic issue, to wander off the topic into that vast field of labour-management relations and get lost. As far as I am concerned, that would not be wise. On the specific issue of the relations between the Post Office and postal workers, the fact has been mentioned that there have been a great many Postmaster Generals over the last few years. There is no doubt that when Senator Denis was Postmaster General, things were a lot smoother.

Senator Denis: There were no strikes.

Senator Flynn: A lot smoother, indeed; there were no strikes. We did not have these problems back then.

I am sure that the poise and composure of the minister impressed the employees in those days. The same thing was true when Senator Côté was minister. Those were the good old days. Since then the situation has grown progressively worse, and this happened because we could not avail ourselves of the services of persons as capable and as competent as Senators Denis and Côté.

Senator Denis: Agreed. At least for once you are telling the truth!

Senator Flynn: That's right. What I want to deal with, not so facetiously of course, is the principle of this bill.

The mover of the bill, Senator Buckwold, is listening carefully and says he understands my French. Unless he goes to Quebec City he will not know any better. It may be that here in Ottawa, in this chamber, I speak a kind of French which is somewhat different from the one I speak in Quebec city but, in any event, Senator Buckwold emphasized that the principle of a temporary denial of the right to vote—as this is what it boils down to—is stated in Section 181 of the Canada Labour Code.

I would point out in this respect that pursuant to this provision it is up to the Governor in Council to decide whether or not a strike affects public interest and when Parliament meets he must report on the conditions that prompted him to step in and suspend the right to strike. In this case, things are different.

The government is asking Parliament to get it out of the mess by saying to the postal employees, "You do not have the right to strike before the writs of election are returned." It is quite another thing. The government is saying to Parliament, "Get me out of this mess, I do not want to have to make a decision". Now, you may object that the government is in no position to make that decision during the election campaign and that is why Parliament must decide. Well, I say no. I tell you that the way it is phrased, this bill allows the government to have its own way without having to negotiate in good faith during all that period. Not only are you taking the problem away from the government but you are allowing it not to negotiate in good faith. That is why, in my view, this bill is extremely dangerous in its present form. If the government had warned that section 181 of the Labour Code would apply to postal employees during that period, that would have been honest. It would have been straightforward and then the government could have said, "I consider that a strike in the circumstances is contrary to public interest." Then it would have had to report, and justify its decision to Parliament. We could have seen whether it had negotiated in good faith to that point. Such is not the case here. I think this is a major fault in this legislation. In my opinion, by giving this permission or, if you want, by taking that right away from postal employees during that period, Parliament is only discharging the government of any responsibility to negotiate in good faith and to make a decision it must make under the principle set out in section 181.

That problem, added to those raised by our colleagues who participated in the debate, must make us regret further having to make that decision to approve this bill. I would suggest to the government, if we pass the bill on third reading, that royal assent not be given until the government, the Prime Minister can say: "Tomorrow, I am going to dissolve Parliament so I need royal assent for this bill today." I would be extremely disappointed, I would even be disgusted if we were to give this bill second reading today, if it were to pass third reading tomorrow, receive royal assent tomorrow night, and the election were to be held only in the fall.

I ask the Leader of the Government—and I would like him to listen to me here—I ask him to assure us that this bill will not receive royal assent before the Prime Minister tells us when the election is to take place. Only on that condition am I prepared to vote for the bill on second reading. If I do not have that assurance I will ask the Senate to vote against it, to divide at least on third reading.

● (1520)

[English]

I would like an answer from the Leader of the Government.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, of course, it is impossible to give that kind of commitment, and the Leader of the Opposition is aware of that fact. That would be an unprecedented kind of commitment for any Prime Minister of Canada to give.

Senator Flynn: I am asking that the Prime Minister say to us, "I need royal assent to this bill because tomorrow I am going to dissolve Parliament." That is all. The Leader of the Government could say that he will ask the Prime Minister to do that, and that he will tell us tomorrow at the third reading stage.

Senator Perrault: There is no record of any Prime Minister of Canada of any party giving that kind of commitment. I am not able to give that kind of commitment; nor do I intend to suggest to the Prime Minister that he be put in that position. Furthermore, I find it rather remarkable that in the other place—

Senator Flynn: It does not matter what happens in the other place. Let them do as they wish, and so will we.

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Opposition has had his opportunity to speak. The honourable senator knows more about parliamentary procedure than to pop up and down in his seat in the way that he is doing.

Honourable senators, I find it rather remarkable when a measure, which enjoyed such a considerable amount of support from the official opposition in the other place, is the subject this afternoon of what may be construed as almost a demand on the part of the Leader of the Opposition that some sort of commitment be given by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister before any support can be accorded this measure.

Senator Flynn: That's right.

Senator Perrault: We have had a good deal of debate on the subject of this bill, not only by the sponsor of the bill but also by Senator Marchand and from our friends and colleagues in the opposition. May I suggest, honourable senators, that the public interest suggests that we should put this matter to an early vote.

Senator Flynn: It does not matter what they do in the other place. I am not bound by what they say there.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Buckwold speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Flynn: En français!

Senator Buckwold: The problem is that honourable senators might not understand my French.

Honourable senators, I have listened, as one might expect, with a great deal of interest to the spirited debate which has taken place this afternoon. I must say that I share the feelings expressed in connection with many of the points raised. This is not a bill which I am pleased to have to introduce on behalf of the government. I am sure it is not a bill which most of us would like to see on the statute books. But, as each of the speakers has concluded, despite the background and the so-called problems that may be created, it is essential in the public interest to have this legislation.

I say to the Leader of the Opposition that this is not unusual legislation with regard to those industries and employees that are covered by the Canada Labour Code. As the honourable gentleman knows, the Canadian Union of Postal Workers is not covered, nor are other employee associations and unions of the Government of Canada. They are not subject to the Canada Labour Code. If, for example, the Post Office were a crown corporation, it is quite possible that the argument put forward by the Leader of the Opposition might be applicable in the sense that it was covered by the code, and it would be possible to get the employees back to work during a period in which there was no Parliament.

With regard to the point about royal assent—

Senator Flynn: I do not think the honourable senator understood my point. I said that we should have adopted the same principle that is found in section 181 of the Labour Code.

Senator Buckwold: That could be argued. I am merely trying to indicate that it is not unusual or extraordinary legislation in the sense that there is similar legislation which applies to other labour groups.

Senator Flynn: It is not the same.

Senator Buckwold: I am rather astounded by the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition, in that he refuses to go along with this bill unless he has an assurance that there will not be royal assent. May I remind members of this house that the bill refers specifically to one particular situation, namely, the situation in respect of which the conciliation board was established by the Chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board on February 3, 1978. That is the only particular situation that is involved.

The Leader of the Opposition is suggesting that we hold up royal assent in the event there is no election. I suggest that whether or not we get royal assent is immaterial to this particular situation; that, in fact, the government will negotiate in the interests of the Canadian public, the citizens of this country, and it is proper that it should. Whether or not there is royal assent, it is their responsibility to negotiate in good faith.

Again I am surprised by the implication that with the umbrella, the protection, of this legislation the government will say, "We can ease off in our negotiations, delay the meetings, delay bringing the parties together, and delay reaching a final agreement." I say just the opposite, that the government has the responsibility to negotiate a proper, just and meaningful agreement with the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, and the latter have the same responsibility to reach an agreement with their employer, the Government of Canada.

• (1530)

If there was any indication of a lack of good faith on the part of the Government of Canada, and they were using this legislation as a protection against negotiating in good faith, then I would be not only surprised but very disappointed in the government, and, indeed, in the party to which I belong. I suggest to honourable senators that negotiations will proceed in good faith whether we have royal assent or not, and that royal assent, in fact, does not really matter at this point. Even if there is no dissolution of this Parliament for some months—and that could happen; who knows?—this bill is there as a protection. It certainly will not, as we know from the minister's speeches in the other place, and from the committee hearings, interfere in any way with the negotiations, which will continue. I think that should be very clearly understood.

Honourable senators, I enjoyed the speech of Senator Roblin, who, I think, has put a new dimension into the opposition—one that they probably needed.

Senator Langlois: No doubt.

Senator Buckwold: He has introduced a political motivation that has kept us on our toes, and some of the tired old men—I will not say "tired old ladies," of course—

Senator Roblin: That is the kind of praise I can do without.

Senator Buckwold: —are probably going to be inspired by it.

While some of the criticisms Senator Roblin advanced might be acceptable from the point of view of the delay in bringing the legislation forward, and from the point of view of the situation in the Post Office, which we agree is a very difficult one, some of the conclusions he reached seemed to me to be just a little strange. For example, he wanted to know why this legislation did not cover every possibility of strikes in the Public Service and other areas in which the public interest of this country is represented. He used the railway workers as an example, and they, as far as I know—and I stand to be corrected on this—could be called back in case of a strike under the provisions of the Canada Labour Code. I think it is fair to say that the government has made a careful assessment and has concluded that as of now there is very little likelihood of any other strike that could significantly affect the public interest.

Senator Flynn: The air controllers, for instance?

Senator Buckwold: This is a protection for labour and the union members who work for the Government of Canada. We are not in any way interfering with the right to strike except in this particular case, in which it is possible that severe and lasting public damage could be inflicted by a strike which, if it took place without this legislation, could last for a very long time.

Senator Flynn: And if it takes place with the legislation, what then?

Senator Buckwold: We can talk about that in a moment, perhaps.

To conclude the point I was making, Parliament, in the vacuum of dissolution, would find itself, and this country would find itself, in an impossible situation. It would be a situation that I am sure even the honourable members of the opposition would accept as something that simply must not be allowed to happen.

The problem of wildcat strikes, which is what I think the Leader of the Opposition was referring to, is a real one. It is one that the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations looked at very carefully. We felt that one of the major problems in this country was not the right to strike—which the committee enthusiastically supported as long as it did not inordinately affect the public interest—but the wildcat or illegal strike. In the light of this we brought forward certain recommendations, some of which have been incorporated in Bill C-28, to correct the situation.

This is a very real problem, honourable senators. When people go out on a strike illegally, very often their union leadership has no control over them. Yet it seemed to the committee that after the smoke had cleared, and all the oratory was over, very little action was taken by the government against those people, or those unions, that were involved in illegal walkouts or strikes. We tried to direct some of our recommendations towards improving that situation.

I suggest to you that there is a danger of the Toronto Postal Station closing. It is quite possible that a small group of workers could walk off the job, in which case it may be necessary for the courts to move in the matter, although I am not sure that they would have the necessary jurisdiction. This, however, is something we would have to live with. The fact is that an over-all strike would be impossible under this particular legislation.

Honourable senators, I think I have answered most of the questions that have been raised. I agree with Senator Forsey that it would have been advisable to have had this legislation earlier. I indicated that in my preliminary statement when I opened the second reading debate. To my friend Senator Asselin let me say that I appreciate his remarks. I think most of them have been responded to in the course of my replies to the comments made by many of his distinguished colleagues.

All in all, honourable senators, this is a bill that none of us really wants to see on any order paper of the Parliament of Canada. I am not proud of it.

Senator Flynn: Leave it on the order paper, and do not put it in the statute books.

Senator Buckwold: Certainly the citizens of Canada expect this kind of consideration from their government, so that a postal strike will not affect their well-being or harm the economy of this country.

I agree that the Post Office could probably be improved. It has been suggested that bringing back Senator Denis or Senator Côté as postmasters general might solve most of the problems. It would certainly solve the problems of the opposition in many cases. I have noticed that every time the cost of mailing a letter goes up, the service gets worse. My suggestion is—and I say this facetiously—that we should reduce the cost of mailing a letter to three cents, and we might then have the kind of service we had 10 or 15 years ago.

Having said that in a humourous way, let me again ask for the support of the chamber for this legislation. Granted, it is not enthusiastically supported by any of us, but nevertheless it is essential for the well-being and protection of this country.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Buckwold moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish on your behalf to extend a heartfelt welcome to the Lieutenant-Governor of Saskatchewan, the Honourable Irwin McIntosh and Mrs. McIntosh.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Lang for the second reading of Bill C-19, to amend the Petroleum Administration Act and the Energy Supplies Emergency Act.

Hon. George I. Smith: Honourable senators, perhaps I might be permitted just a word before I begin to deal with this bill, since I am the first member of this group to have the opportunity of speaking after Senator Buckwold.

● (1540)

I should like to express my appreciation of his having recognized the fact of Senator Roblin's addition to us, and how much we welcome him here. I will wait for Senator Buckwold to finish his conversation, because I would hate him to miss my words of wisdom. He will have an opportunity on many occasions to recognize, with great appreciation, the contribution Senator Roblin will make to our debates.

I have also appreciated very much Senator Buckwold's ability to recognize the truth that we on this side of the house have been preaching, and which the electorate will soon deal with, that if perhaps he even inspires those tired old men who are too tired to run this government that will be quite an accomplishment. I think it is much more likely that those tired old gentlemen will slip away to a well-earned pasture as soon as the public has a chance to arrange it for them.

Senator Grosart: Tired young ones too.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I hope that does not disturb too greatly Senator Buckwold's easily aroused capacity to be astounded, but I warn him that he had better get accustomed to being astounded if that sort of thing troubles him.

Perhaps I might now be permitted to deal with Bill C-19. I should like to begin by saying that I agree with Senator Lang that it is a very complicated bill. He may also be surprised to learn that I found his analogy to Gilbert and Sullivan appropriate—although I think it would have been more appropriate, when I stop to consider the imagination one must bring into play in order to understand this bill, if he had referred to it as being typical of Alice in Wonderland. The honourable gentleman will not find it too easy to laugh when I get around to pointing out how much imagination he must exercise in order to understand this bill.

Before I overlook the fact, I think I should point out that this bill first saw the light in the other place on the 20th day of December, 1977—some four months ago. In spite of the fact that for a substantial part of those four months Parliament was in recess, it seems to me very strange indeed that a bill thought to be so urgent should come here so late, and should have such little help through its long journey in getting here as it received from the members of the government in the House of Commons.

The purpose of the bill is very simple, even though it is a complicated effort to bring about a simple result. The purpose of the bill is to make sure that the developers of our hydrocarbon resources in the tar sands of this country receive world prices for their product when they succeed in bringing it to the surface. That is a very simple objective indeed, and one with which I concur, I may say, in case anyone has any doubts about that.

The other chief purpose of the bill is to tax every consumer in Canada in order to produce a sum of money from which may be taken whatever is necessary to assure the world price to the developers I have mentioned. I want to make the point that this is a taxing measure pure and simple in that aspect which requires a levy of up to a dollar a barrel on every barrel of oil "processed, consumed, sold or otherwise used in Canada." See how sweeping that is—it is every barrel of oil "processed, consumed or otherwise used in Canada." In dealing with this bill in another place, the minister estimated that this would add something in the order of half a cent, as a maximum, to the price of every gallon of gasoline.

I said that this bill adopts a very complicated method of bringing about a perfectly straightforward, simple result, and I should like to make one or two references to that. Of course, the method adopted was to get this simple objective somehow or other worked into a very complicated act, the Petroleum Administration Act, and here is where imagination comes in. The only way this could be done by the method adopted by these people who wish to construct a maze for all of us to wander through was to ask you to imagine that the oil which is extracted from the tar sands is imported oil, to imagine it came from the Middle East, say, or from Venezuela. I will come to the words that ask you to exercise that imagination in a very few minutes.

To understand the method adopted, I think one has to turn for a moment to the Petroleum Administration Act, which is chapter 47 of the Statutes of Canada, 1974-75-76. These are the opening words after "Chapter 47":

An Act to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade.

The method adopted, as I am sure all honourable senators will recall, to raise the money necessary to carry out such portion of that object as has been carried out so far, was to impose a levy on every barrel of oil exported from Canada. The statute provides—not the bill we are considering, but the statute itself—that this shall be done by order in council provided it does not exceed the amount of $8 per barrel.

You will find at the very beginning of the bill that it sets out to establish a new part or division to the existing legislation. The proposed new Part III.1 contained in the bill is headed: "Charge on Domestic Petroleum and Imported Petroleum and Petroleum Products." I suppose those words are intended to convey some idea of what the intent is by the words which are contained in Part III.1. The proposed section 65.1 reads as follows:

• (1550)

The purpose of this Part is to provide legislative authority for the imposition of a levy on

(a) domestic petroleum processed or consumed in Canada, and

(b) foreign petroleum or petroleum products processed, consumed, sold or otherwise used in Canada, the revenue from which—

And listen to this:

—the revenue from which levy will assist in meeting the cost of paying import compensation on petroleum deemed under subsection 72(4) to be imported into Canada.

Can anyone reading that, or listening to it, understand what it means? If any member of this chamber understands it, I would be glad to hear him or her say so.

When one looks at section 72(4) of the act as it now exists, one will find that there is no such thing there. It is not put into the act until this bill puts it into the act. Who would think that petroleum deemed under subsection 72(4) to be imported into Canada is the petroleum raised from the tar sands of Alberta and other parts of western Canada? Who would think that?

So we begin to approach the "Alice in Wonderland" process that I am suggesting must be invoked in order to understand this bill. How do we exercise our imagination to decide that this oil produced by Syncrude in Alberta is imported oil? For the answer to this, we can turn to page 6 of the bill where clause 2 amends section 72 of the act by adding subsections (4) and (5). See what you make out of this gobbledy gook. The proposed subsection (4) reads:

The Board shall, when so directed by order of the Governor in Council, designate specific classes of petroleum as defined in subsection 6(1) to be deemed to be "petroleum" as defined in section 71 for the purposes of this Division, and the person who first uses ("uses" defined as prescribed for the purpose of any such designation) a quantity of such a designated class of petroleum shall be deemed—

There is that word again.

— shall be deemed to be importing it into Canada for the purposes of this Division and the regulations thereunder except that it shall be dealt with as petroleum as defined in subsection 6(1) for the purpose of sale for consumption outside Canada.

That is as clear as mud, isn't it? I wonder whether anyone could have successfully undertaken to conceal the real meaning more perfectly than the draftsman who is responsible for this monstrosity. Look at that word "deemed" again. It seems to me we have found ourselves to be subject to a school of drafting these days which does not believe in putting things in a straightforward and simple manner, and one which wants us to imagine that things are something that they are not, and says the law will imagine it for us by "deeming" it. I think this is a most dangerous method of drafting legislation, and one which should not readily be put up with by those who have to pass the legislation.

I ask you, again, how we are supposed to translate this strange lingo into the transition that we are asked to imagine is going to take place, namely, that oil from the tar sands of Canada will be oil imported into Canada, just as though it came from Kuwait or Venezuela.

When one boils it all down and looks to the various definitions—and not all, by any means, are in this bill—one finds that what this strange jungle of words means is that the board—which is the board defined under the act for certain purposes—if the Governor in Council so orders, will designate petroleum produced from the tar sands to be deemed to be petroleum imported from some foreign country. When it comes to selling that oil outside Canada, then it shall be deemed to be something else.

I think I have said enough to indicate the complexity of the concepts, and the language used to express the concepts, which are found in this bill.

Next, I should like to draw your attention to the fact that, although it simply follows the Petroleum Administration Act in this respect, this bill gives the most extraordinary powers to the Governor in Council. It gives the Governor in Council the power to direct the board in the way I have just noted. It gives the Governor in Council the power, as long as it does not exceed $1 per barrel, to determine from month to month the amount of the levy that shall be imposed on each barrel.

Although I will vote for this bill because it is the only legislation before us which will achieve the objects most of us wish to see achieved, I am going to suggest that it be referred to the appropriate committee so that we can understand the way it is to be administered, and ensure it will be fair to the public of Canada as well as to the corporations and persons who will benefit from its passage. I would not be prepared to accept as valid any argument that there is no time available for a committee to study this measure. We have heard that argument since the Easter recess. Every time someone wanted something studied in committee, that has been the excuse. I do not think that is sufficient reason for not referring this bill to a committee, because it is our duty to produce good legislation, if it is within our power and ability to do so. The least we can do in respect of bringing about good legislation is to have it carefully studied in committee, something for which Senate committees are well noted.

The talk about imminent dissolution—although I welcome dissolution because until we have dissolution we cannot get a change of government—leaves me cold. After all, we seem to be attending here to discuss it as though it were some great act of God over which no one around here has the slightest control, as though it were an avalanche, a thunderstorm or an earthquake inflicted upon us by one who is not a member of Parliament and not concerned with whether legislation is passed or not passed.

● (1600)

I say that is a completely false concept. That decision is going to be made by a member of this Parliament. It is going to be made by the man who, above all men and women in Parliament, should have the most desire to see good legislation passed into law before dissolution takes place. And if he is not sufficiently concerned to make sure that enough time is available for the proper consideration of this bill, then I do not see why you or I should exercise his judgment for him.

I say again that this bill has been around since the 20th day of December, 1977. It was passed by the House of Commons finally on the 17th day of April which, almost anyone can remember, is just a couple of days ago. So I think it must go to committee. There is no excuse for its not going to committee, and we would be doing less than our duty if we did not send it to committee.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform you that if the Honourable Senator Lang speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Choquette: Will the honourable senator permit a question? Does he know more about this bill now than he did when he introduced it?

Senator Lang: Actually I know less about it today than I did yesterday because I have been studying it further.

Honourable senators, the criticism of Senator Smith (Colchester), I take it, is not directed at the principle of this legislation as much as it is directed at its form and syntax, and I certainly will not try to defend that aspect.

As I said last night, there are certain programs—and I certainly think this oil control program is one—that have to meet a flexibility test under changing circumstances. And I can see how difficult it is to carry out such a program using legislative powers as opposed to broad discretionary powers that could be granted, and that have been granted in the past, and exercised under order in council. There are, of course, discretionary aspects in this bill as there are in the act it amends, but the broad powers that I would envisage necessary to implement this program, and to provide it with the elasticity that is required, would be something like those enjoyed by the oil controller in wartime, and under a mandate that literally gave all the powers and discretion necessary quite disjunctive from legislative review. I do not think we are in that sort of a political situation today, but undoubtedly the OPEC cartel and its effect on the world economic situation and on us has certainly created an emergency to which the government had to respond.

In my own opinion, I think the response has been most satisfactory. It is a scheme devised to bring Canada into the international market situation for petroleum products, but to do so with a gradation that would avoid dislocating our industrial infrastructure. As I said, Senator Smith's criticism is valid; it is directed to the syntax and it is directed to the complications of, not only this bill, but of the legislation which it amends. It is an insertion into the Petroleum Administration Act of a completely different part, and the cross-references between the insertion and the rest of the bill are complicated and tortuous.

I agree with him that examination of the legislation should be conducted in committee. These areas cannot be dealt with adequately in the chamber, and I would suggest that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce might be the committee most readily accessible to us for that purpose, and the one competent to deal with this bill. It is indeed a taxing statute, as Senator Smith correctly said. The levy is on all Canadians to the extent that they are consumers of petroleum products, and there are certainly very few people who do not fall within that category. The levy would be approximately 10 cents on a barrel of oil, and that should produce a subsidy to Syncrude production from the tar sands of about $3.70 a barrel.

For the record let me state that I am advised that current estimates place the rate of return from the Syncrude project in the area of 10 to 12 per cent on a discounted cash flow basis. In other words, the government is satisfied that it is viable economically with this bill in place—that is to say, with the subsidy per barrel based on international petroleum prices.

I would hope, if this bill is referred to committee by the Senate, that we could have some testimony there from experts in the petroleum field, and I know that some honourable senators, who are far more aware of the problems of this business than I am, will want to take part in the proceedings. I spoke to some of them this morning about this.

Accordingly, honourable senators, I would like to close this debate feeling, as I do feel, that the principle of the bill is accepted by this house, but I hope we shall have an opportunity to examine the various individual provisions, and a chance to interrelate them correctly with the legislation that is being amended.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Lang moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Stanbury for the second reading of Bill C-35, to establish the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, first, I must thank the Leader of the Opposition for thrusting me to the forefront, after only a few days in the Senate, by asking me to speak to Bill C-35.

I apologize to the Honourable Senator Stanbury for not being present in the chamber to hear his introductory remarks, but I read them with great interest in Debates of the Senate. His introductory remarks were both short and to the point, and I commend him for that.

Senator Stanbury referred to the multitude of federal-provincial acts and regulations of the various administering departments and agencies which exist. Indeed, if the centre is able to accomplish one thing, it would be worthwhile if it could extract from the jungle of acts and regulations referred to by the sponsor, a comprehensive formula which would reduce, as the purpose of the bill suggests, the incidence of long-term industrial diseases in the country and promote the fundamental right of Canadian workers to a healthy and safe working environment.

A reading of the debate which took place in the other house on April 17 makes it clear that this bill received the widespread agreement of all parties. The various mild disagreements expressed had to do mainly with the fair representation of all interested groups that will contribute toward reaching the objectives of the centre. It appears obvious, from the debate in the other place, that those differences were resolved amicably by the introduction of amendments by the minister and others on both sides, and agreement on the various amendments to the satisfaction of all parties.

To quote from the debate in the other place, the points of difference in connection with the various mild disagreements had to do, first, with the participation and contribution of the provinces toward the cost of the centre; second, the commitment of the provinces to make financial contribution and their participation on the executive board; third, the breakdown of the majority vote with regard to any vote of the federal and provincial governments; fourth, the reporting mechanism to be established; and fifth, acceptance of labour and all organizations toward the objectives of the bill.

The Minister of Labour confirmed that intense discussion had taken place across the country, that he had met with approximately 300 associations representing both management and unions, and that both labour and management were enthusiastic.

I indicated that the honourable sponsor was both short and to the point in his remarks, and I do not think there is any need to deal further with the many comments that were made. All aspects were covered quite succinctly and clearly in the other place. On behalf of my party, I have no objection to accepting the principle of this bill.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Stanbury speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I thank the Honourable Senator Marshall for his kind remarks and his comments concerning this bill. It is clear that the bill is acceptable to both sides of the house. I therefore hope that the motion for second reading will be adopted.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Stanbury moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the consideration of the fourth report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, when I adjourned the debate yesterday, I did so in order to verify the exact situation with regard to this report. I found that it was placed on the order paper for consideration. Senator Lafond spoke, and then adjourned the debate on behalf of Senator Forsey, and Senator Forsey spoke yesterday. At the conclusion of his remarks he was asked by the Speaker whether he was moving adoption of the report. The motion, in fact, was only for consideration. Senator Forsey said he had no objection, and, in fact, he would love to have the report adopted.

I would prefer that we go a little further, and that the Senate concur in the conclusions of the report, which is critical of the government's actions and the method chosen to increase the postal tariff. On the other hand, it may be a matter of semantics whether we adopt the report or concur in its conclusions.

I am informed that the House of Commons unanimously adopted this report, which, of course, is from a joint committee. I do not know whether I require leave to do so, but if there is no objection I would move that the report be now adopted.

Senator Grosart: I second the motion.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

CONFERENCE ON ALTERNATIVES CANADA

PROPOSALS CONCERNING THE SENATE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, April 13, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Argue calling the attention of the Senate to the recent Conference on Alternatives Canada, sponsored by the Canada West Foundation, and in particular to the proposals made at the Conference concerning the Senate of Canada.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, the session of the recent Conference on Alternatives Canada, sponsored by the Canada West Foundation, was held in Banff, Alberta, at the Banff School of Fine Arts on March 27, 28 and 29. The conference had placed before it a lengthy document put together by three professors from Alberta entitled "Alternatives." It was subtitled, "Towards the Development of an Effective Federal System for Canada."

● (1620)

To this meeting had been invited some 300 delegates, who attended. There were about 150 from western Canada, that is, from west of the Ontario-Manitoba border, and another 150 from east of that border.

The Canada West Foundation was set up some years ago. The principal objectives of the foundation are to initiate and conduct research programs regarding the economic and social characteristics and potentialities of western Canada; to initiate and conduct informational and educational programs; to encourage an appreciation of the Canadian heritage; and to stimulate an awareness of the future throughout western Canada. Those are laudable objectives.

This conference was called to discuss alternatives for Canada, which were set out as suggestions for constitutional reform. Senator Forsey, I am sure, will speak in this debate. He is much better informed than I am on constitutional questions, and I am sure that if I serve no other purpose by raising this inquiry than to provide a vehicle by means of which Senator Forsey will be able to make a speech on the Constitution, that in itself will be very worthwhile.

The setting of the conference was the Banff School of Fine Arts. I am sure that honourable senators will know that that school, with all its accomplishments, came about in very large measure through the inspirational leadership of Senator Donald Cameron, over the years, and his name is prominently displayed throughout the grounds.

One would have expected that a title like "Alternatives" having been put forward, there would be a range of various alternative proposals for constitutional reform, and indeed there were suggested reforms with regard to appointments to the Supreme Court and various other aspects of our Constitution, but it seemed to me that the key recommendation for which there was no alternative, and the one to which I wish to address most of my remarks, had to do with abolishing the Senate and providing in its place a House of the Provinces.

Who were the delegates to this conference that were going to decide, in a 48-hour period, what recommendations they might make, or whether they wished to go along with these particular proposals, and how did they become appointed as delegates? Well, there were some very fine people there as delegates. Some were persons from the universities, a few from labour organizations and a few from farm organizations; but while the delegates, generally, were of a high calibre, it seemed to me that though they were hand picked in many instances, in others the choice seemed to be rather haphazard.

One delegate from New Brunswick said, "I'm a druggist by profession. I don't know how I got in on this. I was supposed to pick four of the delegates. I was overseas, my mail came while I was away, I didn't get back until a few days before the conference, and I didn't have much time to scout around to get delegates."

All I am saying is that I do not think this was a selection of delegates on whose opinions you could base any scientific conclusions as to what Canadians wanted by way of constitutional reform.

There were quite a few members of provincial legislatures there. Four western premiers were invited, two of whom made it, two of whom did not. There were in addition members of provincial legislatures and a few senators. Among the latter there was, for example, Senator Sid Buckwold, who took a very active part. Senator Buckwold is one of the councillors to the conference, so he is part of the organization already, and I take it that he would have been there in the normal course of events. Senator Duff Roblin was there. This was shortly after he had been called to the Senate, and I was able to congratulate him. I believe he also is a councillor to the Canada West Foundation, and I would hazard a guess that he would have been there whether or not he had been called to the Senate. However, I was glad to see him there as a senator, and I heard him make what I thought were some important contributions to the discussion.

Senator Paul Lucier was there. He was asked to go on a panel in order to put forward the point of view of the territories.

I was there, of course, but I was an uninvited guest. I had simply decided that it might be an interesting conference to be at. I thought that if they were going to abolish the Senate I might as well be there to see how it was going to be done and to find out what I could do after I ran out of a job. They treated me very well. I was signed up as an observer, my hotel bill was paid, and I ate the best meals anyone could have. I did not have to dig into my own pocket.

Senator Flynn: You know how to behave as an invited guest.

Senator Argue: Anyway, I offered to pay my bill, as anyone would have, but they said, "That is all taken care of." I did not argue with them vociferously, but I was not influenced by them, even if that had been a possibility, because I did not find out that it was that way until it was all over.

The conference was divided into panels, of which I believe there were 10 or 12. There were 20 or more delegates who were eligible to go to each panel. Before the meeting broke up into panels there was a plenary session, and the chief author of this report on alternatives, Professor David Elton of the University of Lethbridge, made a speech promoting the ideas in the report and suggesting that there were things in it that provided answers to all of Canada's difficulties.

After discussions had gone on in the various committees, spokesmen reported back on two occasions on what they had found out in the workshops; but there was no debate at any plenary session. I take it that no conclusions were reached, because there was no decision made by the delegates.

I think the delegates started out believing that probably there was a great deal of merit in getting rid of the Senate; certainly that was the pitch that was made to that conference. It seemed to me, however, as time went on over the 48 hours, that more and more delegates said, "Now I am wondering about this. Perhaps the Senate is doing a few things that are worthwhile after all." And, as I viewed things, we seemed to pick up strength during the conference.

Senator Buckwold said that he made an effective pitch at his panel, and turned them all around. It seems that they became fans of the Senate after he had explained to them what had been going on here, and after he explained his own ideas—and we should all have some—with regard to Senate reform. Being an observer I was not tied down to any one panel, so I went to three or four; I had a shot at three or four of the panels, and enjoyed myself. At the first I was not making much progress; they were giving me a hard time, so I stayed with them for the morning and then did not go back in the afternoon. Next day they told me that as soon as I had gone they started to agree with some of the things I had said, and it was probably a good thing I had left because I won better when I was not there than when I had been there.

● (1630)

I went to a number of the panels and pointed out what was in my mind, that if there is great need for reform on Parliament Hill—and I think there is—all of the reform is not required in the Senate alone; that perhaps there should be some reform of the other place and how it operates, how it deals with legislation. But according to this document of the learned professors, the House of Commons must have been operating very satisfactorily, because there were no suggestions in this document for any changes in that body.

What were their proposals? When they presented their document, Recommendation 2 read:

We recommend that there be created by constitutional amendment a new Upper House to be styled the House of Provinces, and that appointment to this House be by the provincial governments on pleasure with no fixed term.

The provincial governments would appoint their representatives to the House of Provinces on pleasure. I take that to mean that the government in office in a province would send its supporters to the House of Provinces to carry on its fight on Parliament Hill for whatever that particular provincial government wanted out of the federal system. When they got here they would have a lot of power. They would have power to delay ordinary legislation coming before that body. They define ordinary legislation as legislation coming clearly and completely within the area of federal exclusive jurisdiction as under the enumerated headings of section 91 of the BNA Act. The House of Provinces would be able to delay this kind of legislation.

They would give it a further power, and a wide power. Recommendation 7 reads:

We recommend that the House of Provinces be given the power to review, and, when necessary, to set aside all orders-in-council.

It seems to me that if we wanted to bring parliamentary government in Canada at the federal level to a standstill, this would be exactly the way to do it; send the henchmen of all the provincial premiers to Ottawa, set them up in another house and give them power to delay. It is said it may be only a 30-day delay. Imagine a 30-day delay on something coming to this house. We cannot get a one-day delay here sometimes without running into great difficulty. The provinces then would have the right, through those the provincial premiers sent here, to a 30-day delay on all legislation in the power of the federal government. On the other legislation they would have to have joint sessions, and so on.

They would have the right to review all orders in council. In an explanatory note they say that if they wanted to stop an order in council because it was no good, the government would have to introduce special legislation to put the rejected order in council in legislative form. If any government were foolish enough to implement those recommendations, I would think the whole country would come to a standstill. It would not be an alternative to Confederation; it would be the wreckage of the Canadian nation as we know it.

However, the learned professors who put forward this document had second thoughts, with which we were presented before the conference had gotten very far under way, so I read from "Alternatives: Update". We got an update before it really got discussed at all. What did they do with what I will call their two main powerful recommendations? This is what they say about Recommendation 2:

We recommend that there be created by constitutional amendment a new Upper House to be styled the House of Provinces, and that this House consist of provincial (and territorial) delegations casting a single weighted vote.

So, you do not have independent thinkers coming here. They are not even independent enough to switch their point of view and stand up and be counted. They are part of a weighted point of view. I suppose that Saskatchewan in the House of the Provinces would have a weighted vote of perhaps 5 per cent; the premier would crack the whip; no individual in that delegation could exercise his own judgment.

In Recommendation 3 they say:

We recommend that all provincial premiers serve as ex officio members of the House of the Provinces, and that the position of President of the House of Provinces be filled by a provincial Premier or his representative on a rotating basis.

Then there is a further explanatory note about Recommendation 2, which I just mentioned. This further explanatory note reads:

It is not our intention to create in the House of Provinces a debating forum like the present Senate, with provincial patronage substituted for federal. The provincial delegates will be composed of cabinet ministers, members of the legislative assembly, or civil servants; they will not be "appointed" on a permanent basis or for fixed terms, but will serve as part of the delegation only so long as the provincial government wishes it. Since we do not envision the House of Provinces being in continuous session, we doubt this would require attendance of provincial ministers and civil servants in Ottawa to any greater extent than is currently the case.

They have a new House of Provinces; they have tremendous powers, but they do not have to come to Ottawa any more frequently than they come now. It is not going to be a House of Provinces. It is going to be a "Motel of Provinces." They just come down here and stay one or two nights, fix everything up in Ottawa that they could not fix up back home; they come to Ottawa and in one or two days they make certain that the country is on the right track.

Senator Flynn: Equalization in reverse.

Senator Argue: That is right.

One thing that encouraged me was that the named speakers who came there, Otto Lang and Flora MacDonald—who did not make exactly the same kind of pitch at the conference that she had made in the newspapers—Premier Loughheed and others, seemed to take the position that the parliamentary institutions that are here now need improvement and need change, but they did not see this kind of far-sweeping revolutionary change that was suggested in this particular paper. Premier Lougheed went on to say that he was most satisfied with the developing consultation between the federal government and the provincial governments.

● (1640)

He felt that this consultation was effective, and was obtaining results, from a provincial point of view. He went on to say that not only were there the first ministers' conferences and meetings of deputy ministers, and so forth, but that in the last year there had been 100 meetings between officials from the provincial governments and officials from the federal government. He felt that that kind of evolution was very desirable and, basically, should not be interfered with.

The fate of recommendation 7, which would allow the house of provinces to veto the passage or implementation of any order in council, can be summed up in one word, "deleted". That was the end of that recommendation.

Of course, the need for improvement in our institutions is there, and we should all try to do everything we can to bring about such improvement. While conferences such as these may contribute something towards that improvement, a great national political party, whether it be the Liberal Party, the Conservative Party, or even the NDP—although the latter is not a great national political party in the same sense as the other two are—should be given the opportunity to make serious proposals in this area, and those proposals should be given serious consideration.

The Liberal Party held a national convention in February of this year, which was attended by 3,000 or more delegates. There was a great deal of discussion with respect to parliamentary reform. The Senate came in for a good deal of discussion. There was a workshop called "Reforming Institutions." The main proposition was resolution 400 which said that the Senate should be reformed to allow for the direct election of senators. This came up for debate. There were approximately 300 people who attended that workshop. I did not count them, but Senator Petten is nodding his head in the affirmative, so I suppose I am not too far out.

After a considerable discussion at that workshop—a discussion which I thought was carried out in a democratic manner, because there were an equal number of speakers for and against, each speaker being allowed three minutes, with twenty minutes or so to discuss the motion—the vote was taken. This vote indicated that there was a great deal of powerful support for an elected Senate. However, this was defeated by a margin of approximately three to one, an overwhelming defeat of that motion.

There were other motions with regard to constitutional reform placed before that panel. One such motion was that the standing committees of Parliament be given more power so they could perform as their American counterparts perform. The latter part of that motion was defeated, but it was agreed that the standing committees of Parliament be given more power.

[Senator Argue.]

Then there was an all-inclusive kind of motion put before the panel. Incidentally, I should say there were three motions listed for discussion. These were priority motions. After they were discussed, any member of the panel could call out any number of other motions he wished which dealt with constitutional reform. Motion 402 was considered, at least by certain individuals, as very important. It read as follows:

That the government propose to Canadians a new federal constitution which would restructure political institutions and powers, including the Senate, Supreme Court, fields of taxation, residual powers, and would include a mechanism for continuous constitutional revision.

That is a blanket-type motion. It gives wide scope for constitutional amendment, with constitutional amendment not defined in any detail.

That motion was not called until the dying minutes of the deliberations of that panel. Someone said they should get in motion 402 before they went home. I would say there were approximately 40 delegates left when it was brought up. There was not the kind of enthusiastic support that I am sure those who were for it might have wished to see. It was brought in at the tail end of the meeting. Everyone was sick of talking and was ready to leave. I imagine one could have passed almost anything at that stage of the meeting. People just wanted to get out of there. In any event, that passed.

The officers involved in that particular panel were concerned that they bring something back to the plenary session with respect to the Senate. So many motions had been defeated that it was decided to formulate an entirely different resolution, and the one that went before the plenary session read as follows:

That the Senate be reformed to allow the provinces to participate with the federal government in the appointment of senators so that the Senate becomes a mechanism for regional interest in national policy formation.

As far as I am concerned, nobody was managing support for it or against it. Certain delegates got up and said they wanted to vote on this motion. Some complained of the terms of the motion, in that, in the Canadian context, while the federal government would be able to appoint senators, any input by provincial governments as to who should be appointed to the Senate should not be tolerated.

This motion, to my surprise, was defeated in the plenary session by a very wide margin. I do not like to guess at the numbers, because I could be wrong. I would say it was defeated by about two or three to one. It was strongly defeated. The delegates believed the provinces already had very great power, and did not want this power increased. The motion that the Senate be reformed to allow the provinces to participate with the federal government in the appointment of senators was defeated.

The discussions at Banff, and those at the National Liberal Convention, suggest to me that, while people may wish to have Senate reform, while they may be critical of the operation of the Senate, the Senate has a very substantial reservoir of good will and support in Canada. I think we are too bashful when it comes to defending the Senate, and when it comes to using our authority. I think the nation not only supports the Senate as the second legislative chamber, the chamber of sober second thought, but also as a chamber which can take important initiatives and do pioneer work in bringing forward important legislation. With that kind of support, we should decide, in our own minds, that we should become more assertive. I do not say that in a way to criticize what the Senate has been doing, because the Senate has done a great many useful things. The question is how we can bring this to the attention of the public; how we can get some credit for the work we do. That is a matter to which Senator Perrault is giving his attention.

I have in my hand something that surprises me. It is the number of amendments the Senate made to various government bills in the second session of the 30th Parliament. It suggests to me that over 100 amendments were put forward and adopted by the Senate in relation to government bills. In the first session of the 30th Parliament, from September 30, 1974 to October 12, 1976, there were 734 meetings of committees of the Senate, and there were 1,456 witnesses heard. So the Senate committees are very active and, I think, are doing substantial work that should be recognized across this country.

I spoke a little while ago about there being no suggestions for reform of the other place. Well, I spoke to an authority on the rules there the other day, and he pointed out something that I thought was very simple and elementary. He said that one of the reasons the Senate was able to get its work done was that it does not have a fixed time of the day for adjournment. If the work is not done at 5 o'clock, we can go on. If it is not done at 10 o'clock, the Senate can go on. The Senate can go on until midnight, and it can go on and on. But on Monday evening at 10 o'clock in the Commons debate on legislation is over. On Tuesday night at 10 o'clock and on Thursday night at 10 o'clock it is over. On Wednesday evening at 6 o'clock and on Friday afternoon at 5 o'clock it is over. There is no provision for an extension of their sittings on the spot to reduce the legislative load.

I can remember being in the House of Commons when Mackenzie King was Prime Minister, and those were different days. How were the sessions ended then? By sitting through the lunch hour and sitting through the supper hour, and going on through midnight to the early hours of the morning, week after week after week, until the legislation was dealt with. What happens in the present House of Commons, as I see it, at any rate, is that they bring in a large amount of legislation but it is not as large as the country requires. Many amendments to bills are not brought in because they are not given sufficient priority in the screening process, but their high priority bills are brought in but only a certain percentage of them are passed. Many of them are stood over for another session. I think that part of the difficulty in governing Canada today is the fact that the House of Commons is unable to deal with the legislative load required for the efficient functioning of government and for the efficient functioning of our economy.

There have been suggestions that some of the legislation should be introduced here, and so on, but I think that the House of Commons will have to deal with their own act so that those who want to speak on legislation will have an opportunity to speak, but within reasonable limits and within a reasonable period of time. The authority, the institution itself, the House of Commons, has the right to make a decision. Until a method of obtaining those decisions is achieved I really cannot see very much effective parliamentary reform.

A lot of us thought the election might be called last week. The election was not called last week. I think the main reason it was not called, and perhaps the only reason it was not called, is that one or two members of the opposition said with respect to the bill dealing with a postal strike during an election, "We don't agree to put it through quickly at this time." I am not arguing whether they should take that position or not; but I am arguing that it is a sad state of affairs when the majority of the House of Commons, and the House of Commons itself, has not been able to so order its business as to get legislation considered, and to make important decisions as they are required.

One of the important reforms that should be made in the House of Commons is a reduction in the number of votes that are considered as want of confidence votes. The members in the House of Commons individually should have greater freedom, and this would apply in particular to members on the government side, no matter what party is in power, and they should be able to stand up and as individuals in many instances make their own decision without undue pressure from party whips.

I would think that over there—and this was part of the discussion at the Liberal convention—the committees of the House of Commons should have greater authority, that they should be able to decide on their own initiative whether or not they wish to make certain investigations that appeal to them. I think steps should be taken so that they have a reasonable and secure budget and one not at the whim of the government or the Treasury Board which could say, "Such-and-such a committee is getting too rambunctious; it is making too many inquiries into sensitive areas; we will cut off their budget and we will make it more difficult for them to make the kind of exhaustive research they might like to make or that might be required."

In my view, reforms of that kind are important.

I would think, too, that the Senate could and should make many changes with regard to how it operates. The method of appointment to the Senate, as it has been over the years, is not the best method. I think it is a shame, with the political complexion of the country as it is today, that by and large we have a Senate of two political parties, one with an overwhelming majority and the other with inadequate representation. There should be some method by which the opposition parties in the Senate could be strengthened.

The idea I had—and I am sure it is not new—is that over the years appointments could be made to the Senate from political parties in a given Parliament in the same proportion as the representation of those parties in the House of Commons. Let us say that in a given Parliament 10 Senate seats become vacant. The government might be able to appoint, say, six senators, and perhaps the Conservatives three, and the NDP one, or something like that. If this formula had been in effect for the last 30 years—and I have not tried to do the mathematics in any scientific way—we would have a Senate today with perhaps 55 Liberals, 35 Conservatives, perhaps seven or eight NDP-ers and five or six Social Creditors. These numbers may not add up to the exact number of senators, but I would think that that kind of method of appointment to the Senate would make for a better Senate. It would be a Senate more representative of opinion in this country, and because of that it would be more effective in the important duties it has.

It seems to me that there are too few defenders of the Senate, and that may include senators themselves. We should operate on a higher profile, and we should take action that once in a while might cause the media to give us some attention. I had better not say the wrong thing, but the beef debate was one example of something a little high profile that got attention, and we were not able to carry on by using this as a precedent necessarily. I do not want to get into a debate about the rules, but by having important debates on current controversial questions the Senate might make a contribution.

● (1700)

There is a feeling that there should be more senators from western Canada. That is generally accepted. It was in the recommendation of the Joint Committee on the Constitution. With the developing strength of western Canada, with the growing population of western Canada, that is probably a recommendation that appeals to most people in the country.

There has been a feeling in the Senate—I think Senator Croll recommended this many years ago—that senators should elect their own leader, and the government should appoint a person to represent the cabinet in the Senate, or perhaps a number of senators as members of the cabinet, which would give the Senate an opportunity to discuss with responsible cabinet ministers the legislation of the day and the state of the country. That would be an important step.

It is a fact that there is a growing feeling among senators that they should take an independent stand more often when they feel they are justified, and that the Senate should acquire a growing reputation for amending legislation, rejecting it, if necessary. There are other ways in which we could bring a greater measure of democracy into the various operations of the Senate and to the various parties in the Senate.

It would appear to me that we are remiss in our duties as senators if we do not provide ourselves with better tools with which to do our job. The Senate is fortunate in its present Law Clerk, Mr. Raymond du Plessis, who is doing a good job. However, I suggest that it is impossible for one human being to do the job he has to do, such as giving advice to committees and senators on legislation, on proposed bills, and so on. He should have a couple of good assistants. The sooner he receives assistance in his job, the better it will be for the Senate. It would reflect on the work of both senators and committees. I might say that no one has approached me with regard to this. I would not like to cause embarrassment to the Law Clerk.

When I met Senator Jack Marshall after his appointment I said to him that when I came here I could not believe—and still cannot believe—that there are no research persons attached to the Senate, or an office where one could go and say, “I have something coming up in the Senate and I would like a little help.” We are told, “Go to the library.” The library is good. I give it full marks. But it is better if one can give them a month or two to look into a matter. They like to bring in a research document. That is not always the kind of research that I require. I like to have a little personal acquaintance with the person who is doing the job. If I have an idea, I will go and discuss it with him. He would give me whatever help he could, and I would be able to have the material in a few days’ time. We should have research help.

It is a pity that we do not have better secretarial service. A senator may arrive here from the House of Commons where he may have had four secretaries, and a couple more in his riding. If, as a member of the Commons, he wants to bring in a person in a research category, and that person is willing to work at a top secretary’s salary, he may have a research person. He may have someone as an executive assistant. The other day I telephoned an MP with regard to an event that was coming up. The person who answered the telephone said, “You will have to talk to the social secretary.” I wanted to talk about a business meeting, and when I spoke to the social secretary, she said, “Oh, that is for the executive assistant.” After talking to three persons, all in the office of the member of Parliament, I spoke to the executive assistant and got along very well. I believe we should have adequate secretarial help.

We do not have adequate space in Ottawa. We do not have offices in our provinces. They say, “Why don’t you represent your region, why don’t you represent your province?” We say “Well, let us have a Senate office in the province.” The reply is, “Oh no, you might be criticized.” If we work, we are criticized; if we do not work, we are criticized. So we cannot win. I would rather be criticized for doing something with which someone disagreed, than be criticized for not having done very much. So I think this is something which we should pursue.

I apologize to honourable senators for having spoken for so long and for having made a rather rambling speech. I am sure that it was not a very learned presentation on the Constitution, but we shall have that later. But as a layman who went to that conference and heard the discussions, who attended the Liberal National Convention, who has been in the Senate now for a number of years and who prior to that was a member of the House of Commons for a number of years, I believe that the Senate is important as a legislative body; it is important to the people of this country. It would be a tragedy if the Senate were abolished and replaced by a house of representatives under the authority of provincial premiers. That would be a terrible thing. There should be improvements in the Senate as the second legislative chamber, and the provinces should be consulted more, and should have more voice.

We should retain the first ministers' conferences and the consultation method. The Conference Centre should be a centre for the provinces. When the provincial representatives came to Ottawa, they could hold their meetings in that centre, where they can obtain good television coverage. From what I know about governments, there would be a far greater measure of co-operation and agreement if they continue along that road rather than trying to place the provinces in a position of power and in a position to veto the people's representatives in the House of Commons.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Forsey, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, April 20, 1978

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

April 20, 1978

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Wishart F. Spence, O.B.E., Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 20th day of April, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate
Ottawa.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Capital Budget of Northern Canada Power Commission for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1978-678, dated March 9, 1978, approving same.

Report of the Canadian National Railways, together with the Auditors' Report on the Accounts and Financial Statements thereof, for the year ended December 31, 1977, pursuant to section 40 of the Canadian National Railways Act, Chapter C-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Auditors' Report to Parliament on the accounts of the Canadian National Railway System for the year ended December 31, 1977, pursuant to section 40 of the Canadian National Railways Act, Chapter C-10, R.S.C., 1970.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT AND THE ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Macnaughton, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-19, to amend the Petroleum Administration Act and the Energy Supplies Emergency Act and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Flynn: At the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Lang: I was about to rise and ask, with leave of the Senate, that this bill be read a third time now when I heard the Leader of the Opposition say he wished third reading at the next sitting of the Senate. I do not know whether he is adamant in that respect, but this is—

Senator Flynn: I am not adamant, but I should like to have some explanation.

Senator Lang: The explanation is self-explanatory. We are having royal assent later this day, as the Speaker announced. It would be desirable to have this bill included in those bills which will be given royal assent today.

Senator Flynn: There will not be royal assent next week?

Senator Lang: I am asking, with leave of the Senate, to have this bill read the third time now.

Senator Flynn: Have it placed on the order paper for later this day.

Senator Lang: All right.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Lang, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cook, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

TAX REBATE DISCOUNTING BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Macnaughton, on behalf of Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Thursday, April 20, 1978

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill C-46, intitled: "An Act relating to the discounting of overpayments of tax under the Income Tax Act and related payments" has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, April 18, 1978, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Your committee, however, considers it important that the following observations be made:

Your committee has no objection to the principle of the bill, which is that the assignment and sale of tax refunds and the business of tax discounters should be regulated. The evidence given before the committee by the government officials and the various tax discounters who appeared all supports this principle. Your committee is sympathetic to the objectives of the bill and would support proposals that would carry out such objectives, but the bill in its present form does not, in the opinion of your committee, accomplish that purpose and your committee's reasons therefore are stated herein. It is because of the principle of the bill, which your committee supports, that it is reporting the bill without amendment.

In the opinion of your committee, amending this bill will not produce a proper and effective bill to deal with the problem of assignment and sale of tax refunds and the business of tax discounters in relation thereto. What is needed is a new bill based on proper research, including input by the tax discounting, which was not sought in the preparation of Bill C-46. No opportunity was afforded to the tax discounters to be heard, nor was there any consultation when the bill was brought forward. The logical starting point to produce a fair and effective regulation of the business of tax discounters is to start where the problem starts, namely, in the income tax office of the Department of National Revenue. A means should be found whereby the clearing and paying of tax refunds may be proceeded with expeditiously, so as to reduce or eliminate recourse to tax discounters who provide quick or fast money to taxpayers through the immediate realization in cash of their claims for tax refunds.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who appeared as a witness before your Committee, expressed interest in the above proposal and agreed to study its possibilities at once. He stated, however, that the Department of National Revenue does not have the necessary information to deal with this matter in the manner suggested. However, the evidence before your Committee established that the Department of National Revenue has full information on the subject of tax refunds since that Department is normally in direct contact with both the taxpayer who has a claim for a refund of tax and the tax discounter. The Department normally obtains from the tax discounter an undertaking to pay any tax assessable against the taxpayer who may, as a result of a re-assessment of his tax return, owe additional tax following the assignment and sale of his refund.

Your Committee found clause 3 of the Bill to be ambiguous because of an apparent contradiction between subclauses (1) and (2). Subclause (1) purports to limit the amount of the consideration paid by a discounter to a taxpayer to an amount that is not less than 85 per cent of the refund of tax to which the taxpayer is entitled. Subclause (2), on the other hand, appears to give the discounter the right to deduct from that consideration and, therefore, bring the amount to below 85 per cent.

It appears clear from the evidence of all parties who appeared as witnesses before your Committee, even those representing Revenue Canada, that tax discounting is a seasonal business, commencing soon after the T4 slips are received by the taxpayer in early February and ending about April 30th. For the rest of the year, there is no significant volume of such business. This period of near inactivity should afford an opportunity to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to study these observations of your Committee and revise and re-write the Bill. In no sense of the word can these tax discounting operations be described as major operations affecting large segments of the population.

Your Committee considers that it is most essential that attention be given to the immediate re-drafting of the Bill having regard to the observations made herein and to the fact that because of the seasonal character of the business there is no urgency for this legislation at this time.

Respectfully submitted,

Salter A. Hayden,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Flynn: Next sitting.

Senator Macnaughton: With leave—

Senator Flynn: You certainly will not obtain leave after a report like that.

Senator Macnaughton: May we have leave, then, to discuss the bill later?

Senator Grosart: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Macnaughton, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Connolly, P.C. (Ottawa West), that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY PROPOSALS FOR SENATE REFORM—QUESTION

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. There was a news item this morning to the effect that the Conservative Party had expressed a very definite view with respect to the reform of the Senate by converting it into "The House of Provinces" with senators being appointed by the provinces. Does the Leader of the Senate have any more particulars in regard to this particular item?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, I have never placed myself in the position of attempting to answer on behalf of the loyal opposition. The allegation that the Conservative Party is said to have taken a firm position on the subject of Senate reform is something upon which honourable members of that party may wish to offer comment.

● (1420)

Concerning the "House of Provinces" proposal, I gave an answer the other day in reply to a question of a similar nature deriving from reports of an Ontario royal commission study on the subject of the Constitution. My reply at that time indicated that there was no immediate intention of a federal government response to commission recommendations.

Senator Flynn: May I ask the Leader of the Government if the Prime Minister will soon present his proposals with regard to constitutional matters? That would have been a better question for Senator Bosa to put to you—better anyway than the one he did put, which should not have been directed to you at all.

Senator Perrault: Yes. In any case, honourable senators, usually fragmentary news reports cannot form the basis of questions for which useful replies can be provided. I can say, however, that constitutional matters have been under discussion. As well, I am sure they have been under discussion by members of other national parties. But I have nothing further to report to honourable senators on the subject at this time.

POSTAL SERVICE OPERATIONS BILL, 1978

THIRD READING

Senator Buckwold moved the third reading of Bill C-45, to provide for the continuation of regular postal service operations.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, as I indicated yesterday, this bill attempts to deal with one special problem which could occur only in special circumstances, namely, after the dissolution of Parliament. It has nothing to do with events that might take place before or after Parliament is dissolved and the writs are returned. The period covered by the bill starts from the first day after Parliament is dissolved and lasts until seven days after the writs have been returned.

Yesterday I asked the Leader of the Government if he would assure us that the bill would not receive royal assent unless it was clear that Parliament would be dissolved the next day. I could not get that assurance.

To me this piece of legislation is quite defective. It is also provocative in a way. It relieves the government of the responsibility of deciding that a strike would be contrary to public interest, and it also relieves the government of the necessity of reporting to Parliament, as it would have to do if section 181 of the Canada Labour Code were to be used for this purpose.

I do not want, nor does anyone on this side want, this piece of legislation to be proclaimed unless that for which it provides becomes immediately necessary. If we were to pass this bill today, give it royal assent tonight, let us say, and an election came only in the fall, the bill would be entirely useless and we would have tried to obviate a problem that was entirely hypothetical. I think the Senate has a duty, in words if not in deeds, to register complaints against unnecessary legislation, especially of this type. Therefore I would want to provide in this bill an amendment which would make it clear that the law will not come into force until dissolution. Perhaps it will not become necessary for the government to proclaim the bill. My amendment would have the effect of having this legislation come into force only upon proclamation, a proclamation that could not be made until Parliament had been dissolved. Thereafter, if the situation warranted, the government could proclaim the legislation and it would be applicable.

I do not want this legislation to go into the statutes, to come into force unless it is absolutely necessary.

Therefore, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Grosart:

That Bill C-45 be not now read a third time but that it be amended by adding thereto the following clause:

3. This Act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation, which shall be any day after the 30th Parliament has been dissolved.

I have some copies of the amendment for distribution to those honourable senators who may be interested. I am quite sure that some are not, but others may be. I think that Senator Argue would certainly like to have one.

Senator Argue: No, sir; they are always worthless.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps one should first be distributed to the Leader of the Government or, in his absence, to the Honourable the Minister of National Revenue who may be able to say, on behalf of the government, that he accepts the amendment.

Senator Guay: Wishful thinking.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: The motion will have to be put, Senator Buckwold. It may be wishful thinking. In fact, I am sure it is wishful thinking.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Buckwold, seconded by the Honourable Senator Laird, that this bill be now read a third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Grosart, that Bill C-45 be not now read the third time but that it be amended by adding thereto the following clause:

3. This Act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation, which shall be any day after the 30th Parliament has been dissolved.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Senator Flynn: The question has not been put. Senator Buckwold wanted to discuss the amendment.

Senator Buckwold: So long as the vote has been called, I am quite content.

Senator Flynn: But someone may want to speak on this side.

Hon. Senators: Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And more than two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment lost.

Shall the motion for third reading of this bill carry?

Senator Flynn: After having witnessed the renewed party discipline on the government side—

Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne): You don't have any over there.

Senator Flynn: —I am inclined to believe that dissolution is not too far away. I would have wished to be given assurance that this bill would not go on the statute books without reason. I hope it will not prove to have been an unnecessary piece of legislation. We will allow the bill to pass, but because of our objection in principle to the way this legislation is presented to the Senate we will allow it to pass on division.

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY BILL

THIRD READING

Senator Stanbury moved the third reading of Bill C-35, to establish the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Lang moved third reading of Bill C-19, to amend the Petroleum Administration Act and the Energy Supplies Emergency Act.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Lang that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: I believe the question should refer to the bill being passed now, not being placed on the Orders of the Day.

The Hon. the Speaker: The motion is that the bill be read a third time.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: Maybe Senator Lang could tell us if he is more convinced of the beneficial effect of this bill now, after the committee meeting, than he was when he moved second reading.

Senator Lang: Much more.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CONFERENCE ON ALTERNATIVES CANADA

PROPOSALS CONCERNING THE SENATE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the inquiry of Senator Argue calling the attention of the Senate to the recent Conference on Alternatives Canada, sponsored by the Canada West Foundation, and in particular to the proposals made at the Conference concerning the Senate of Canada.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, after the excellent speech of the Honourable Senator Argue yesterday, which I unfortunately had to miss, but which I have at least glanced through since with much pleasure and, indeed, at moments very seemly mirth, I might add, it may seem superfluous to add anything. But there are a number of points which I do not think Senator Argue touched on, or touched on only very briefly, which are worthy of discussion.

I should like to start with one that comes fairly well on in the recommendations of the conference, because it illustrates very beautifully the degree of authority which ought to be attached to the pronouncements of the three learned gentlemen—I believe they are professors of political science—who are mainly responsible for the document which the conference had to study.

● (1500)

They recommend that Section 92, Head 10, paragraph (c) of the British North America Act be repealed. Well, that is a perfectly tenable proposition. I don't happen to think it is a well advised proposition, but it is perfectly tenable and I have no criticism of the propriety of it. But I have the very gravest criticism of the remarks which these gentlemen have committed themselves to on the subject.

In the first place, you will find that they say that the provision—Section 92, Head 10, paragraph (c), which allows the Parliament of Canada to bring a purely local work under the exclusive jurisdiction of Parliament—would enable Parliament to take over by order in council—and I have it here at page 21—a provincial “nationalized” industry. I quote precisely:

... if Alberta attempted to nationalize its own oil industry, the Federal government could invoke Section 92-10(c) and take the whole thing over by an order-in-council.

These professors of political science, who are instructing the young idea, and who undertook to instruct this conference, on the revision of the British North America Act, are patently unable to read it. They don't know the difference between an act of Parliament and an order in council. This is not a very abstruse difference. It is one that ought to be plain to even the uninstructed intelligence, let alone to that of scholars, “savants” or “soi-disant savants” like these gentlemen. That is the first beauty.

Then they go on to say at a later stage that this particular section has never been used, and it is very fortunate that it never has been used, say they, because it would have led to the break-up of the country.

Well, as these gentlemen, judging by their names, are probably English speaking, and probably as deficient in knowledge of the French language as too many English speaking citizens are, and as they apparently are unable to read the British North America Act, which is written in English, I suppose it is not very surprising that they are unable to or have not read the classic work on this subject, Le pouvoir déclaratoire du Parlement—observe the words “du Parlement,” honourable senators—by Madame le Professeur Andrée Lajoie of the University of Montreal. The particularly relevant part of this excellent work, for my present purposes, is that so far from this provision of the British North America Act never having been used, there is, in the appendix to Madame le Professeur Lajoie's book, a list of 470 cases in which it has been used. So you can just see the level of learning at which these gentlemen have arrived. I sincerely trust that there was someone at that conference who could and would and did point out that this particular emperor of theirs had no clothes on. That is the first point I want to make.

I can't help saying that I shudder from base to apex when I think of students being instructed on the subject of the British North America Act by people with such a gross ignorance of a very plain provision of that act as these gentlemen displayed.

If we are going to discuss the revision of the British North America Act, it seems, to my humble intelligence, necessary that we should first, at least, read it and not undertake to change something without knowing what it is we are changing.

That is only one of the many beauties of this document which was placed before the conference. I propose to comment on some others, but I wanted to start with that because it is the most flagrant illustration of the kind of nonsense that is being foisted upon the Canadian people day after day now, in some instances by people who ought to know better.

I now turn to one of the recommendations on the Senate. I think it is Recommendation 7—oh, no, not Recommendation 7. That has been deleted. Fortunately, they had second thoughts on the subject of Recommendation 7, which would have given the proposed House of Provinces power to rescind orders in council. It is an astonishing thing, though, that anybody with the remotest understanding of Canadian government should ever have put that in. One can be thankful that they had second thoughts and deleted it.

But you will find in Recommendation 3 the suggestion that the House of Provinces will become an ongoing federal-provincial conference. Well, I think Mr. Lougheed knocked that one on the head. I can't imagine that the provincial governments would allow it to assume the functions of the federal-provincial conference. It does not seem to have struck the authors of this proposal that the upper house is supposed to be part of the national legislative machinery. If the House of Provinces really did supersede the dominion-provincial conferences, how much time would it have to deal with legislation? On the other hand, if it dealt with legislation, how much time would it have to act as a continuing dominion-provincial conference?

I suggest that the House of Provinces, as sketched out here, may be said to come under the remark which Lord Palmerston made when Sir Gilbert Scott proposed to construct the new government offices in Whitehall in a Gothic style which would give a superficial impression of the Italian Renaissance. Lord Palmerston's comment, as perhaps you will recall, honourable senators, was that this would be "a regular mongrel affair, neither one thing nor t'other."

Well, it seems to me that the proposed House of Provinces, as sketched out by the authors of this report, would be a regular mongrel affair, neither one thing nor t'other.

I observe also that the proposal for the allocation of seats would involve a reduction in the number of seats held in this house by various provinces, notably the Atlantic provinces.

Well, we went into this question in the Joint Committee on the Constitution some years ago, and the one thing on which we were absolutely unanimous—Senator Asselin was a member of that committee and I think he will probably support my recollection on this—the one thing we were absolutely unanimous on was that no province would accept a diminution in the number of seats. Any such proposal would be doomed to failure from the very moment it was uttered. But these gentlemen, as devoid of any sense of political reality as they are apparently of the text of the Constitution itself, calmly propose something that would deprive several provinces of their representation in this house, or rather would cut down part of their representation in this house. Instead of 30 seats, the Atlantic provinces would be cut to 21. I think anyone who supposes that that would get through a dominion-provincial conference, or a constitutional conference of any kind, or this house, is dreaming in colour.

We are told also that the votes of the provinces would be cast en bloc, as a block. As Senator Argue said yesterday, this, of course, is a splendid way of guaranteeing that the representatives of the provinces in this house would be debarred from exercising any independent judgment at all. I think even those who feel that my displays of independence on occasions when I vote against my own party and with the opposition are rather over-done, would be inclined to say that to forbid by statute, by constitutional provision, a senator or a member of the House of Provinces, or whatever he might be called, a "provincialler"—I don't know what he would be called—to exercise independent judgment is highly undesirable if we really want an upper house which would be an effective part of the legislative machinery of this country. If we want something which is really to be some kind of rubber stamp, if we want something which is really to be a means of blocking legislation morning noon and night, well, then, of course, there may be something in it. But if we want an upper house which is to perform adequately the real functions of an upper house, one of which surely ought to be to give sober second thought to legislation, then it seems to me absolutely disastrous, verging on the criminal, to suggest that the members of the upper house should be prevented from exercising their independent judgment and should act simply as yes-men or noddors for a provincial government, however admirable that particular provincial government might be.

• (1510)

Then you have Recommendation 4. Recommendation 4 also deals with the suggested upper house. It reads:

—that legislation in the reconstituted Parliament... be divided into two categories as follows:

a) "ordinary" legislation, that is legislation coming clearly and completely within the area of federal jurisdiction, as under the enumerated headings of section 91—

That leaves out, of course, the area of federal jurisdiction existing under the opening words of section 91, the peace, order and good government phrase. Then the second part of that recommendation is:

b) legislation regarding conditional grants, or within areas of concurrent legislation; a joint session of the two houses would be necessary to resolve conflict.

One of the other recommendations is that the House of Provinces would have only a suspensive veto. Well, if you are going to have a House of Provinces at all, if you are going to have an upper house appointed by the provincial governments, I think it is again dreaming in colour to suppose that they would accept an upper house with merely a suspensive veto. If the provinces want an upper house made up of their nominees, I should be willing, if I were not an old-fashioned Methodist opposed to betting, I should be willing to lay a pretty heavy bet that they would not accept this proposition. They would say,

"We want power. We don't want to get in there only to delay something. We want power."

Some of their spokesmen are saying that the provinces have far too little power now; that they must have more power; that they must have power to influence national decisions; that they must have power in the national legislative machinery.

If you say to them, "Look, you could have something that would enable you to hold things up and cause a certain amount of inconvenience to the Government of Canada," they are going to reply, "Oh no, oh no, we are not interested in that kind of thing. We want something real."

I may point out also that in a joint session the upper house would be heavily outnumbered. Would the provinces, given that they are so anxious to get real power, accept this kind of situation?

The recommendation goes on to say that the joint session "would have the very desirable side effect of forcing lower house representatives to think very hard indeed before they publicly vote against provincial interests"—and here I do my best by my tone of voice to underline what follows—"provincial interests as defended by the provincial government."

In a letter which I sent to the President of the Canada West Foundation, I referred to this as the greatest gem of all. Not only would the upper house be able to block legislation voted for by the people's representatives—unless, of course, they had merely a suspensive veto, and really able because of its political clout—but it would also be in a position to intimidate members of the lower house. It is blandly assumed, as it is so often in these discussions, that provincial governments elected on provincial issues will know better what is in the interests of the people of their province on national matters than the members of the House of Commons elected on national issues, or the members of the Senate, appointed, presumably, because of their knowledge of national issues as well as their knowledge, of course, of provincial interests in those national issues.

Next, we come to the question of the constitutional court. This is recommendation No. 9. They recommend that the Supreme Court of Canada be enlarged to comprise a chief justice and 14 puisne judges, with eight puisne judges to be appointed as judges of the appeal court and six as judges of the Constitutional Court, and that the chief justice serve as the chief of both courts and that the function of the constitutional court be to give binding opinions on constitutional issues as requested by the Attorney General of Canada, the attorney general of a province, the President of the House of Provinces, who would be ex officio a provincial premier, the Speaker of the House of Commons, or the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

This presents several interesting features. The function of the constitutional court would be to give binding opinions on constitutional issues, as requested, and so forth. This appears to contemplate binding opinions on abstract questions at the request of a whole flock of characters, including the attorneys general of the provinces.

[Senator Forsey.]

The present Supreme Court Act, as we all know, does provide for advisory opinions on abstract questions, and we have had some, in fact, some very important ones. But such questions can be submitted only by the Government of Canada and the opinions are not formally binding. The likelihood that they would be reversed is, of course, small, but the possibility is open. Also, we cannot now have provincial attorneys general, who might often be bent on making trouble for the Government and the Parliament of Canada, setting the whole machinery in motion.

I venture, in the second place, to suggest that it is at least highly questionable whether separating the constitutional aspects of a case from the rest of the case could produce better or more relevant judgments. It is also questionable whether we should get better judgments on the constitutional aspects of a case by having them pronounced on by judges who are debarred from considering the other aspects.

There was an excellent article several years ago on this subject by the present Mr. Justice LeDain in which he commented, with great authority and lucidity, on this very question, as I recall.

Then they go on to ban dissenting opinions. Well, in my judgment, this would be a most unfortunate provision. I quite agree that we do not want to have the kind of situation we had in the Saumur case where it becomes very difficult to say what the judgment of the court really meant, except that the chap won his case, as I recall it. You had four judges saying "A" for one reason, and four saying "not A" for another reason, and one saying, "Well, something in between."

I am not going to go into the technicalities of the matter, but you had something that I am afraid is of very little use to lawyers in deciding exactly what the legal position is on this subject, because there was, in effect, no real judgment of the court, except on the specific case invalidating a particular by-law, as I recall it.

So we do not want that. But I am inclined to think that when one remembers the long series of very important dissenting opinions in the Supreme Court of the United States from such eminent judges as Mr. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., Mr. Justice Brandeis and Mr. Justice Frankfurter, the banning of dissenting opinion may deprive us of some very valuable legal learning and some very valuable possibilities of later majority opinions.

I do not know what the point is of prohibiting dissenting opinions, and I cannot quite imagine why they put it in.

● (1520)

Then we have a statement that the binding opinion of the constitutional court will be incorporated into, although it need not on its own determine, the decision of the appeal court. This is at least very badly phrased, because clearly I should have thought, at any rate, that if the binding opinion of the appeal court was that the particular piece of legislation was ultra vires, then that would be the end of it. I suppose that is what they really mean, but they say that a binding opinion would not necessarily determine the decision of the court.

The whole idea, however, of a separate constitutional court, to my mind, simply rules out the modern and very sensible balanced interpretation of the constitution advocated by Professor Lederman, dean of constitutional law professors in this country now. I wonder whether the authors of this recommendation have read Professor Lederman's articles on this subject. If not I hope they might begin their education on the Constitution of Canada by doing so.

Now I come to recommendation No. 14. This is a very curious one indeed. The thing gets, as Alice said, "Curiouser and Curiouser."

We recommend that the current division of powers of the British North America Act be maintained as they stand, except that the following powers be removed from the exclusive headings under Sections 91, 92 and 93 and added to the concurrent powers:

Then, first of all, they say transportation. Well, I was under the impression that in effect we already have at least a division of powers over transportation; that transportation solely within a province is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial legislature, and that interprovincial and international transportation is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. And I cannot for the life of me see why we should change this. It seems to me that it is a sensible sort of arrangement, and I cannot see that they have given any argument here for changing it. It seems to me unfortunate that a provincial act dealing simply with intraprovincial transportation, transportation within the province, would be subject to being overridden by an act of the Parliament of Canada dealing simply with intraprovincial transportation. Why not leave the thing alone? But some people seem to be possessed by this urge for change simply for change's sake. "If there is something there, let us get rid of it and let us replace it by something else!" And it does not much matter what you replace it by as long as it's new! Well, then, that settles the question; that is the final word on the subject.

I leave out communications. There is some point that they could make there.

Then we come to banking, concurrent jurisdiction over banking, and my recollection is that they say that the national power here would be paramount "when this is clearly in the national interest." Well, this proposal makes my hair stand on end, because you are simply going to put it in the hands, presumably, of Parliament to say that in certain cases, "Yes, this is clearly in the national interest," while in other cases it isn't. Now why on earth we should put banking within the field of concurrent powers, again, is simply not explained. And they try to cover the difficulties that would manifestly arise by saying, "Well, of course, Parliament would override a provincial bank act if it was clearly in the national interest." Well, honourable senators, either this means very little or else it means a great deal too much. I will leave honourable senators to take their choice.

Then here comes an even more astonishing one—education. Well! If you are as old as I am and if you have read as much of the history of this question as I have—and there are honourable senators here who know far more about it than I do—this is enough to cause "each particular hair to stand on end like quills upon the fretful porpentine." I cannot imagine any better way of setting the country by the ears than a proposal to make education a subject of concurrent jurisdiction, even if you left the paramountcy in the hands of the provincial legislatures. This would certainly be a revolutionary change for my native province of Newfoundland—and there are several genuine Newfoundland senators here, and not mere exiles like myself, who can correct me if I am wrong. It would be a revolutionary change for Newfoundland. We have for Newfoundland a guarantee in the Constitution, an iron-clad guarantee and not simply the rather imperfect kind that is embodied in section 93, of the existence of our denominational schools. And it would be a revolutionary change for the province of Quebec. On that I need not expatiate; the Quebec senators here, I think, will probably not utter a roar of protest when I make that statement. It is clearly, to my mind, desirable that extra money should be made available by the Parliament of Canada, especially for the smaller provinces, to spend on education. The particular methods which are employed are obviously somewhat controversial and certainly open to discussion, but the suggestion that there should be concurrent jurisdiction, that you should have this Parliament legislating on the subject of education even though its laws might be overridden by any province, is a really horrendous prospect, to my mind.

Now you can produce beautiful abstract arguments for saying that you want to have a national presence in education, and that you want to have something that would guarantee the possibility of children going from one province to another not being at a disadvantage because of the difference in the educational system. But I think any progress that is to be made in the matter, and doubtless some is necessary, must be made by discussion, by agreement. I simply shudder completely at the thought of concurrent jurisdiction. Some of the bitterest controversies we have had in the political history of this country have had to do with education and with the degree of national power which already exists in regard to education under section 93, paragraphs 3 and 4, of the British North America Act. We have the whole trouble that arose in the province of Manitoba in the 1890s, and the Honourable Senator Roblin, I think, will agree that that trouble was considerable. And I think Quebec senators are likely to agree also that it was considerable. I am not in favour of removing those particular powers from the government and Parliament of Canada, but I certainly should be very much alarmed at the idea of concurrent jurisdiction.

They also suggest that health and social welfare should be matters of concurrent jurisdiction. Well, in health and social welfare now, except for unemployment insurance, which is purely national, and family allowances where jurisdiction is, so to speak, concurrent and presumably with national paramountcy according to the general rule, and quarantine and marine hospitals which are purely national, and pensions where the jurisdiction is concurrent with provincial paramountcy, the jurisdiction is now with the provinces, and again I think that we should be opening up a can of worms and giving rise to a great deal of extra and, to my mind, totally unnecessary controversy by providing for blanket concurrent jurisdiction here.

Now, let me see what the next one is that I want to draw attention to. Yes, this has to do with the appointment of judges. It is recommendation No. 19. I think this deserves some emphasis because like the suggestion for a House of the Provinces, it seems now to be getting some support in quarters which I should have hoped would be regarded as responsible. The Ontario Advisory Committee on Confederation appointed by the Ontario government has recommended that all judges, except the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada and the Federal Court of Canada, should be appointed by the provincial governments. Well, I suppose you can make some argument for that, although I am not much impressed by it. But, and here comes the real beauty, that Ontario Advisory Committee has added that all the judges concerned—that is, the judges of all the provincial superior courts—should not only be appointed by the provincial government but should be removable by the provincial government for cause. Well, that “for cause” sounds as if it might save the day, but in fact it will not. The lieutenant governors are removable for cause. Two of them have been removed and in each case the cause assigned was that “his usefulness is exhausted”.

● (1530)

It would be perfectly open to any provincial government to say of a judge who manifested too much in the way of independence that “his usefulness is exhausted.” I can well imagine that some provincial governments would have done it. I feel quite certain that the government of Mr. Aberhart, for example, if a provincial court had given an adverse judgment on some of its legislation, would have been certain that the usefulness of those judges had been exhausted.

This is simply to pour down the drain the whole principle of the independence of the judiciary, which has been one of the cardinal principles of every type of British parliamentary constitution for the last couple of hundred years, more than 200 years. It dates back to the Act of Settlement of 1702. It is really shocking that anybody should propose anything of the sort.

Well, now, these gentry here merely propose that the judges should be appointed by the lieutenant governor in council, but dismissible on resolution of both houses of the Parliament of Canada. Exactly how this would work in with the House of Provinces I suppose deserves some consideration, but the whole thing seems to me to be more an exercise in academic virtuosity than in statesmanship.

It worries me very much that so many people are apparently bitten with the idea that we should change fundamentally the judicial system. Some of them are suggesting that the Supreme Court of Canada should be tinkered with in some way or other. That is the most horrible proposition of all, I think.

[Senator Forsey.]

I would be prepared to go as far as to see incorporated in the Constitution what was suggested on this head in the Victoria Charter, but I should be very leery indeed of anything beyond that. I am horrified by three propositions which are often set forth by critics of the Supreme Court of Canada. One is that the judges should be seen to represent the interests of provincial governments. Well, the judges are not there to represent the interests of any government, provincial or national, or the interests of any individual or the interests of any corporation. If you are going to accept this kind of idea about the judicial system, then you are going to accept something fundamentally subversive, something so subversive of our whole system of government, so subversive of the rule of law, that you might just as well say to the communists of various stripes, “Come on, boys. Help yourselves. Just pick up the pieces. That is all you have to do.”

The second horrendous and dreadful idea about the judiciary is that the Supreme Court of Canada, particularly, should be “perceived”—a loathsome word, very popular, usually a cover for confusion of thought or refusal to think at all—should be perceived as not an instrument of federal government but as an instrument of the federation. I heard that last week from a very eminent newly-adopted Liberal candidate in the city of Toronto. I am proposing to write him a scorching letter on the subject. I said on the occasion in question, although he had unfortunately left before I said my say, that this again is perfectly subversive. Courts are not the instruments of anybody. Judges are not appointed to be the instruments of anybody.

And then, of course, you have the popular idea that judges are merely delegates of the government that appoints them. This again is wholly subversive. As the late R. B. Bennett used to say of various things, “It strikes at the very foundations of our institutions.”

I very much hope that in any proposals that are put forward by the government on the subject of reform of the Constitution, the authors will be exceedingly careful about what they do to the judicial system and especially to the Supreme Court of Canada. There may be room for some changes. It is possible that even my skeptical and conservative mind could be convinced of this, but I should want to see very strong evidence indeed that such changes were desirable. The mere idea that because people “perceive” the Supreme Court, for example, to be something which it is not, therefore we should change it to accord with their perceptions, is dreadful beyond description. If we are to accept this “perceive” theory, it means that if people have a false idea of something, if they are ignorant or under delusions, then you must change the reality to fit their ignorance and their delusions, instead of clearing up the ignorance, instead of enlightening them, instead of making plain to them what the reality is.

Nothing could be wilder and more foolish than this notion that you must change the reality to fit people’s “perceptions.” It is a very popular word in academic circles, and it makes me wonder if some of these intellectuals are really deserving of the term, or whether they are not perhaps deserving of being classed in the way that the late Healey Willan used to do, when he called them "the intelligensia, though God knows why they're called so."

I want to emphasize very strongly that point about the courts, because I think it is an absolutely key question in any matter of the revision or reform of the Constitution.

I have said on the whole very little, honourable senators, about the general proposal for a House of Provinces, because Senator Argue covered the subject so well. But in view of the widespread popularity of this idea it seems to have been at least flirted with officially by the Conservative Party in the other place—I have not had an opportunity of reading exactly what the proposals are, and perhaps I am a little unfair, but it seems at least to have been toyed with by the Conservative Party in the other place—it is a very popular idea that the upper house should be reconstituted simply as a House of Provinces appointed by the provincial governments.

Well, I think once again you have to consider what an upper chamber is for. Is it supposed to be an effective part of the national legislative machinery? If so, there are various reforms we could make, most of them, I think, by reforms of our own practice in this house. They do not need any constitutional change at all.

But that is the real question: Do you want to make this house a more effective part of the national legislative machinery? Or on the other hand do you want to make it simply an assembly of provincial hatchetmen or monkey-wrench fingers, a body whose main task will be to obstruct national legislation or at the very least to delay national legislation for some considerable period? And there are cases where, if legislation is seriously delayed, it is very largely lost, as we all know.

Which do you want to do? If you give the provinces the power to appoint the members of this house, then as sure as night follows day you will have a collection of people who are either spavined party war-horses or decayed parish pump politicians. I know that sometimes we are accused of having people of that sort here now. I think most of those accusations are quite unfounded, but I venture to say that, if you had provincial appointments, then the worst appointments that are made under the present system would look like gems of purist ray serene. If you have that, you would have either people of that kind or you would have dedicated hatchetmen appointed by the provincial government with instructions to kick the government in the seat of the trousers three times a week and twice on Sundays. Is that the kind of body that you want as an upper house of the Parliament of Canada? If that is what we want, I suppose we can have it. It's a recipe, I think, for legislative paralysis. It's a recipe for making the Parliament of Canada unable to exercise effectively whatever jurisdiction is left to it by constitutional change. It's a recipe in the long run, I think, for slow national suicide. I personally would have none of it.

• (1540)

I am quite prepared to see the kind of provision that was suggested by the Joint Committee on the Constitution, namely, that half the members of the Senate should be appointed by the Government of Canada on the nomination of the provinces. The provinces would submit a list of people and this would enable the Government of Canada to weed out the worst suggestions. For example, they might look at the first one and say, "Dear goodness no. These last five years he has been going to pieces completely. He is barely compos mentis now. He is prematurely senile. We can't have him." Then they look at number two, and say, "Isn't this the chap that 10 years ago was in the penitentiary for embezzlement? No, I don't think he is a very good chap." "Now, the third one is a woman: Ah, now that's something. In the second place she has been extremely active and valuable in various community efforts; and in the third place her mother is an Inuit; and in the fourth place her grandfather was a Ukrainian. The ideal appointment." Then we would get somebody who has some claim to represent the minority party, which might possibly be in power in the province; we get some better guarantee of more minority representation, more opposition representation in this house, but we don't allow ourselves to be obstructed; we don't allow this house to be infested by thoroughly unsuitable appointments whose function would be either to make themselves as useless as possible or to make themselves as obstructive as possible.

I think also, of course—parenthetically, I may add—that we ought to have, in any plan for the reform of the Senate, some provision for a guaranteed minimum of opposition representation in the Senate. If you want to say a guaranteed minimum of representation of opposition parties, plural, I should have no objection to that at all. You might run into some difficulties with the "simon pure" theorists of the New Democratic Party, because they might say, "We can't have anything to do with this obscene upper house. We will recommend no appointments whatsoever." But I am inclined to think, perhaps a little cynically, that if they had the opportunity of recommending appointments, they might find some people in the NDP who were perfectly prepared to take a seat in the Senate, and they might find they had a strong temptation, in fact, to make recommendations; and there would be no inconsistency in their doing so, even if they remained vowed to the abolition of the Senate. The British Labour Party has, I think, for years been committed to the abolition of the upper house, but it has not hesitated for a moment to appoint Labour peers, and there is a considerable number of them.

They could say, "We don't like the thing. We think it's dreadful. We subscribe to all that Mr. Knowles has said about the subject, and to all the quotations which he has given from Senator Forsey in a previous incarnation, we subscribe to all that, but nevertheless we think as long as the thing is there we ought to have some representation in it."

Well, that is by the way. That isn't directly relevant to the propositions that were put before this Canada West Foundation Conference. But I was led into that digression because of the importance of the subject and because of the fact that so many half-baked and crack-brained proposals for constitutional change are now floating around in quarters which ought to be considered responsible but about whose responsibility I have begun, because of some recent events, to entertain some doubts.

I suppose there is one dividend to be garnered from any foolish proposals which may have been adopted or toyed with by the Conservative Party in the other house: that at least anybody on the government side who is tempted to advance the same type of proposals will draw back in horror, not wanting to be accused of being a mere copycat or a mere echo of the honourable member for Kingston and the Islands.

I have spoken on this subject, honourable senators, perhaps longer than I should have. I know that as a rule on a Thursday afternoon time alone provides a species of closure in this house. But I could not refrain, when Senator Argue raised the question, from adding my two-pennyworth of observations, and I hope that honourable senators may have found a few grains of wheat in six bushels of chaff.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

NINETEENTH MEETING

Hon. Daniel A. Lang rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, March 22, 1978:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Nineteenth Meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group, held at New Orleans, Louisiana, U.S.A. from 9th to 13th February, 1978.

He said: At this hour on a Thursday afternoon, I do not wish to speak to this inquiry, but, rather, I ask leave, as has been the custom in the past, to have the report of the Canadian delegation printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix.)

TAX REBATE DISCOUNTING BILL

THIRD READING

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators, I ask leave to move the third reading of Bill C-46 now. This bill is set down on the order paper for third reading at the next sitting, but I am asking that that order be called now.

Senator Flynn: Let us say that you are going to explain the report, and then ask for leave afterwards. I will give the honourable senator leave to give an explanation of the report, which he offered to do.

Senator Macnaughton: I would like to move that we now bring forward for formal consideration the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee on Bill C-46.

Senator Flynn: Very well.

The Clerk Assistant (Reading):

Third reading of the Bill C-46, intituled: "An Act relating to the discounting of overpayments of tax under the Income Tax Act and related payments".

Senator Macnaughton: Honourable senators, the report has been read. There is no better explanation of it than the report itself which has been presented to the house. The Leader of the Opposition was there, and heard the arguments for and against. It is not necessary for me to explain my views and try to impose them on the Leader of the Opposition when he is so capable of making up his own mind. However, if, in the circumstances, I could give a proxy—if that word is a proper one—there is one senator who would perhaps like to speak on third reading, and I am sure that all honourable senators would like to hear from him.

Senator Grosart: You do not have to give him a proxy. He can speak on the motion.

Senator Flynn: I understand that the honourable senator has to move the third reading. I did not hear the motion. It seems illogical to me that after such a damaging report the honourable senator should want to move third reading. But, if he wants to—

Senator Grosart: No, I am not going to give leave. I will not give leave.

Senator Macnaughton: As the Leader of the Opposition knows, and as was said in committee, and as is clearly expressed in the report, we are in favour of the principle of the legislation, but we think it is badly drafted. I certainly think so, and I know the honourable senator thinks so too. Nevertheless, the principle is important, and the suggestion is that if the bill is passed now the department will take it in hand and rewrite it, and a re-drafted bill will be introduced in the next session.

● (1550)

Senator Grosart: I wonder if the honourable senator would make clear just what his motion is. At the moment, leave has been refused for third reading.

Senator Macnaughton: May I answer that?

Senator Grosart: I want to know what the motion is.

Senator Macnaughton: First of all, I asked for leave. Leave, I understood, was granted. Secondly, I moved the third reading of the bill, which I understand has been agreed to. Then you asked me for a short explanation, which I tried to give. There is an honourable senator here who would like to speak on third reading. I think perhaps he has some new information to present to us.

Senator Grosart: It is my understanding that when I gave leave originally it was leave for the honourable senator to argue the question of whether we should proceed to third reading. I am not prepared to agree to third reading immediately until I hear some better reasons than I have heard up to now for doing so. I am quite prepared to have the matter discussed—and our rules permit this, with leave, of course—but I am not prepared at this particular time to give leave for third reading.

Senator Macnaughton: The motion, of course, was that it be brought forward for consideration now. I do not know whether the honourable senator has seen the report of the committee which was presented today. The report, which was agreed to unanimously by the committee this morning, discusses the bill in great detail. I suggest that the honourable senator look at it now.

Senator Choquette: It was read by the Clerk Assistant.

Senator Macnaughton: It was, but the honourable senator may not have heard it.

Senator Forsey: May I ask a question, honourable senators? I do not have the text of the report before me, and although I listened to it very carefully I may have missed something. It appears to me from what has just been said that the committee feels this is a badly drafted bill and it wants a new bill, but in the meantime it thinks this badly drafted bill should go into effect. Is that correct? If that is so, it seems to me a rather odd position to take, that a bill which is very badly drafted ought to go into effect until such time as the department and the government are prepared to bring in something satisfactory, which might mean a very long delay indeed.

Senator Macnaughton: I will not disagree with what the honourable senator has just said. However, the report speaks for itself.

Senator Grosart: Has the motion been put?

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Macnaughton, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Lang, that this bill be now read the third time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I did not expect to be speaking on this bill this afternoon, but in view of what has been said here today, and in view of the urgency of the bill, I would like to make a few comments.

Senator Forsey says it is a bad piece of legislation, and I would have to agree with him. The fact remains, however, that it is useful legislation that my department could use in the interim to benefit many of our poor, our unemployed, and those on welfare. I am sure that even if this legislation were to benefit only a few people it would be of great assistance.

About a month ago I was asked about the usefulness of the Senate and its committees. This was in Thetford Mines where I was speaking to the Kiwanians. Little did I know at that time that I would be coming to join you here. My answer on that occasion was—and my thoughts are the same today—that the Senate committees are by far the best in Parliament. Many of the recommendations of our committees are excellent. As an example I would refer to the Agriculture Committee, which has done excellent work. I know that because I followed the deliberations of that committee in particular. Let me say also that I listened carefully to the recommendations in the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce which the clerk read a while ago. While I believe they are justified I also believe that every member of the other house wants this bill passed because of their concern about the poor, those on welfare, those with low incomes and the unemployed, who go to the discounters for help, first of all, in filling out their income tax forms, which seems to be one of the things many of them have difficulty with. In many instances when they do this they are sold a bill of goods, and are told, “We will only take 50 per cent of whatever you are going to get as a refund.” At that stage many of them do not realize the amount of money they have coming to them, and it is only after they receive the cheque that they write to me, or to the officials of my department, to say that although a substantial amount of money should have been refunded they have received perhaps only 40 per cent of it.

I would like to emphasize the necessity of this bill as interim legislation. I can assure honourable senators that I will discuss the matter with my colleagues in the cabinet, and with my officials, to make sure that your recommendations are made clear to them. This will probably result in a new bill after the election. I think this is very important.

I am sure you know that the opposition in the other house were almost completely unanimous in their support of this bill. In this connection I would like to make particular mention of Mr. McGrath of St. John's East who, although he spoke on the bill only briefly, did so very well.

Senator Asselin: May I ask the honourable senator a question? What could happen if this bill were not adopted today?

Senator Guay: That is a very good question. The answer is that a lot of people will be at a considerable disadvantage. There are many people who will be late in filing their income tax returns. As you know, this year, because the last day of April falls on a weekend, we are extending the deadline to the first day of May. The bulk of the filings, particularly of the poor and the low income groups, come in at that stage, for some reason. I am sure you are aware of that. If this legislation is passed many poor people will benefit, and I hope you will give the matter serious consideration.

Once again I want to compliment the Senate committees. I want to compliment the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee on its recommendations. Obviously, there were recommendations that nobody else had thought of. I took careful note of the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition and Senator Grosart, who drew my attention to a couple of clauses in the bill.

I realize that this bill is badly drafted, but at the same time it has some good aspects which will benefit those who need the legislation most. This is why I rose, honourable senators, and I ask for your assistance in this matter.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I spoke to this bill on second reading. At that time I drew the attention of the Senate to some of its deficiencies, and I am glad to see that the committee has agreed with the comments made at that time. However, this really must be the silliest of the silly seasons in the Senate. We are, of course, on the horns of a dilemma. The question is: Do we pass this legislation, or perhaps run the risk of accusations of not being concerned, as senators, with the regulation of this particular industry?

• (1600)

Senator Guay has made the point that, in his view, this measure is urgently needed. That is not the view of the committee. The committee, in the last paragraph of its report, says:

Your committee considers that it is most essential that attention be given to the immediate re-drafting of the Bill having regard to the observations made herein and to the fact that because of the seasonal character of the business—

And I underline this.

—there is no urgency for this legislation at this time.

That is the comment of the Senate committee, that there is no urgency for this legislation at this time. Yet, we are told that is urgent.

The committee, as I understand it—I was not at the committee meeting, but I have read the proceedings—took into consideration the seasonal aspects of this type of operation which Senator Guay just mentioned. The report of the committee notes that we are reaching the end of the peak season, and that there is no urgency. That is number one.

Senator Guay: It is well worthwhile to give them that opportunity.

Senator Grosart: If the honourable minister wishes to interrupt me, perhaps he would stand up.

Senator Guay: With your permission, I would just say that although there may be few who will benefit by this from now until the first of May, those people will derive great benefit if the bill is allowed to go through. We could use it, and at least serve a number of poor or unemployed persons, and people on welfare, who otherwise could not put their hands on some money. For that reason, I am pleading with you. I am saying that there will be quite a few such persons, and this bill is of vital importance to those few. I hope, Senator Grosart, you will understand that.

Senator Grosart: I fully understand the point that the honourable senator has just made. I should remind him that he was not asking me a question; he was repeating an argument he has already made, and I am quite prepared to answer that argument.

His argument would be valid if this bill regulated this practice. The question before the Senate is: Does it regulate the practice? The committee says no. The committee says that this bill will not regulate the practice. The committee's words are as follows:

Your Committee has no objection to the principle of the Bill—

Then it goes on:

—but the Bill in its present form does not, in the opinion of your Committee, accomplish that purpose—

We are faced with a committee report which says this bill will not do what the minister thinks it will do. The committee clearly says it will not regulate this business.

Senator McIlraith: I should like to ask the honourable senator a question which may be helpful in view of the fact that the report has been before us for only a very short time. I would ask him to read the next sentence in the report to the one he has just read. I think that is the nub of the problem that is confronting all of us. I hope he does not mind my interruption.

Senator Grosart: Not at all, because it is a question, and I would be very glad to answer it. The report says:

It is because of the principle of the Bill, which your Committee supports, that it is reporting the Bill without amendment.

That does not in any way deny the statement already made that this bill will not regulate the practice. It says that the committee supports the principle of the bill, and so do I. However, the question Senator McIlraith is asking in no way invalidates the argument I have just made that the committee says that this measure will not regulate the business.

Are we asked to pass a bill which will not, to use the exact words of the report, "accomplish that purpose"?

That is only part of the dilemma. There is, as has been pointed out, such a clear contradiction between the clauses of the bill that there is even further doubt as to whether it will accomplish its purpose. The purpose, as stated here, is quite clearly to limit the consideration that may be given for a refundable tax claim to 85 per cent of the amount owing to the taxpayer. That is quite clearly the principle.

Clause 3(2) says—and I am glad to see that the committee reports on this—that there may be deducted from that consideration various charges, including a charge for preparing the taxpayer's income tax return and any other charges related thereto. Therefore, there is a clause which clearly contradicts the basic statement of the bill.

If this bill becomes law, what is to prevent a discounter from saying to a taxpayer, "You claim you have $100 coming back, but I can only charge you $85."

Senator McIlraith: "I can only charge you $15."

Senator Grosart: Yes. Clause 3(2) clearly says that he can deduct any other charges. Read it. It is there. The committee says:

Your Committee found clause 3 of the Bill to be ambiguous because of an apparent contradiction between subclauses (1) and (2).

Subclause (1) states the 85 per cent principle, and subclause (2) says that notwithstanding that other charges may be deducted.

Therefore, I say the eloquent plea of the minister is meaningless because the bill will not do what he hopes it will do for those people who are in the unfortunate position of finding it necessary to accept a discount on the amount owing to them.

The committee also points out that this is not the right way to approach this matter. It makes it very clear that the onus is on the department. We are told there are only 22,000 annual cases, and, therefore, I can see no reason in the world why the department could not give priority to those cases and say to taxpayers, "If you are considering discounting, let us know and we will immediately find out what is owing to you. We will notify you that that amount is owing, and then you can go to a bank where a loan will cost you less than 15 per cent."

We are facing the dilemma of passing or not passing what is probably the silliest, most badly drafted, most ambiguous and most useless bill that has been before the Senate in my time. That is my objection to it.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we have all appreciated the comments of Senator Grosart and others on the subject of this bill and I think the committee given the responsibility of studying this proposed legislation has done a good job. It seems to me, from looking at certain paragraphs of the committee report, that the committee really is talking in terms of ambiguities and the possibility of loopholes in this proposed measure, and, of course, they have made recommendations on how some of these loopholes may be closed and how the bill can be brought to a more perfect form.

I speak as someone with some knowledge of tax discounting operations. When I was parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Labour, and later with Manpower, one of my tasks was to investigate the effect on the working people of this country of certain tax discounting "vultures" who have been afflicting all the provinces of Canada. I can only say, in the clearest possible terms, that the way in which some of the lower income groups of this country are being exploited by a number of tax discounters is an utter disgrace, and immediate action is required.

● (1610)

We have agreed on the principle of this bill. There is no disagreement on that point.

Senator Flynn: The purpose.

Senator Perrault: We have agreed on the purpose of the bill. In its present form, the bill may be an imperfect instrument to meet the problem, but I assure you, from my personal experience in looking at the problem of discounting and making it a matter of deep personal concern, having spoken on the subject in a number of forums across this country, that in its worst form this is an evil practice which should be stopped in this country.

I should like to commend the official opposition who, I understand, inspired the introduction of this present bill in Parliament. I understand that the idea for the proposal before us originated with one of the Conservative members from Hamilton, Ontario, who spoke in eloquent terms in the other place about the need for such legislation. The member of Parliament who speaks on consumer affairs for the opposition in Parliament spoke in glowing terms about the bill. That does not mean to say that senators belonging to the Conservative Party, the Liberal Party or any other party must agree with the views expressed by some of their party associates in the other place. However, when we look at this measure and the kind of support it inspired in the other chamber, and when I look at some of these names—Mr. Arnold Peters, with an extensive background in the trade union movement; Mr. James McGrath of St. John's East, a spokesman on consumer affairs; Mr. Clarke of Vancouver Quadra—

Senator Grosart: None of them found the defects though.

Senator Perrault: Senator, I am not criticizing the fact that senators may wish to set forth their concerns regarding the bill. That is the responsibility of the opposition in the Senate, and it is our responsibility on this side to do the same. When I read in the discussion in the other chamber that the recent federal-provincial conference expressed unanimous support for the enactment of a bill of this kind—

Senator Grosart: No, a bill of another kind.

Senator Perrault: All political parties came out in support of action.

Senator Grosart: Not in favour of a bill such as this.

Senator Perrault: Senator, you are quite correct in saying they had no opportunity to be involved in the drafting of the bill. That is correct.

Senator Grosart: They assumed it would be sensible.

Senator Perrault: The appeal that I make this afternoon is not for blind acceptance of a measure which has imperfections, but rather acceptance of a measure which will be helpful, at least in part, and which will lessen the burden on at least some Canadians. There may be some imperfections and some ambiguities that skilful exploiters of some of the poor people of this country will attempt to analyze and attempt to find a way around in order to continue their nefarious practices, and these imperfections should be corrected as soon as possible. In the meantime, I hope that we can give this bill support on third reading.

I want to pledge to you that, together with my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue—

Senator Grosart: He has left.

Senator Perrault: He had a committee meeting.

Senator Flynn: He is probably redrafting the bill.

Senator Perrault: I can assure honourable senators he has not left because of any lack of interest in the measure. Together we can meet with the Honourable Mr. Allmand, at the earliest possible opportunity, to discuss with him in detail the reasons why the Senate believes strongly that a more effective bill can be put on the statute books of Canada. But if it confers benefit on one Canadian, let us support this bill and place it on the statute books, and then go forward and bring in something better just as quickly as we can.

Senator Grosart: I should just like to clarify something. Would the Leader of the Government agree that if the purpose of the bill is as important as he has indicated—and with that I completely agree—there was a responsibility on the government to bring forward a bill which would achieve that purpose?

Senator Flynn: Are you suggesting it is better to have cosmetics than nothing? Is that the position of the Leader of the Government?

Senator Perrault: I am sorry, I did not follow that.

Senator Flynn: I think that the Leader of the Government has been saying is that he wants to apply more cosmetics to this problem; he wants the government to appear to be doing something even if, in fact, it does absolutely nothing worthwhile.

Senator Perrault: I hope my remarks did not create the impression that I believe the bill has only cosmetic value.

Senator Flynn: That is the gist of the report.

Senator Perrault: I do know, as a result of my experience with the Minister of Labour, and later with Manpower, the intricacies involved in meeting these problems of tax discounting. At the outset it appears to be a very simple matter to move with force and strength against the bad elements of the discounting community, but it is substantially more complicated than that. Obviously, certain senators have concluded that there are imperfections in the bill. However, it is obvious that it confers at least some benefits, and I think we should support it in that spirit.

Senator Forsey: May I ask the Leader of the Government why it is that we get such badly drafted legislation over and over again? Of course, it helps to justify our own existence, but it really is intolerable that bill after bill should come here, as we all know, in this blank and imperfect form, and sometimes very blank and imperfect form, as in the case of the Maritime Code bill. I do wish the Leader of the Government would use his influence with the powers that be to see that we do not have so much arduous work to do in correcting incompetent drafting, grossly incompetent drafting.

Senator Perrault: Let me inform honourable senators that at a recent meeting with my colleagues I made that point in the strongest possible terms, and pointed out that during this session we had experienced some real problems with the draftsmanship of certain bills. The Maritime Code bill was singled out as one of the examples.

Senator Grosart: We are getting another one now.

Senator Perrault: It seems to me that the process the Senate has engaged in with this measure once again indicates the importance of the Senate as a body of second thought.

Senator Asselin: The House of Provinces will take care of that.

[Senator Perrault.]

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave, I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, April 25, 1978, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Senator Marshall: Or else.

● (1620)

Senator Flynn: What bills are expected from the other place?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as of this hour we have had no indication of any dissolution later this day.

Senator Flynn: Dissolution?

Senator Perrault: I have no information with respect to that subject, and for that reason I believe we must proceed on the basis—

Senator Flynn: As if.

Senator Perrault:—of business as usual. In my opinion, that is the only basis upon which we can proceed, so we are proposing to meet on Tuesday next at the usual time of 8 o'clock in the evening, as it now appears that we shall not be receiving any further legislation from the other place before that date.

Senator Flynn: Who wrote that?

Senator Perrault: I have been advised that the bills most likely to come to us next week are: Bill C-39, to amend the Currency and Exchange Act; Bill C-36, to amend the Export Development Act; Bill C-10, to amend the Financial Administration Act; and Bill C-42, to amend the Criminal Code. So far the only committee meeting scheduled for next week is that of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which will be held on Tuesday at 8.30 in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

---

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Wishart F. Spence, O.B.E., Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to provide for the continuation of regular postal service operations.

An Act to amend the Petroleum Administration Act and the Energy Supplies Emergency Act.

An Act relating to the discounting of overpayments of tax under the Income Tax Act and related payments.

An Act to amend the Anti-Inflation Act and guidelines.

An Act to amend the Canada Labour Code.

An Act to amend the Farm Credit Act.

An Act respecting the administration and development of certain fishing and recreational harbours in Canada.

An Act to establish the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

---

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 25, at 8 p.m.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

NINETEENTH MEETING

REPORT OF CANADIAN DELEGATION

OPENING PLENARY

The Nineteenth Annual Meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group was opened by Congressman Dante Fascell, co-chairman of the United States delegation. He noted that a comparison with earlier agendas indicated that some issues recurred, while others were new. In order to interest participants, it had been decided this year to place on the agenda an item of mutual domestic concern. The U.S. delegation also hoped to receive guidance from Canadian members on some international questions. In general he thought that working practices of the Group had been improved over the years and he was particularly pleased at the decision the year before to introduce an "early warning" arrangement to alert both delegations to potential problems between the two countries.

Senator Lang responded for the Canadian delegation in a statement which noted the main features of economic and political conditions in Canada, and then contrasted the excellent state of relations between the two countries with a number of potential developments resulting from moves intended to protect U.S. interests which might damage those good relations. Since many of these actions depended in some degree on actions by Congress, he suggested that this situation increased the significance of the annual meetings of the Group. (A copy of this statement is attached as an appendix to this report).

Committee I—Domestic, Bilateral and Multilateral Issues

- A. Grains; international reserves, marketing systems.
- B. Nuclear proliferation: Canadian and American safeguards, the problem of nuclear waste, SALT problems.
- C. Armament and Disarmament: standardization, arms sales and U.N. Special Session.
- D. The 200-mile limit; the resolution of Canada-United States maritime boundaries issue for fisheries and resources.
- E. Role of internal security forces in a democratic society.
- F. Human rights including CSCE.
- G. Development assistance.
- H. Southern African questions.
- I. Potatoes.
- J. The Canadian Political Situation.

Grains; international reserves, marketing systems

A Canadian participant opened the discussion on this topic. He said that Canada would go to the United Nations conference about to open in Geneva to discuss a new international grain trading agreement with an open mind. Canada agrees that there should be order and stability in the world wheat situation. Other grains are a separate item but are also important. The crux of these discussions would be to establish a reserve system to ensure stability but also to make more flexible arrangements on pricing wheat. The present pricing arrangements had proved inadequate. He recognized that reaching agreement on an acceptable pricing mechanism would be difficult for the US but the need to establish stability in the world wheat market was imperative.

A US participant agreed that the goal of the Geneva conference was important. The US position there would not differ much from the Canadian position. He noted that the US accounts for 50% of the world trade in wheat and Canada for 20%. With 70% control between the two countries it was important to the world that the two countries have compatible views on stabilizing the market. It was recognized in the US that there should be some discipline on export subsidies on grain and grain products and improved market access. The recent agriculture strike in the US emphasized that the US negotiators must get the best type of agreement possible. Other US participants noted that discussions had taken place on the ministerial level between Canada and the US on this and other agricultural issues. There was a real debate in the US on the question of reserves and a reserve system. US growers feared that the maintenance of reserves would depress market prices. A Canadian participant noted that in Canada the existence of the Wheat Board made it easier for Canadian negotiators in Geneva. Canadian growers would be included as advisers. The US side explained that there was no formal machinery to deal with pricing, only on selling. This led to a discussion of the first big US sale of wheat to the USSR at below market price. This had been an expensive lesson. Subsequent sales have been at or near the market price. A problem arose on these large international sales. The US government bargained but the large US co-ops and agencies also conducted independent negotiations. Canadians asked if the experience with the first sale had engendered any pressure to establish something like the Canadian wheat board in the US and were told that while there had been such pressure nothing had come of it. It would be very difficult in the US to do so. The private sector would require guarantees of non-interference with their activities.

Another Canadian participant raised the question of grain aid. He asked how close the US has come to meeting the target set at the Rome Conference. Had the US lobby "Bread for the World" made an impact on Congress? He was told that the US has only gone about half-way toward meeting the target. Again pressure from the US farmers who threatened to cut production unless prices could rise had inhibited the accomplishment of this goal. It was emphasized again by the US side that the major US grainbrokers were a very strong force. They scoured the international market for possible sales which could be made to their own advantage. It was desirable that some mechanism be established to prevent this. There were problems however. The first big sale to the USSR had been justified in the US as providing food required by the people of the USSR but it was later found that American wheat acquired in this deal has been distributed by the USSR in Africa to the profit of the USSR.

Summarizing the discussion a US participant acknowledged that the nervousness of the grain producers and brokers in the US about the effect on market prices of a build-up of reserves would be a stumbling block in the Geneva negotiations, but the official policy was in agreement with the need for stability.

Nuclear proliferation; Canadian and American safeguards, the problem of nuclear waste, SALT problems

The discussion on the Strategic Arms Limitation Treaties (SALT) was brief. A Canadian participant congratulated the US for its initiatives. The SALT lay at the heart of the superpower relationship. The success or failure of the present negotiations will greatly affect other present and future issues—the nuclear arms race, detente, world wide disarmament, arms control endeavours and the future course of East-West relations. He asked if Canada could help the US in this matter.

A US participant replied that agreement on SALT II now in progress was not that close. Anything the Canadian government could do to encourage the US Government to keep pressing for an agreement on SALT II would be helpful. There was a growing counterforce in the US from ultra conservative groups who are well organized to present their political and philosophical views in open meetings and in publications. Their objective is to prove that the US has already given too much to the other side in the SALT talks. It was evident from the stubborn position stated by a recent Soviet delegation to the USA that while agreement was necessary there was little room for negotiation. A Canadian participant asked if it would be possible to put new life into the negotiations by deferring some of the major issues, getting agreement on those which were less contentious. Another US participant suggested that while both sides wanted to reach an agreement the position taken by the President during his campaign and since taking office on human rights including the USSR performance in this regard had made the climate for agreement very difficult. He characterized the current state of the talks as being "like trying to start a track meet in the mud."

The discussion of SALT was in fact an interjection in the midst of the main discussion of nuclear proliferation. The main discussion was introduced by a US spokesman who was sure that the US and Canada wanted continued close co-operation on mutual goals related to non-proliferation. The problem was, however, that around the world it had become increasingly difficult to exert control. He could understand Canada's concern about the processing of spent fuel possibly into weapons grade plutonium. Canada's activity to create safeguards surpassed the US. He asked the Canadian delegation how controversial was the nuclear question in Canada? In the US he said there were as many opinions as there were members of the Congress. There had been a new approach by the Carter administration which had honestly tried to sell the Congress on a non-proliferation policy. Unsuccessful efforts had been made to negotiate with France and other processors. It appeared to be pragmatically impossible to get an international safeguards agreement, but a start could be made if Canada and US took joint action on stronger safeguards and controls. A Canadian participant asked for an assessment of the attitude of Congress on getting the US to submit to international control beyond the present Vienna arrangements as proposed by the London suppliers. An American spokesman replied that in his opinion the US would probably agree to such control because it would be embarrassed not to agree but in these affairs the US liked to "go to the ball game with our own ball" so that it could take back the ball if the game did not go in its favour. However, it might be possible to get agreement on an international safeguards policy. The US had talked tough on Brazil's actions, it appeared to have control in the producers group, it had bitten the bullet on the breeder-reactor issue. If convinced that enforcement would work Congress would pass a bill to this effect. There had been no party differences on the non-proliferation bill which had passed with only three votes against.

A Canadian delegate turned the discussion to the nuclear waste problem. It was important that the US side realized that every level, governmental and public in Canada was concerned about nuclear waste. There was a House of Commons Committee actively considering it. The big problem was how to resolve it satisfactorily in political, environmental and economic terms. Canada from the beginning had emphasized the peaceful uses of nuclear development. It had developed the CANDU reactor and had tried to recoup some of the cost of development through sales to other countries. Difficulties resulted from the sale to India and the subsequent explosion there, then on sales to Argentina, Korea and Pakistan. Major political debate had been engendered by these sales and their possible ramifications. The Opposition parties were united in their opposition to the export program.

On the domestic side the situation was not as clear. For example, the public in P.E.I. had rejected investment by that province in the purchase of a CANDU reactor by another province, New Brunswick. There was concern about the expansion of nuclear technology, with the soaring economic costs which dislocate capital requirements for other needs and with the future political aspects of nuclear control. It was worrisome to Canadian officials that the US appeared to be ambivalent in its attitude toward the re-processing question. The US public was apparently more reluctant than the Canadian public in its acceptance of the expansion and development of nuclear power as an energy source regardless of potential hazards.

A US participant responded. The expansion of nuclear power as an energy source was a domestic political problem. For practical reasons the first plants had been located on water in coastal states. This engendered criticism that those states were reaping an advantage and in turn this created pressure for a national integrated program for siting nuclear power plants. Extending nuclear power plants was not thought to be the total answer. Breeder reactors had been stopped. The US was in a period of reconsideration of the whole energy question including nuclear energy.

A Canadian participant directed attention to Canada's stringent rules on safeguards which had possibly cost Canada some friends especially regarding sales to third parties. He noted that a mechanism had been developed between Canada and the US to control these sales but was concerned that it might be difficult to force multinational private sector organizations to observe guidelines on safeguards. This possibility was rejected by a US participant who felt international agreements would ensure control on the multinationals.

Another Canadian participant reviewed the new US nuclear non-proliferation bill. He gave the background to the conditions now placed on Canadian uranium sales. He further noted it was difficult to get government approval for an export permit, and deliberately so. Requests to export have to be accepted by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, A.E.C.L. as well as the suppliers.

A US participant commented that in his opinion the Canadian policy had basically been proven to be the right one. The US had tried to keep all interests sweet but in his view the nuclear question was too big and too important for the whole world to be treated in this way. He urged closer co-operation between spokesmen in the field in Canada and the United States. There could also be greater exchange of technical people between the two countries. He would welcome testimony from Canadian experts before the appropriate foreign affairs committees in Congress and thought there could be reciprocity in this area or at least in sharing information gained in testimony.

The Canadian side concluded the discussion making various points. It was questionable that sanctions could be applied to those countries which refused to conform to the policy of non-proliferation but it would be immoral not to try to gain this goal. Canada has been pressed by European countries, Germany specifically, to forget conscience and emphasize economic considerations in the sale of uranium. Public opinion in Canada supported the need for a balance between economic gain and world safety. Finally, it was observed that while Canada and the US from the beginning had gone separate ways in developing technology in this field, they now have to face the same problem of setting appropriate controls over their technology. A further dilemma existed. If the third world was denied access to technology they would find ways of developing their own over which control could not be exercised.

This discussion led into a brief exchange on the recent break-up of the USSR satellite containing radioactive material over northern Canada. The tremendous co-operation between Canada and the US in search and recovery was commended. International problems arising from the existence of satellites were bound to increase. President Carter had at first been critical of this incident but had backtracked because the US also has satellites in orbit. A Canadian participant concluded by observing that Canada was not as concerned about US satellites as it was assumed the costs incurred from any accident involving a US satellite could be recovered from the US.

Arms and Disarmament; standardization, arms sales and the U.N. Special session on disarmament

A Canadian participant led off on this subject which he felt required a combined continental approach. This would benefit both countries. He proposed to look at this question in the context of various issues. At present Canada and the US were in close agreement on the need for arms control. This point had not been reached without difficulties but progress had been made. In the area of trans-Atlantic co-operation the situation was not as promising. Standardization between Canada and the US was possible but within NATO it was exceedingly difficult. The US Military Foreign Sales Act which had proved bothersome to Canada was another context in which this topic could be discussed. Other contexts were the Defence Production Sharing arrangements, detente, SALT, human rights and Southern Africa. He pursued the final point in more detail. He was concerned about the US detachment from events in Southern Africa in contrast with the US involvement in North Africa. He looked in vain for a consistent pattern to US action in Africa. In human rights too the US posture is not the pattern in most countries of the world.

A US participant responded. He mentioned the recent visit made by some members of Congress present to the Middle East. He thought that co-operation might influence the balance of power in the north of Africa but not in the south.

Another US delegate turned the discussion to the US conventional arms transfer policy dating from May 1977. The US would not be the first supplier of new weapons technology to combatant countries. He cited the example of Angola where the US, as a carry over from the Vietnam experience, made no intervention. It sounded good to say that the 1976 dollar volume of arms sales would be reduced. President Carter wanted to apply arms restraint but Congress was unlikely to let this happen to any significant extent. The military advisers in the US too were against restraint. A problem stemmed from the development of weapons solely for export. For example, strong pressure for arms could be exerted by the oil exporting nations. Sales of arms were promoted by agents. It would be difficult to reconcile President Carter's desire to reduce production with the need to be practical.

The discussion was then specifically centered on Southern Africa and is reported under that heading below.

The 200-mile limit; the resolution of Canada-United States maritime boundaries issue for fisheries and resources

The US side was joined by several interested delegates from other Committees for the discussion on this and the deep sea-bed issue. The discussion was opened by a US participant who felt it was imperative that the boundary issue should be settled as quickly as possible. He outlined the activity of the Cadieux-Cutler negotiations from their inception. He noted that during the visit of Vice-President Mondale to Canada in January representations had been made urging an early conclusion. Now, however, negotiations had stopped temporarily. It was apparently agreed that they would resume for six weeks. If no settlement of outstanding issues could be made the question would be moved to international arbitration. He proposed that each delegation to the Canada-US interparliamentary group meeting communicate the recommendation of the group that negotiations should be speeded up. There was support for the basic statement of principles. There was a disposition in the US that whatever was worked out by the negotiators would be acceptable but there was a danger that the success achieved to date would be lost if the final negotiations got bogged down on too detailed discussion on species of fish, etc.

Another US participant pointed out that the fisheries question had been set aside until the boundary was settled, therefore pressure to do that was increased. He drew attention to an impending crisis in the Beaufort Sea if the boundary there was not settled. New Canadian discoveries were very close to the disputed area.

A Canadian delegate asked if there was any evident domestic pressure in the US to settle the border question. He was told that in Maine at least the fishermen whose trade is in groundfish particularly wanted an immediate settlement so they would know where they stood.

The Canadian side made the point that resolution was in sight but that there were legal principles involved. However successful resolution through the present negotiations was desirable. The Anglo-French arbitration was cited to prove that it could be disadvantageous to both countries if the question had to be sent for international arbitration. Both US and Canadian fishermen would have to be convinced that the settlement was just in order to live with it. The measure of agreement already reached on fisheries and hydro carbons by the two panels of negotiators dealing with the East and West coasts was brought out. The US delegation was asked if US had any outstanding border problems with other countries, and it reported that the Mexican border was settled already, that with Cuba was not causing difficulty.

The US side drew attention to public hearings on complaints arising from the interim fisheries agreement. These in part came about because the Canadian fishermen had not taken all their allotment and continued to fish after the US fishermen had taken their quota. The Canadian side concluded that arbitration should be avoided and expressed the hope that any treaty based on the successful negotiation of the issue would be facilitated in Congress.

A US participant returned again to the Beaufort Sea dispute. He insisted that in this area Canada was going to have to move west of the line it proposed. It would be unfortunate if the value of the resources in the disputed area complicated the negotiations. A Canadian delegate referred to the US concern regarding the possibility of an oil spill in this area and a US delegate agreed that such an event would give environmental groups added support for their campaign to stop exploration and drilling. It was unfortunate but at the moment neither the US or Canada had developed technology capable of ensuring safe off-shore drilling.

The deep-seabed issue of the Law of the Sea Conference

The item was introduced by a US participant. In the third United Nations conference on this subject since 1974 the Canadian and US position were somewhat similar, with the distinction that the US was working for a broad-based treaty with few restrictions while Canada wanted some protection. Meantime Congress would consider a bill to provide ground rules on private sector activities in deep-seabed mining unilaterally if the Law of the Sea Conference had not resolved the issue by April 30. Another US delegate described some of the problems in reaching agreement created by the delegates of other nations. Two bills had been prepared for the House and the Senate to give licences to mine the sea bed.

A Canadian participant responded. Canada was in favour of an International authority but Canada's arguments on the control of nickel production were now in its own self interest. INCO was vitally interested in US moves to permit mining the sea bed.

The US was told by another Canadian that it should be aware that the present INCO situation will have an effect on the Canadian position on this question.

A US participant described the background to the US unilateral action which arose pressure from the competing private sector interests that the deep seabed be developed. Any such development would have to be compatible with environmental issues and in this light it was deemed preferable to take minerals out of the sea rather than rip up the land. It was possible to achieve economic benefit and still preserve the heritage of mankind concept, and the contribution that could be made by the private sector should be considered in any solution. In summary the US could see that both countries wanted a comprehensive agreement but the US was strongly committed notwithstanding to unilateral action.

A Canadian participant concluded the discussion. He noted that the US was only claiming the right to harvest not to extend sovereignty over the seabed. It would be 5-7 years before the results of any processing of nodules was known. If in that time adequate technology to mine the seabed was developed it would be used; the private sector would not wait for international agreements.

Role of internal security forces in a democratic society

This subject was opened for discussion by a US participant. He stated that in the US the creditability of its security forces, the F.B.I., the CIA and the National Security Agency had been seriously challenged following the Watergate hearings and the revelations about their activities in Viet Nam. It was clear that the CIA has for example gone far beyond the intent of Congress in its activities in Viet Nam. These agencies therefore no longer received the sacred cow treatment. Their autonomy had been severely restricted and future legislation would reflect this. The select committees in both the House and the Senate which review their activities demand strict accountability. Even their budgets, formerly secret, were now examined carefully in committee. Helm's action had been based on his own judgment of the national interest but when it led to illegal acts he had to be treated as any private citizen and brought to account. Nowadays the activities of these forces were much more a matter of public record. They must report proposals for covert activities to Congressional Committees and the committees has the right to veto the proposal or to bring it to the floor of Congress.

A Canadian responded. He noted that Canada had not yet dealt as firmly with the problem of how to regard illegal acts carried out in the name of national security. This was a matter of a current debate. Who should be responsible? There was no parliamentary committee on security. Parliament in Canada did not have the same independence as Congress in dealing with such questions. Question time was used, and it was also possible to form a special joint committee of Parliament or to set up a Royal Commission. It appeared that there was movement toward expanding judicial control over illegal police activity. But the Canadian Parliament was caught in the same position as the British Parliament which assumed that the needs of security justified action to ensure it. The problem then became how to make the security forces responsible to the people. The Trudeau government polity was not to make its reasons public and this was a political issue. Canadians did not appear to have the same sensitivity on civil rights as Americans.

A US participant disagreed with this observation. He thought that probably American sensitivity has come about because of the traumatic experiences of the past ten years. Trying to find a mechanism to ensure responsibility and accountability in the intelligence field was not a new problem. The US had been trying for twenty-two years to find a way to get around the powerful "in the name of national security" argument.

A Canadian delegate commented that question time in the Canadian Parliament did not provide the degree of accountability required. There was not the same obligation to answer as in Committee, with the exception that failure to answer at all had been ruled irresponsible by the Speaker. Judging by the past record the power of Congress to require accountability is great. It can blow the whistle on activities of security forces, it can create agencies to deal with situations. In Canada such moves are dependent on sponsorship by the government and therefore can take longer to be set in motion.

Another US participant noted that the concern to establish accountability had had an effect on the problem of ensuring privacy of information stored in computers. Congress would never condone an illegal activity if it knew it was being proposed, and present arrangements make disclosure of intent mandatory. The possibility of illegal activity therefore no longer exists.

The Canadian side asked how discretion of the select committees was ensured, was this a problem? It was acknowledged that it could be a problem but it was felt that the censure which would follow any failure to be discreet provided a deterrent. Precautions were taken to ensure against leaks. The budgets of the security agencies for example were reviewed in a room which had been swept for electronic listening devices.

A Canadian delegate posed the general question of what leeway should be allowed a security agency which is not allowed a private person. For example, could the President permit some questionable activities under an executive order? It was emphatically stated by the US side that while such activity might be condoned it would still be illegal if it contravened the laws of Congress or the constitution. However it was also pointed out that on the whole the US security forces had done an excellent job.

A Canadian concluded the discussion. He observed that all cases of "illegality" in Canada could have been avoided if a warrant, which in the circumstances was justified, had been obtained. Unfortunately the security people had got careless, possibly because they were not under any strong psychological pressure to maintain legality. He sought more information from the US delegation on how opening of mail in the interest of national security is handled in the US. An undertaking to provide this information was given.

Human rights including the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe (CSCE)

Development Assistance

These two items on the Agenda were discussed together. They were introduced by a Canadian delegate who suggested that tying grants of aid to acceptable performance in human rights was in danger of becoming the current fad in international affairs. It had started with the Carter inaugural address. Human rights had been a pivotal point in the Carter campaign and a personal commitment of the President in his approach to foreign policy. There had been strong identification in the US with the plight of Soviet dissidents. Congress was on record supporting human rights and had taken direct action to prevent arms being provided in Ethiopia and elsewhere for example. This together with the increased activities of the NGO's (non-governmental organizations) especially church groups had focussed attention on human rights dramatically in the past two years. The numbers of delegations protesting the failure particularly of those regimes totally on the right, to show sensitivity for human rights was a continuing phenomenon. Interestingly the NGO's appeared to have forgotten the record of the total left. In Canada it was the ethnic groups which made the representations against the left.

He recalled that from a similar discussion led by Congressman Fascell at the last Canada-US meeting in Victoria the Canadian delegation became aware that Congressmen would accompany the US delegation to the Belgrade meetings. (C.S.C.E.) As a result an approach was made to External Affairs and Canadian parliamentarians had also attended the Belgrade discussions.

The most difficult issue was how to reconcile the new emphasis on human rights in terms of economic and trade issues? There was an evident shift now in Canada from the stand-point of principle. The December 19, 1977 declaration of policy on South Africa marked the first time economic policy had been applied directly to a human rights issue. In this case the Prime Minister had been careful to say that the case of South Africa was unique.

He called attention to the fact that the churches are now much more aggressive on the human rights issue. They were prepared to lobby stockholders, and to attend annual meetings of companies with interests in countries which were obvious violators of human rights. This new militancy would not yield to political pressure. Where was this debate going?

A US spokesman responded. He gave a detailed statement of the US position at Helsinki and noted that Canada had led in promoting acceptance of the Basket Three proposals. Canada's lead since Helsinki in working closely with the US and in NATO had been useful. The human rights phenomenon was new only in terms of the evident heightened sensitivity and the pronouncements by President Carter. It was an old concern in Congress. The statements on the Foreign Assistance Act and the action taken as a result of that act were evidence of earlier Congressional concern. There was a lot more activity now but it followed on a long seen need.

In the aid field especially the US had restructured its programs to deal with human needs as legitimate human rights. It was still a problem however to pass a bill to increase aid and decrease military expenditures. He agreed that the heavy emphasis on the human rights issue would continue. It was an appropriate matter for international discourse even if it did affect the achievement of detente. Human rights was not the only issue in the move toward detente. There were other over-riding issues but there was a strong desire on the US side that human rights should be a major issue. To gain ground on this would increase the strength of detente. Human rights was the only issue that the USSR was defensive about.

He then outlined Congressional action on various human rights activities. Congress accepted the appointments in the State department to deal specifically with the formulation of policy on human rights. A mixed commission had been formed to be the focal point for information in this field. Congress was anxious to stimulate the allies of the US to become more sensitive to this issue, to broaden it beyond individual cases and official activities. All publicity which engendered action on human rights was important.

He then commented on the current CSCE talks going on in Belgrade. There would be great difficulty about getting agreement on a final document due to obstruction from the USSR. This did not diminish the value of the meetings. It was well worth the fight to keep up the pressure to get agreement on the proposals in all three baskets. The meetings were important because they institutionalized the process. Congress would continue its active pursuit of human rights goals for some time to come. Finally he noted with approval that there was a move to establish a foundation to help advocates of human rights in other countries.

A Canadian participant called attention to the increased interest in human rights issues at the UN. This had been highlighted by the appointment of a Commissioner on Human Rights. He questioned whether this would actually improve the ability of the U.N. to deal with cases of violation of human rights. A U.S. delegate said in his opinion the appointment of the Commissioner was hopeful. It would be possible to strengthen the role by subsequent action.

Another Canadian participant called attention to the magnitude of the problem of reproaching countries with poor records on human rights. He quoted from a Freedom House publication categorizing countries by their record which showed 111 countries could be classified as not free or only partially free. This should be publicized and more material collected about local conditions. Publicity on this would make the claims of human rights advocates more creditable and would win acceptance for their activities.

A US participant pointed out that under US law now an assessment of performance in regard to human rights was made country by country and submitted to Congress. This too was a way of institutionalizing the process of review and discussion.

A Canadian delegate said that the US had been more aggressive than Canada in criticizing the failure of international financial institutions to be sensitive to violations of human rights in their decision-making. A US participant replied that caution was required in putting this kind of pressure on the international financial institutions.

This led to a more general discussion of the linking of aid to the human rights issue. A Canadian participant outlined the evolution of Canadian aid policy which had at first been looked at in terms of trade policy, then shifted to concentrate on giving aid to the areas of greatest need. There was as yet little evidence of a move to link aid to human rights issues. Canada was fortunate in that the labour movement in Canada was generally supportive of its aid programs. Labour did not feel aid assistance presented a threat to Canadian employment opportunities. There had been some objection to aid programs in Parliament on the mistaken grounds that it could threaten the Canadian economy. It was not generally recognized that 80% of funds allotted by Canada for aid programs was actually spent in Canada. He noted that the Canadian and US aid contributions as a percentage of GNP had reversed in the past five years, with the US now proportionately higher. There was, he concluded, broad acceptance for reasonable increases in the aid program in Canada. Another Canadian delegate observed that there were pressures building now against the size of Canadian aid programs.

A US participant raised the question of outstanding international debt and its effect on aid programs, especially the outstanding debt of the USSR. Some of the countries assisted by the US with aid for human needs had abandoned the servicing of their debts. This was causing a disturbance in the international currency field. A Canadian delegate noted that there was concern in Canada about the debt question as well and it had been the subject of a review and a report by the Commons External Affairs Committee recently. This concluded the Friday discussions.

Southern Africa Questions

This item on the agenda was introduced at the start of the Saturday morning meeting by a US delegate. It had however been touched on briefly the previous day when it was apparent that there was a wide divergence of views within the Canadian delegation. The US participant began by stating that the US side was united. The US was totally committed to support world-wide human rights by all possible measures. On Zimbabwe the US was totally committed to the Anglo-American settlement proposals. He agreed that there was a different time frame relating to each country, the Zimbabwe settlement being the more immediate.

A Canadian participant responded. He thought it inevitable that wide differences of opinion showed up when Southern Africa was discussed. The most contentious issues facing the international community could all be debated in the south African context—race, ideology, economic development and disparity. Debate raged on these issues everywhere. The US experience with its own internal racial problems probably made it more realistic in its approach to Southern Africa. Even if he could not applaud all US action there, at least the Carter-Young interest in the area was an improvement over the indifference of the earlier administrations. This interest had begun in the latter days of the Ford administration over Angola and through the Kissinger interventions in Rhodesia. In the earlier time Canada was more advanced than the US in pursuing Southern Africa questions at the U.N., but during the fall of 1977 Canada was overtaken by the US.

However in mid-December Canada announced its new commercial policy in regard to South Africa. He outlined the policy which he said was a controversial step, but one that had been taken on the ground that the South African situation must be treated as absolutely unique.

He was not optimistic about the possibility of success of any joint role with the US to bring about a settlement in Namibia. South Africa as the principal force on the ground would not relinquish supervision until the constitution was in place, nor would South Africa ever recognize a SWAPO led regime there. It was an unnegotiable situation for which a military solution was the likely end.

It was his view that Donald Woods was now the most cogent sane, sober, spokesman on South Africa. His speech to the Security Council on January 26 was evidence of this. Woods did not accept the possibility of an extreme solution but apartheid was unacceptable and had been increased in its application in the past 25 years. A bloodbath might be precipitated in South Africa as a result of these internal tensions regardless of any outside influences.

Several other Canadian delegates continued the discussion, making the following observations. On Namibia some of the irritants had been removed. It was clear that South Africa was testing the water by its action in Namibia. The opinion of Donald Woods as stated was not accepted by all. The US delegates agreed that Andrew Young had been optimistic and had over-rated the willingness of the South African government to move, but there was hope that it would gradually take a more positive attitude of its own volition. Since the December statement Canada had been in a less hypocritical position on trade with South Africa.

Another Canadian participant stated that both U.S. and Canadian parliamentarians shared the goal of wanting a peaceful solution in South Africa. He thought that Nigeria afforded a useful model. There was a real danger in pressing for too much too fast for the black South Africans. It must always be kept in mind that Cuba and Russia were in the background and would capitalize on any opportunity opened by a conflict in that area.

A U.S. participant agreed that there was no difference between Canada and the U.S. at all on the target but only on the speed with which it should be achieved. The sentiment of the present Congress was extremely sensitive to any interventions in South Africa as elsewhere. Trade continued with South Africa but apartheid was condemned. There was no evidence however that South Africa was going to abandon apartheid, therefore it was important to try to find levers of persuasion and to evaluate these for use in the prevention of a bloodbath.

A Canadian participant highlighted the geographic significance of South Africa in world defence terms. He felt confidence in the capacity of South Africans to deal with their problems without having North American views imposed on them. A U.S. delegate replied that not all Americans agreed with Andrew Young. It was his impression that the President had drawn back somewhat from his support of Young in the early days of the administration. The present posture of the U.S. administration on South Africa appeared to be to "give a push but not a shove". The recent activity of Mr. Vance dealing directly with the USSR on its activity in the Horn of Africa suggested that he rather than Andrew Young would be the administration spokesman on African affairs.

The discussion was then summarized by the Chairman who emphasized the concern of all delegates that outside pressure to achieve a settlement of the problems of race in South Africa might force an undesirable armed conflict if not applied with care.

Potatoes

Because of the presence of several concerned delegates on both sides in Committee I this topic was reassigned for discussion there. It was basically a question of the perceived threat to producers in Maine from Canadian imports. A Canadian participant described the situation giving rise to complaints on both sides of the border. There was a glut of potatoes at present everywhere, which aggravated the complaint. Tariffs on some potato products are to be set in the GATT negotiations which Congress would have to approve ultimately. It was the presence of the processors which had changed the situation and added to the tensions. The transborder problem also existed in trade between provinces and was just as difficult to solve. If tariff reciprocity could be achieved it would reduce tensions. The present Canadian tariff was 37½ cents per hundredweight over the year without quotas. The U.S. rate was also 37½ cents but a quota was established for seed potatoes and table stock. As the U.S. quota was within sight the duty was doubled to 75 cents. In principle this could be rebated if a shipment was actually proved to be within the quota but in practice U.S. buyers stopped accepting Canadian supplies in advance of the quota being reached. The quota was the main New Brunswick complaint. Another Canadian participant noted that this matter had been raised previously and that Senator Hathaway had made representations to those concerned about the adverse impact this act had for Canadian growers. This is a continuing irritant which could be removed. A solution through a bilateral negotiation of the GATT would be fairer and would not affect the growers. Only Canada and the U.S. were exporters of potatoes. Another Canadian delegate presented the problem experienced by Manitoba growers who supply processors in the U.S. In his view even equalization if not reciprocity would remove a real barrier to trade.

This led to a question from the Canadian side on how Congress got information from the administration about proposals for the GATT negotiations. In answer it was stated that the U.S. negotiator had met with three House Committees (Agriculture, Foreign Affairs and Ways and Means) and had replied to questions. Meetings to hear privileged information had been held in camera.

The meetings of Committee I concluded with a prolonged exposition by all members of the Canadian delegation on the Canadian political situation on which the U.S. participants had many questions.

Committee II—Trade and Economic Issues

A. Trade issues

- 1) status report on automotive trade; possible corrective action on auto parts imbalance
- 2) U.S. convention tax; impact on Canadian current account
- 3) MTN negotiations; bilateral and multilateral concerns and objectives; tariffs and NTBs
- 4) Chicken marketing boards
- 5) impact on Canada of possible restriction by U.S. of technology transfers

B. Metric conversion; a comparison

C. St. Lawrence Seaway tolls; possible agreement

D. Cross-border workers; status report

E. Canadian and U.S. economic situations; how to handle stagflation and unemployment; discussion of OECD McCracken study

F. Investment climate

- 1) Canadian foreign investment policy
- 2) Provincial jurisdiction over resources; potash, asbestos
- 3) Quebec
- 4) impact of depreciation of Canadian and American dollars

G. Canadian and U.S. international competitiveness; rising trade deficits; state of the economies; cooperative R and D program

H. Extra-territoriality; the uranium marketing arrangement and anti-trust regulations

Discussion in Committee II was so intense that it only proved possible to cover about two-thirds of the items listed in the agreed agenda. Specifically, items B on metric conversion, E on the McCracken study and a comparative examination of the two economies and G on Canadian and US international competitiveness were scarcely dealt with. However, there were a number of items, particularly in the trade field, which were not on the agenda but which were raised by members of one or other of the two delegations, namely, proposed restrictions on the imports of several products of importance to Canada such as zinc, cattle and steel, limitations on the export of logs to Maine, problems of horticultural producers in Canada and delays attributable to pilot shortages on the St. Lawrence Seaway.

Two of the three sessions concentrated largely on trade issues. The most intense discussion, which was joined by representatives from the other committees, concerned the convention tax issue and Bill C-58. The meeting concluded with a brief re-assessment of the committee's work.

Multilateral Trade Negotiations (MTN)

This subject served more as a jumping off point for discussion on bilateral trade issues than as a subject in itself. The opening Canadian statement indicated government willingness to enter the Geneva bargaining, having accepted as an objective the reduction of industrial tariffs by a weighted average of 40 percent subject to several conditions including a degree of tariff harmonization. There was in Canada, however, nervousness about the effect of possible tariff reductions on the state of manufacturing.

The American spokesman in response stated that it was necessary for the effective organization of world trade that the MTN should succeed. The negotiations posed special problems for Canada because of the higher levels of Canadian tariffs. He thought that the Administration would tailor an agreement so that as little as possible would have to be approved by Congress; the main issues which Congress would have to consider would be in the field of non-tariff barriers. He was relatively more optimistic than Canadian participants regarding the possibility of including an agricultural settlement, because of the growing awareness of many Europeans of the need to improve on the current arrangements for agricultural support in Europe. He was sceptical, however, that Mr. Strauss' timetable would be adhered to and even saw benefit in waiting for final negotiations until after some important elections taking place this year in Europe and the United States.

Autopact

The Canadian spokesman expressed concern about investment trends in the auto industry, which seemed to be favouring the United States, the paucity of research now being undertaken in Canada and the higher proportionate demands for cars in Canada which might raise the current overall deficit of $1 billion to $2¼ billion by 1985 at current prices. Canada had nevertheless decided against seeking revision of the treaty and would instead try to persuade the companies to do more sourcing in Canada.

In response an American representative commented that the agreement had assisted the North American auto industry to become more competitive. He noted in passing that the US industry, including the parts producers, were moving south and west; for example, General Motors had established an assembly plant in Louisiana. In general his advice to the Canadian authorities was to act carefully so as not to stimulate protectionist sentiments in the two countries. He hoped that with the increasing use of aluminium and plastics in car manufacture, both of which involved materials produced in Canada, a greater proportion of parts would be manufactured in Canada. If problems could not be resolved, he counselled intergovernmental negotiations. On this point a Canadian participant responded that consultation with companies appeared to be the best route since they might on their own make the decisions considered necessary by Canada. As for the risk that the government might apply undue pressure, the companies could always complain.

Two related points come up. An American participant observed that the UAW had not pressed for greater protection; perhaps having a Canadian wing helped them to understand the Canadian situation. On DISC, he was pleased that President Carter had advocated its termination. However, he thought Congress might fail to act, particularly since the floating exchange rate had reduced its effectiveness.

Export of logs to Maine

An American participant asked for information on recent restrictions imposed by the New Brunswick government on the export of saw logs to Maine. He was told that both Maine and New Brunswick had highgraded their forests for a century and that the spruce bud worm had aggravated the current shortages. The situation was worse in Canada than in the United States; Maine's pulpwood mills were at work, whereas New Brunswick had unemployment in paper mills. Canadian sawmills had also had to close due to a shortage of wood and there was no prospect of raising the allowable cut, which was already excessive. As a result the provincial government had decided to limit the export of saw logs. British Columbia and Quebec had imposed restrictions on the export of logs many years ago. He advised the Maine government to do as New Brunswick had done and require paper companies to prohibit the processing of saw logs into pulp. The information satisfied the concerns of the American participant.

Horticulture imports

Canadian horticultural producers have been undermined by Californian production, especially in the field of soft fruit and some vegetables. The share of the market satisfied by Canadian production had fallen from about 50 percent to under 30 percent. Part of the problem, it was explained, was that Canadian duties were specific rather than "ad valorem" and had not been adjusted for almost two decades, with the result that the margin of protection was falling. The Tariff Board had recommended that an "ad valorem" rate approximating the 1960 level be introduced for fresh produce to apply only during the Canadian crop season and that increased "ad valorem" rates be introduced year round for frozen and tinned fruits and vegetables. It was reported that Canadian action would be taken only after consultation with US authorities and that problems had to be overcome of relating this measure to the MTN negotiations. American participants asked to be advised of the timetable for Canadian action.

Western Canadian cattle exports

A US participant from a Western border state described the frustrations of American cattle producers, who considered that Canadian imports had driven down an already low price for beef. He understood, although few of his farming constituents did, that US producers were net exporters of pork in the West and of cattle in the East so that he personally did not support the embargo. He hoped to see more reciprocity in the field of agriculture.

A Canadian participant responded by wondering about the possibility of a North American common market in cattle. He noted that in fact Canada was about to introduce a meat import law, with some provision for freer North American trade. He was, however, uncertain about the legality of this law under GATT.

Fish exports

A Canadian participant expressed concern about the countervail action undertaken against groundfish imports from Canada. In 1974 when the fishing industry had been in bad shape, the government had given support to both catching and processing. As the industry recovered, this support was being reduced. He urged the United States to refrain from taking protective action.

Chicken marketing agency

US participants were curious as to Canada's plans. They were told that with Manitoba's agreement, the federal government was in a position to establish a national chicken marketing agency. Producer pressure was strong, since between 1970-76 US imports of chickens had risen from below one percent to about 6 percent of the Canadian market. If an agency were to be established, there would be prior consultation. It was understood that there was a risk of retaliatory activity by the United States.

Zinc and steel exports

Canadian objections to the operation of the steel reference price system had been explained in the opening Canadian statement. A discussion of Canadian objections to the proposed quota on refined zinc was initiated by the Canadian side which explained that Canada supplied zinc at the New York price and that the US problem was caused by underpriced custom smelted zinc refined in Europe. A US participant, with a large zinc producer in his district, acknowledged that Canada was known to have been a fair supplier and that particularly in 1973 at a time of world shortage, had not exploited America's need. For this reason, the producer in question, while supporting the application to the International Trade Commission, hoped that Canada would be treated fairly. The Canadian side pointed out that in the case of steel and zinc and possibly also copper, the US was responding to specific problems by general actions which tended to hurt Canada especially, even though Canada had had no part in causing the problems. Both sides agreed this was a serious situation which bore watching.

Possible restriction on technology transfers

Canadian participants expressed concern over reports that Congress might legislate some restrictions on the export of American technology. US participants responded that the AFL-CIO was pressing for some action in the field and that the International Affairs Committee was holding hearings on the subject. However, they did not expect the Committee to approve a draft bill. Although one American representative expected pressure for action to grow, he wondered how any restriction on what he described as the export of ideas would be enforced.

The convention tax question and Bill C-58

Discussion on this issue aroused widespread interest on the American side. In fact, it was proposed by the Americans that all three committees should join in discussing this item, which would in effect have produced a plenary meeting; but the Canadian committee chairman responded that this would give the item an exaggerated importance. Even so Committee III interrupted its proceedings to free members to attend and some Americans from Committee I also came to the Committee II discussion on the item.

A US spokesman opened the debate with the observation that the convention tax legislation had developed out of a Congressional initiative to put a stop to expense account high life abroad. The aim had been not to raise revenue, but to curtail an acknowledged abuse and there had been no desire to harm Canada or Mexico. The impact had in fact been unintended. But when the effort was made to exempt Mexico and Canada, those affected by a Canadian measure to protect its domestic TV industry had been successful in establishing a link in the minds of Congressmen. Although the financial effect of Bill C-58 was minuscule in terms of Canada—American trade, the connection had been made on the ground that each was a discriminatory tax measure designed, not to raise revenues, but to force a different pattern of action.

Canadian participants made a number of arguments to challenge this perception. They pointed out that, while the aim of the convention tax legislation was strictly economic, Bill C-58 was actually a device to promote a cultural and social policy. C-58 had also had an effect on two well-known American magazines, although surprisingly this had not become a subject of controversy in the United States. It was not yet evident whether Bill C-58 would cause the transfer of income, in the TV field from US to Canadian stations and it was pointed out that the potential was limited, perhaps $10 million in an industry generating $500 million of income. Nevertheless some advertising money had been diverted from TV to magazines, 20 new Canadian magazines had started and Macleans was about to become a weekly. Canada faced a special cultural problem in all fields, book publishing, record making and film production. National identity was especially important for Canada at a time of constitutional crisis and Bill C-58 had been a serious attempt to do something about the problem.

One American participant cited the instance when an Ottawa cable company had substituted Buffalo stations for WWNY in Watertown which had the effect of cutting 42 per cent of WWNY's revenue and of raising rates to local advertisers. Plattsburg's TV station owned by Rawlins Broadcasting of Atlanta, Georgia was faced with the prospect of a similar move to cut them off from the Montreal market. Even if C-58 were to be withdrawn the Watertown and Plattsburg situations would not be affected. In his view these actions indicated that Canadian aims were financial, not cultural. Canadian cable TV, because it received a variety of excellent US signals at no cost, was the most profitable in the world. Americans simply did not understand Canada's cultural problems. The popularity of US stations suggested that Canadian policy had little public support.

Canadian participants tried—but probably only with limited success—to meet this perception by reviewing the development of TV in North America, and explaining that CRTC enforcement of Canadian content had been introduced to ensure indigenous programming, so that Canadian young people would grow up with some sense of an identity separate from that of the United States.

Other arguments advanced by Canadian participants related to the convention tax legislation. Canada was uniquely affected because its citizens were members of most American associations. Until the enactment of the new law responsible associations normally held a proportionate number of their conventions in Canada. Plans for future meetings in Canada were now being cancelled, with a disproportionate effect since Canadians continued to attend the US meetings. Canada's tourist deficit with the limited status had reached close to $1 billion and the convention tax law had significantly aggravated this situation. The economic effects of the two laws were disproportionate. Estimates of the total effect of the convention tax legislation on Canada went as high as $100 million to $200 million annually. Translated into US terms the comparable impact would be $1 billion to $2 billion, whereas C-58 would at most only affect $20 million of Canadian advertising. Another Canadian participant argued against the principle of linkage, pointing out that two countries with so many and diverse interests had to be careful to treat every issue on its merits, or risk all problems becoming interconnected.

An apparent impasse emerged. Several US participants claimed that they understood and even sympathized with Canadian arguments. One mentioned that he had sought last year to repeal the whole of the convention tax legislation which he felt to be discriminatory and ineffective, but the Ways and Means Committee would not act. Although President Carter had raised the matter again with his criticism of the 3 martini lunch, he did not expect Congress to broaden the legislation to cover conventions in the United States. The domestic hotel lobby was too strong. So Canada had to face the fact that a link had been established and moreover that the lobby pressing for Canadian action on C-58 was efficiently organized and very well connected and had projected the issues in terms which carried emotional impact in Congress. Their leverage in Canada on C-58 being weak, they had fastened on the convention tax issue; its impact on Canada was disproportionate so they felt they had achieved considerable leverage. The position in Congress was typified by the situation in the Ways and Means Committee; the Chairman represented Oregon and was sympathetic to the Bellingham KVOS complaints and the ranking Republican as a Western New York State member was influenced by Buffalo's complaint. The conclusion expressed by one US participant was that Canada was paying a lot for principle.

United States participants suggested that there were three possible courses of action for Canada, if it wanted to have the convention tax legislation modified. It could withdraw C-58 in exchange for an exemption; the two governments could negotiate bilaterally; or it would be negotiated within the MTN. Canadian participants agreed that withdrawal in the face of US pressure was unacceptable. One Canadian suggested the establishment of a joint board, perhaps modelled on the International Joint Commission, to resolve border broadcasting issues, which he expected to grow in numbers. Others felt that this offered no prospect of quick relief, and that the US Congress could only act when it felt an acceptable compromise had been reached. Negotiations appeared to be the only viable route, but it was pointed out that at the time of the passage of Bill C-58 the Canadian Senate had secured an undertaking from the Minister of Communications to seek a better solution through negotiations with the Americans and that apparently nothing had been done. Some Canadians felt that it might be possible to exempt US border stations from the effect of Bill C-58 if they established a Canadian corporation and met Canadian content criteria.

Cross-border workers

An American participant from an Eastern border state raised the issue of cross-border workers. Two different situations prevailed. Some workers were admittedly temporarily under bond. Their right to work was limited to the job for which they were hired and was conditional on no American resident being available with the skills required. Others had been given resident alien status ("green cards"). The US courts had judged that a resident alien could maintain his status even if he left the United States every night to rejoin his family. These persons, once admitted, were free to take any employment they wished. To cope with this latter situation, the US participant had submitted a bill requiring resident aliens to establish permanent residence within a year.

In the discussion which followed, it was pointed out that there was a flow both ways and that both countries benefitted. In forest industry, for example, Canadians might be better situated to reach the working areas and prepared to remain in bush camps a week or two at a time. If this source of labour was cut off, the US pulp mills might have to close. It was therefore suggested that the Canadian Embassy might be approached by the US participant's staff and asked to prepare a full report of the implications of his proposal before he decided how to proceed.

It also emerged in discussion that US employers were opposed to the proposal. More importantly, US representatives of states bordering on the Mexican border probably prefer a system where resident aliens in fact do not set up permanent residence in the United States. The bill was therefore facing significant opposition.

St. Lawrence Seaway

While it was decided that agreement reached on the Seaway tolls made it unnecessary to discuss this subject, a US participant asked to bring up under it the problem of delays in Seaway traffic caused by pilotage problems. He tabled a letter from Mr. D. W. Oberlin, the US Administrator, documenting the numbers, extent and cost of delays in the Seaway between Montreal and Cape Vincent. In 1977 pilotage delays were calculated to have cost ship owners almost $2 million on this section of the Seaway alone. The US participant reported that he had just received the information and would be taking it up with the 100 members of the Great Lakes Caucus in Congress.

Two reasons for the delays were advanced. First, Canadian pilots in one section of the river are civil servants and this might lower productivity. The US member undertook to find and forward figures comparing the productivity of public service pilots with those who were not. Dividing the journey at Beauharnois was a second cause of delay.

It was agreed that the Canadian delegation would review this question at a delegation meeting and would probably draw the attention of the appropriate Canadian authorities to it. (According to a press report the issue has already been submitted to the Great Lakes caucus with the suggestion that hearings be organized). All participants were agreed that delays added to the cost of using the Seaway, and would affect the rates charged by ship owners for transiting the Seaway.

Extra-territoriality

Several Canadian participants described Canada's continuing difficulties with the extra-territorial application of US laws. Particular stress was placed on the current inquiry into the uranium industry in Canada, prompted by the Westinghouse anti-trust action. The closing of the US market in the 1960s and Westinghouse's decision to guarantee deliveries of uranium at a fixed price for the life of all reactors sold were described. Canadian members pointed to the serious effect on relations with the United States which would occur if criminal charges were laid against Canadian ministers and government officials.

US participants appeared to be surprised by the seriousness of the situation. They made no attempt to defend US actions, claiming that Congress was dissatisfied with the Justice Department. (The fact is that some Congressmen not at the meeting have been pressing the Justice Department to press ahead). They further suggested that the issue should be taken up with the Administration and that in the past the Justice Department had been influenced by strong objections raised by the State Department.

In the longer term, a US participant expressed the hope that the establishment of foreign subsidiaries in the United States would make the government more sensitive to the principle of extra-territoriality. Congressmen had discussed an international code with members of the European Parliament and it would eventually be necessary to proceed by way of international agreement.

The subject was raised in plenary spontaneously by the same US participant who said he would welcome information from the Canadian Embassy on this and other problems which threatened to damage bilateral relations.

Foreign Investment and Tax Deferral

The Canadian side reported on the application of the Foreign Investment Review Agency. The record showed that it was not preventing US investment. US participants were surprised that Canada was not attracting more US investment, which led Canadian members to comment on the difficulties of secondary manufacturing in Canada at this time.

This last point lead Canadians to ask how Congress would respond to the President's proposal to terminate the right of US companies to defer taxes by not repatriating annually income earned by subsidiaries abroad. US participants stated categorically that the measure would not pass.

US participants were interested to hear of the plans to develop potash reserves in New Brunswick with the government of that province pursuing a quite different approach from that of Saskatchewan. It was pointed out to the Americans that this was an area of provincial jurisdiction.

The meeting concluded with US participants putting questions on the Quebec situation, and with Canadian members providing broad commentaries on the development through the years of Quebec society. A Canadian participant closed with a personal appeal that Americans and Canadians continue to invest in Quebec.

Post mortem

There was a brief exchange on the quality of the Committee's discussion. The American co-chairman apologized for the enforced absence of some US participants (mainly due to the Panama Canal debate). It was agreed that both sides should organize themselves on their return to inform their respective governments of conclusions reached and of problems on the horizon. There was no interest in the discussion of domestic policies where one country could learn from the other's experience e.g. health insurance in Canada; it was felt that subjects of mutual concern should have priority and only when the two countries shared a domestic problem (e.g. the role of security forces) should the subject be added to the agenda. Similarly there was little interest in adding international issues to the agenda, unless both countries faced the same problem. It was felt that Committee discussions were now effective and that the opening plenary had taken a useful form. It was agreed that the closing plenary could be more productive and stimulating.

Committee III—Energy and Environmental Issues

- A. Supply and price of gas, oil, and other energy forms.
- B. The gas pipeline agreement; some ongoing issues.
- C. Oil pipeline routes in light of restrictions on Cherry Point; feasibility of Kitimat, Port Angeles, cost comparisons, environmental impact.
- D. Comparative programmes—Canada-United States
  - 1) conservation measures and policies;
  - 2) reserves and storage policies;
  - 3) environmental pollution control standards.
- E. Energy exploration and transportation; possible environmental problems.
  - 1) Beaufort oil and gas; Eastern Arctic gas; LNG tankers;
  - 2) east and west coast tanker traffic; hazards and regulation; refinery locations; Eastport.
- F. Air pollution; Long range transport of air pollutants; Cornwall Island; Boundary Wilderness (Atikokan); Poplar River.
- G. Great Lakes Water Quality.
- H. Report on Garrison Dam, Dickey Lincoln; Flathead River; Champlain Richelieu; Poplar River.

Supply and price of various energy forms

Canadian participants related that their natural gas supply situation had improved markedly during the year due mainly to new discoveries in Alberta. In addition, the results of high pressure drilling sites in the Beaufort Sea were promising and the prospects for new finds off Labrador seemed good if jurisdictional disputes could be ironed out. The Eastern Arctic might well prove to be a viable additional source and the Polar Gas LNG pilot project to bring liquified gas by tanker to eastern ports would merit watching.

In respect to gas exports Canada would meet all its commitments to the United States on present contracts. However, there were some problems related to gas swap proposals, that is, Alberta gas now for Alaskan gas later. For instance, when would swaps be paid back and at what price? A Canadian delegate suggested that an alternative to gas swaps might be an acceleration of the present throughput of gas with the result of an earlier termination of the contracts. Tied to the acceleration and swap ideas was an earlier construction of the southern portion of the Alaska gas pipeline in Canada.

The point was made that the Canadian government had announced it would look favourably on gas swaps so that it was now up to the multinational gas companies to work out the details. While some American delegates were warmly receptive to the acceleration suggestion, other delegates expressed doubt that the American gas companies would support it. They said companies were still unsure as to which companies would get the Alaskan gas contracts and in any case what they were really looking for was a net increase in supplies. Canadian participants pointed out that Alberta wished to bargain gas exports against better access in the US market for beef and petrochemicals. They explained that the emphasis on petrochemicals was in line with the Canadian policy of upgrading and further processing of natural resources before export. There was a natural Canadian reluctance to export gas which would go right into the American petrochemical industry while Canada itself wished to develop this industry domestically. While some of the US delegates were sympathetic to the Canadian upgrading objectives another delegate warned that he had heard exactly the same theme struck during his recent visit to Saudi Arabia. The Arabs also wanted to develop a petrochemical industry and would make their energy exports conditional on access and the transfer of technology. He wondered where Canada would find the markets it was hoping for.

In respect to gas supplies on the east coast, a Canadian delegate stated that there was a new plan gaining currency in Canada which would extend the trans-Canada gas pipeline through Quebec to the Maritimes. This proposal he said was moving quickly, it would help to handle the gas "bubble" and might provide export possibilities to Maine.

In respect to the oil supply in Canada, delegates said the picture had not shown a similar rapid improvement as in the gas sector although there had been some recent Alberta finds from deep-drilling techniques. The tar sands too undoubtedly offered vast reserves but huge costs were involved in these projects. In addition to continued though diminishing Canadian exports in all categories some oil swaps were taking place between the two countries. Additional exchanges of oil were possible including the sending of more western Canadian oil to the Northern Tier states in return for American-supplied oil to Eastern Canada. Detailed arrangements had to be left in the hands of the oil companies themselves. A constraint to the delivery of such crude at Montreal was the Canadian government's undertaking to keep the Sarnia to Montreal pipeline operating at full capacity in order to cover the costs of this line. One US participant said he thought the Canadian decision to let Canadian oil prices rise to the world price was the right decision.

While offshore sites from both countries in the Beaufort Sea offered potential prospects for additional supplies of both oil and gas in the future, participants on the two sides agreed that the techniques for transporting the resource to shore remained unproven and risky in the face of scouring or tidal action which could cause reeplines even in pipe imbedded below the seabed. There were also serious dangers to breaks in the casing of the drill holes, an American delegate emphasized and he feared another Santa Barbara disaster in the Beaufort.

The American side described the severe constraints to future energy development in Alaska in the current bill before Congress. This bill reflected extreme environmentalist pressures and would have the effect, if passed, of setting aside a huge and highly mineralized area in Alaska as a designated wild life area. The area was so remote as to be virtually inaccessible to all but a few and its passage, it was felt, would deal Alaska a paralyzing economic blow.

A Canadian delegate asked if pressure from extreme environmentalists in the United States was not having undue negative impact on the American development of nuclear energy. At a time when the energy supply outlook remained so bleak, was it not important to push ahead with nuclear power supply projects? Inevitably the slowdown in the American programme would mean that Americans would be putting heavier demands on world supplies in the 1980s and 1990s and Canada would feel the pinch as would other countries in the competition for scarce supplies of other sources. Furthermore, it had been established that nuclear energy developments were the least environmentally harmful. Uranium mining itself was more of a health hazard than nuclear power reactors. American delegates expressed interest in the recent Canadian report (the Hare Report) on nuclear waste management which concluded that nuclear wastes were relatively easy to deal with. Part of the American problem with environmentalists, it was suggested by a US participant, was perhaps due to the fact that the general public had not been involved early enough in the complex problems.

The Gas Pipeline

While almost every aspect of energy questions produced lively discussions during the two-day meeting, the most intense debate involved the Gas Pipeline Project from Alaska through Canada to the United States, a project characterized by one delegate as the largest construction project ever undertaken anywhere between two countries.

Under the pipeline topic, there were five different subject areas which engaged the attention of participants:

1. financing of the line
2. danger of delay by Indian claims
3. possibilities of delays by the provinces
4. Canadian content
5. pipe specifications

In respect to the financing of the pipeline and whether it could be financed entirely in the private sector, an American spokesman said that one of the determining factors would be the American decision on pricing of the Alaskan gas—whether it would be “rolled in” with other-priced US gas making the Alaskan gas less costly or whether it would be incrementally priced. He considered that if there were no “roll in” or if there were uncertainties as to price or if no gas bill were passed in Congress this could delay the whole project, restrict the possibility of private sector financing, and oblige the US federal government to step in to assist in financing this project of getting an essential American gas supply to market. In response to an assertion by an American member that he had heard Canada was not going to allow any American capital involvement in the Canadian portion of the line, the Canadian side informed the US delegates of the financing proposal for the Canadian section: 25 percent in common equity, 25 percent Canadian debt and 50 percent American debt, probably on the New York money market.

American participants questioned Canadians as to the possibility of delays through Indian claims or through provincial demands. Canadian delegates acknowledged that the Yukon and non-status Indians wanted the second stage of the Lysyk inquiry to be held. However negotiations were currently underway and it was generally thought likely that an agreement in principle would be reached during 1978. The situation was very different from that in Alaska with no real likelihood that the project in Canada could be stopped by Indian claims litigation. However several British Columbia delegates doubted that the B.C. Indians would be so amenable.

As far as provincial complications were concerned, the Canadian side said that the concerns of Alberta and Saskatchewan appeared to have been settled but the B.C. government was unhappy since proposed tax arrangements would net the Yukon over three times the amount as B.C. for the same length of pipeline. While the situation was still under discussion with B.C., it was thought likely that as soon as the Canadian legislation passed in the House of Commons, B.C. would act to resolve the problem as it had no intention of thwarting the construction of the line.

In respect to Canadian content the American participants questioned the Canadian delegation very closely on what was really intended regarding Canadian content on the Canadian portion of the line. Was the 90 percent objective of Foothills to be adhered to? What did it mean in terms of labour, pipe procurement, manufactured items like construction equipment? They reminded the Canadian side that Canadian labour and materials such as prefabricated housing had been used on the Trans-Alaska Pipeline. Would American labour be able to work on the Canadian line? An American delegate said he had heard that 74 percent of construction equipment for the line was to come from Canada but American exporters of such equipment had told him that Canadian industry has no such capability at present for construction of such equipment. Several American participants warned that such procurement action by Canada might endanger the whole project as support from both American industry and labour was needed. The American side urged a speedy passage of the Canadian legislation with no protracted debate over high Canadian content. The fear of another Arab embargo was voiced by some Americans. Canada was urged to develop, jointly with the United States, as much capacity as possible as soon as possible. A protracted debate in the Canadian Parliament would have a negative impact on the American perception of Canada.

In response, the Canadian side explained that politically the Canadian public had to be persuaded there was something for Canada in this pipeline; otherwise it might be perceived as just letting the US run a pipeline down with no benefit for Canada. From the first there had been clear-cut federal government intention to have a high Canadian content. In fact several Canadian delegates warned that if there were not a 90 percent Canadian content in the bill, there could be a long fillibuster in Parliament. The NDP's amendment in this regard would likely be specific. If the Americans were really nervous about prolonged debate, they should refrain from pressing the content issue. Also mentioned was the fact that the American content proposed for the Canadian portion of the line was more than double the Canadian content which the Americans had proposed for their portion of the line.

As for pipe procurement, the differences between the American preference for 48" high pressure pipe and a Canadian preference for 54" lower pressure pipe were reviewed. Canadians explained that if the 48" high pressure pipe were chosen, only one Canadian company had the present capability of producing it and this choice could delay the whole project by two years. On the other hand both Ipsco and Stelco, two Canadian steel companies, had the capability to build 54" pipe. In view of the fact that both Alberta and Saskatchewan each had 25 percent interest in Ipsco, the Canadian spokesman said it was almost inevitable that Ipsco would be involved. The National Energy Board would rule on the pipe sizes before the end of February but a compromise size of a 56" size pipe was thought likely. One Canadian participant said that since the Foothills Company had to build as cheaply as possible, he thought a certain portion of the pipe procurement should be open to Japanese or other offshore bidders in order to guarantee a healthy competitive atmosphere in the steel pipe bidding. However, the Canadian side underlined the established competitiveness of the Canadian steel industry in international terms.

The Kitimat Pipeline and Alternatives

In the context of the supply of Alaskan crude oil to American mid-west refineries to replace diminishing Canadian crude exports the American side expressed a keen interest in the development of Kitimat as an oil port especially in the wake of recent American legislative constraints placed on Cherry Point as a transshipment point. United States delegates pointed out that development of Kitimat would take pressures off Vancouver and Cherry Point and would certainly be the most economical way to route the oil to the mid-west.

In reply, the Canadian side recounted the strong opposition of west coast environmentalists, and fishermen to the project, and even a Cabinet Minister, had pronounced openly against it. Furthermore, before the National Energy Board could deal with the Kitimat application itself, it had been charged to make a prior study into the Canadian oil supply and demand situation for the next 10 to 15 years and would need to determine whether there was the need for a new oil import facility. This would take until late 1978 to complete. A Canadian delegate asked how the United States could suggest that a west coast oil port designed primarily to answer American needs should be located at Kitimat, an environmentally sensitive point 50 miles up a Canadian fiord, when the Magnusson amendment had recently sought to reduce the risks to the American shores of Puget Sound. He suggested that the US should give consideration to an oil port in the southern part of the Alaska Panhandle, perhaps at Wrangel, so that the producer state would itself take the environmental risks. An American participant rejected Wrangel as being one of the worst narrows on the west coast.

A proposal for hydro-electric power

An American senator outlined to the Committee a proposal for a joint Canada-US hydro-power generating scheme in the Alaskan Panhandle. The Dyea project would involve utilizing the head waters of the Yukon at tidewater for power generation and the power so generated would be divided between the two countries. The Committee decided that each delegation would bring this proposal to the attention of their respective authorities, with a view to further joint consultations on the proposal by technicians and other interested parties.

Gas to the East Coast: Tenneco project

In the discussion of the problems of the transport of liquefied natural gas (LNG) and the supply of gas to the US east coast from the Tenneco project near Saint John, New Brunswick, Canadian delegates said that the Canadian regulatory process, the National Energy Board, had approved this project on the Canadian side. However, the Americans explained that there were delays on their side related mainly to pricing of such gas. Would it be "rolled in" or incrementally priced? There was currently an impasse over Mexican gas pricing which was not unrelated. Furthermore, an American delegate was sceptical that Tenneco gas, which would be transported by pipeline from Saint John through to Maine and other northeastern markets would be able to compete in price with other eastern seaboard gas, for example from Savannah. In sum, there were American participants who were not at all certain that the Tenneco project would be proceeded with.

In view of the reduced likelihood of the Tenneco project, a Canadian delegate thought the feasibility of the Quebec and Maritime (Q and M) line was greater. It could be linked to the Arctic Pilot Project bringing Arctic gas to the east coast by sea. As to this latter project, a Canadian delegate pointed out that it did not require the huge proven reserves of gas that the Polar Gas pipeline would. Under the pilot project the gas would be liquefied on Melville Island and be transferred by LNG tankers down to regasification plants on the east coast.

Energy Conservation

Underlying the exchange of views on methods by which each country was seeking to conserve energy was the recognition by the legislators on both sides of the seriousness of the energy situation. At the same time there was an uncertainty as to what was the best way of achieving it, faced as both governments were by a public which appeared wedded to the automobile, and lifestyles which were so hard to change. Both sides, reviewed the differing goals and measures already in effect or in Congress, including the American Administration's current energy measures. The American side expressed interest in the Canadian insulation grant program and in the kit which helps consumers individually to assess their insulation needs. There was a difference of opinion between and within delegations as to whether higher gas prices, taxes on larger cars and other such incentives would reduce consumption and turn people to urban transit. Additional conservation measures mentioned were the increased use of coal; lower speed limits, the substitution of new energy forms such as solar heat or methanol, the encouragement by metering devices of hydro-electrical power at peak periods. There were differing views among American delegates as to whether President Carter's energy bill would get through with many "teeth" left in it. Since the United States had 40 percent of the world's coal, there would be incentives to convert to coal. This however had environmental disadvantages and could counter the pollution control requirements on cars.

Oil Storage

The American side stated that the Administration's appropriation of funds for the Strategic Petroleum Reserve Program had gone through and it would be enormously expensive. The two sites being looked at as possible oil storage on the Canadian east coast are at Canso in Nova Scotia and Bell Island, off Newfoundland, both deepwater ports. The two governments were currently undertaking a joint 90-day study of the feasibility of these sites as agreed to during Vice-President Mondale's visit. However, an American senator remarked that during a recent visit to Saudi Arabia he had found that the Saudi Arabia government was "not too impressed" by the strategic storage approach by the American government.

East Coast Tanker Traffic

On Eastport, an American delegate told the meeting that an Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) report on the refinery and a Corps of Engineers' report on navigation questions were still to be completed. He himself doubted that the Corps of Engineers' report would give the go-ahead in view of the fogs and narrowness of Head Harbour Passage. However, if these reports gave the green light, a bilateral problem would arise as to whether or not Canada had the legal right to regulate traffic through the passage. A Canadian delegate said Canada considered these waters to be internal waters over which Canada had the right to enact laws and regulations. He also made the point that the opposition to the use of the passage from large tankers comes not so much from environmentalists as from fishermen.

West Coast Tanker Traffic

Canadian delegates expressed concern that despite the progress which has been made in organizing passing lanes for tanker traffic in Juan de Fuca Strait and the establishment of the monitoring system, there have been several near collisions. Part of the problem was thought to be due to tankers of foreign registry manned by personnel who did not understand directions in English. The Committee agreed to a proposal to go on record as supporting the idea that pilots should be taken on board tankers further outside the entrance to the Strait in order to minimize the chance of accidents.

Air Pollution

The Canadian delegate initiating the discussion on air pollution drew the attention of the meeting to the growing seriousness of long-range transport of air pollutants—a problem which was becoming of transboundary concern in Europe as well as North America. Emissions, mainly of sulphur dioxide, can fall as acid rain and can have cumulative deleterious effects on soils, fish, forests and waters. Sulphur dioxide emissions in eastern North America were 24 million tons in 1976, of which 20 million came from US sources. By 1990 this could increase by as much as 28 per cent if measures including conservation are not instituted. In response, an American delegate said that the United States was conscious of the problem. He inquired why Canada had not yet reacted to the American proposal of November 1977 regarding international co-operation in this matter. The Canadian side told the Committee that Canada would shortly be proposing to the United States a joint research co-ordination group whose objective would be to institute a co-operative scientific study of the long-range transport of air pollutants. The delegates discussed a possible extension of the role of the International Joint Commission (IJC) to cover this aspect of air pollution. (The IJC already has an advisory capacity to the two governments on other transboundary air pollution matters). Canadian and American participants agreed to bring this question to the attention of their governments. A Canadian delegate reminded the group that in Canada a jurisdictional problem was involved in this question, as the regulatory authority for pollutants such as sulphur dioxide was provincial.

Atikokan

In answer to American concerns regarding the possible sulphur emissions on the Boundary Waters Canoe Area in Minnesota from the Ontario Hydro's coal generating plant at Atikokan, Canadian participants emphasized that the predicted emissions of SO<sub>2</sub> are far below those acceptable in the United States in any area except a pristine class I area. They made the points that low sulphur coal was being used in this project, that scientific studies on both sides had concluded there would be no injurious effects on the US from the plant's operations, that the emissions of the plant would be closely monitored and that there was sufficient design flexibility in the construction of the plant to allow for corrective action to be taken later if necessary.

Nevertheless, the American side considered that Atikokan presented a problem, particularly if viewed in a broader context. They pointed out that at a time when there was an emphasis on conversion from gas and oil to coal, this generating plant had been approved without scrubbers, and it could be just the first in a series of such new plants along the border. The cost for a scrubber for the Atikokan plant was estimated at $60 million, not overly expensive for remedying the emissions, an American delegate said. In the United States all new thermal generating plants were required to have scrubbers. There was no similar national policy in Canada, the delegates pointed out. With no federal mechanism of control in Canada in place, there could be troubles ahead at many other points. The problem should be resolved co-operatively, the American spokesman said. The Canadian side agreed to report this point of view back to the Canadian government.

Poplar River

There were exchanges of views on both the water quality and air pollution implications of the Saskatchewan Power Corporation's coal fired generating station on the East Poplar River near the Saskatchewan-Montana border.

During the discussion on water quality aspects, an American spokesman raised the question of the IJC's recent request to the Saskatchewan government for a moratorium on the project pending receipt by the IJC of the full documentation it had requested. The American side said Saskatchewan's attitude had been very difficult and its letter to the IJC had set a very unhelpful tone. Canadian participants said it was unfortunate the material had been so slow in being presented but they were informed that the IJC now had all the relevant data. Further, Saskatchewan had undertaken to meet the requirements of the Boundary Waters Treaty regarding pollution and the project would in fact improve the natural flow by maintaining a continuous flow of one cubic foot of water per second at the boundary plus furnishing an additional 300 acre-feet each year. The Canadian side pointed out that it could be difficult if the IJC did not now lift its moratorium request and the Saskatchewan government refused to accede to it. If Washington put pressure on Ottawa to lean on Saskatchewan in this connection the end result might only be to damage the authority of the IJC, an institution which had done so much constructive work. However, if there were an adverse IJC ruling on water quality the Canadian federal government would then have authority to act under the International River Improvements Act. In the meantime, it was urged by both sides that the two federal governments should try to arrive at a formula to overcome what is a political problem.

In respect to the air quality problem ensuing from the Poplar project, the American spokesman described the concerns of Montana in light of the prevailing winds which at this point are from north to south. He was concerned with the cumulative effects of the emissions and considered that Saskatchewan did not seem to be addressing itself to the air pollution question. The American Congressman suggested that there was a definite need for an air pollution treaty between the two countries.

The Canadian side pointed out that using all the "worst case" assumptions the predicted emissions from the initial installations would be well below the US threshold levels and result in no injurious effects in the US. A test burn had also borne this out. Only the first 300 megawatt unit (of a planned 1200 megawatt unit) was going into operation to begin with and emissions would be monitored carefully. The unit was designed to permit additional abatement equipment if necessary. It was understood that discussions were continuing at the official level on this issue. In connection with the suggestion for a bilateral air pollution treaty, a Canadian participant said he thought there was some interest in Canada in the idea though it might not be easy in view of the federal-provincial lines of jurisdiction.

Cornwall Island

The Canadian delegation drew the attention of the American side to a new independent study, issued a few days prior to the meeting, which conclude the fluoride emissions from the Reynolds Metals Company in Massena, N.Y. were likely to be of serious danger not only to the health of cattle and vegetation but also to humans on Cornwall Island in the St. Lawrence. While the emission controls put on the plant some years ago appeared to meet New York state standards, they breached the Canadian standards. The American participant whose legislative district was involved expressed concern and requested a copy of the independent study from the Canadian side.

Other transboundary air pollution issues along the border were referred to briefly during the meeting. These included the intention of Detroit to dispose of PCB's by incineration in an unused cement kiln. This project, a Canadian delegate said, had alarmed the citizens of Windsor, across the river, and while the procedure may turn out to be a safe way for PCB disposal, he considered that there should be a better system for bringing the public into the picture, for informing them of the facts and relevant details. He suggested that the IJC might be the logical body to perform this function and to reassure the public that their interests were being considered. The heavy emissions at Trail, B.C. and Sudbury, Ontario were also mentioned.

Great Lakes Water Quality

The American concern in respect to Great Lakes Water Quality centred on the pollution which Canada was allowing to enter the Great Lakes system from tributary rivers. Questions were asked as to why this was permitted under the current anti-pollution rules for water quality whereas in the United States anti-pollution regulations applied to the Great Lakes tributaries as well. For its part the Canadian side emphasized the somewhat differing approach taken by Canada to the clean-up of the lakes and tributary rivers. Tertiary treatment plants are not required where the extra cost was judged not to warrant it. Canadian participants referred to the progress which was being made by the American side in closing the gap between the two countries in their clean-up objectives under the 1962 Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement.

In answer to Canadian concerns raised by a recent press report that the US Administration had halved the EPA budget from $11 to $5 million for the Great Lakes clean-up, an American senator stated that the thought this funding would be restored before the year-end. However he suggested that there might be some linkage with progress on the Atikokan problem since the same people were interested on both sides.

Garrison Dam

The American spokesman on this subject reviewed the background of this transboundary water problem involving Manitoba and North Dakota and referred particularly to the more recent events including the IJC report and the suit brought by the Audubon Society against the US Department of the Interior—both in 1977. Just two days before the meetings, the US Department of the Interior had unveiled an alternative proposal considerably reducing the acreage involved in the project to 96,000 acres from 250,000. He considered this a success story of co-operation and consultation which could take place between the two countries including between legislators. He said it underlined the effectiveness of the IJC.

In reply, a Canadian delegate said that the Andrus plan was a definite improvement and he was pleased that the Souris Loop had been eliminated. However he still considered there were two concerns remaining for Canadians although he stated that there had been as yet no official Canadian position taken on these issues. First, the people of Manitoba and wildlife groups remained opposed to any transfer of water from the Missouri to the Hudson Bay systems. While a fish screen and sand filter has been included in the Andrus proposal, concern would remain until this method has been demonstrated to be absolutely effective. Secondly, there was provincial concern that construction of the Lonetree Reservoir was continuing when it did not seem to be required in such a reduced system. Would this large project serve as a leverage to enlarge the project in the future, it was asked, perhaps as a political trade-off? Was there a longer term purpose involved?

An American spokesman responded that he understood the foreign biota including fish would not reproduce in Manitoba water but the Canadian delegate said this had not been proven yet and the IJC had said it did not know the answer. The American side made the point that the reduced Andrus plan will require reauthorization in Congress.

Dickey-Lincoln Dam

An American delegate told the Committee that the reports of the engineering and environmental studies on this dam and transmission project on the upper Saint John River in Maine could be expected in August 1978. If the reports gave the go-ahead he said, the Corps of Engineers would want to proceed but the State Governor had some reservations as did other legislators. Appropriations might be difficult to obtain and there were clearly still a lot of hurdles. A treaty with Canada would be required eventually he said.

A Canadian spokesman mentioned the environmental disadvantage to Quebec and the down-river advantages to Canadian plants in New Brunswick of the project. While there were some short-term employment possibilities in the project, he suggested that there was a long-range potential for both countries in the creation of an international park or wildlife facility along the St Francis River which would be symbolic of international co-operation and would provide permanent employment. It would also be likely to gain the support of environmentalists who might otherwise oppose the project. The American spokesman commented that he had heard the Corps of Engineers' chief also mention such a project. The Canadian participant also questioned whether in fact the final arrangement on the matter between the two countries should be reached by referral to the IJC or by treaty.

Two other transboundary water topics were discussed more briefly. A Canadian delegate referred to the Richelieu-Champlain project designed to regulate flooding in the Richelieu River-Lake Champlain area in Quebec and Vermont. After investigation an IJC board has reported and recommended a new gated structure at St-Jean Quebec which, he said, should satisfy both the concerns of the environmentalists and those who were concerned about flood control. A coal mining project in British Columbia affecting the Flathead River in Montana was raised briefly by the Canadian side. The development plan for this project requires B.C. environmental impact statements. There has been a delay in getting information for these studies from the company as the whole project seemed to be in a holding pattern at the moment. A Montana Congressman has been pushing to have the matter referred to the IJC, the Canadian participant pointed out.

Addendum

US Funding of the International Joint Commission

On several occasions throughout the meetings and in the opening plenary session, the American delegation referred to a recent development in Washington regarding increased improved funding of the American side of the International Joint Commission. There was a feeling on the American side, the American Co-Chairman told the plenary, that Canada was doing more than its share in this body and that the American side needed to be more effective and quicker in its performance. Accordingly, the United States General Accounting Office had issued on February 8, 1978, a report entitled "How the United States Can and Should Improve its Funding of the International Joint Commission Activities". This report recommended, first, that a separate fund be established to finance studies undertaken by the IJC, and secondly, that the direct funding of the Commission should be in the Department of State's budget and not in a number of other federal agency budgets. One delegate said that the American co-chairman of the Canada-US Inter-parliamentary Group intended to use the State Department Authorization bill to push this report forward.

Closing Plenary

The plenary began with brief reports on the work of each of the three committees, followed by direct questions from the floor relating to each report. For the first time this year the reports were limited to the major issues which emerged in the committee sessions.

A Canadian delegate commented on the evolving attitude of Canada toward the United States. The generally-accepted notion in the post-war years of a special relationship between the two countries had been replaced following the Nixon economic measures by the concept of the Third Option, involving an effort to develop more intensive relations with the European Community and Japan. But the countries of North America inevitably continued to treat each other differently than they treated other countries. Even U.S. relations with Mexico were different from those with Canada in that the level of common trade was much lower and the two countries did not share a common language. So Canada and the United States remained ultimately interconnected and more and more the issues of mutual importance were ones where Congress had major responsibilities. At next year's meeting attention should be given to the special problem caused by the natural instinct of legislatures to generalize their actions, with the result that Canada was usually most affected by Congressional moves. What were the possibilities for developing specific arrangements between the two countries which would be consistent with GATT obligations?

An American delegate commented that he had been impressed by what he had learned of Canada's difficulties as a result of U.S. extraterritorial actions, mentioning in particular the anti-trust action in the field of uranium marketing. A Canadian asked if the U.S. delegation might be prepared to express their common concern to the responsible authorities in the U.S. executive branch. An American suggested that Congress was not listened to by the Administration and that Canadian representations on this issue should be direct. Another Canadian responded that the Attorney-General was bound by U.S. law, and that only Congress could change the law. It was Canada's view that U.S. policy could not be imposed abroad in foreign jurisdictions by American courts but rather had to be negotiated on a government to government basis.

Another American noted that the Group now had an "early warning" system and that it had been activated on the convention tax issue, although the appropriate time for representations had not yet come. This led another American to mention how little contact he and his colleagues had with the Canadian Embassy, in contrast with European representatives who were constantly making representations on matters of national concern where congressional action was involved. It was often too late if the Embassy relied on the executive branch to convey information. At this point, three U.S. participants successively referred to the close and effective contact they had maintained with the British Embassy, each mentioning that Mr. Drower has been helpful to them on numerous occasions. A Canadian participant referred to the last report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs on Canadian relations with the United States, which had urged a more vigorous posture by the Canadian Embassy vis-à-vis Congress. He was pleased to have confirmation that contacts with the Embassy were welcomed by Congressmen.

Another Canadian raised the question of the Middle East, wondering if the time had not come for the United States to put pressure on Israel to reach a settlement. A couple of Congressmen responded that President Carter could not take sides if he were to be a successful mediator. There were signs of flexibility in the Middle East and it was better to let events develop naturally.

Follow up action by the Delegation

In addition to circulating the Report to all members of the Association and to tabling it in the Senate in the course of a debate on the New Orleans meeting, the delegation drew a number of conclusions to the attention of responsible Canadian ministers.

The following Minister and officials received copies of the Report with a request that they take note of certain specific conclusions.

Hon. Don. Jamieson
Secretary of State for External Affairs

Committee II

—convention tax legislation

Committee III

—placing pilots on board tankers further outside the Juan de Fuca Strait

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY
GROUP, NEW ORLEANS, FEBRUARY 9-13, 1978

Opening Address by Senator Dan Lang, Canadian Co-Chairman

It would be unwise for me to say much about our domestic affairs because each Member of the Canadian delegation will have a different view of our problems. I suggest that the variety of opinions and the complexity of the issues will be well brought out through discussion in our Committees. Accordingly, I will confine myself to a few general observations.

There are two major problems in Canada at this time—one is economic and the other is political and both are interconnected. On the economic side, no country in the world is in very good shape at this moment. In a number of respects, however, the Canadian situation is more unsatisfactory than yours in the United States. A few facts may help bring this out.

The average rate of unemployment in Canada has reached 8.5 (seasonally adjusted), and it is much higher in many of the poorer regions of the country.

Inflation last year in Canada had risen to an average of 9.5 per cent. Although our Anti-Inflation Board had been quite successful in 1976, our inflation rate went up instead of down. In 1977, as a result of the depreciation of the Canadian dollar, there were some major commodity disasters, and our decision to let domestic oil prices rise gradually toward the world level.

We had a lower rate of real growth last year than you did—2.5 per cent in Canada as compared to about 5 per cent in the United States.

Our consumer spending was down in 1977; however, our exports were up.

Our trade balance was favourable, but for the third year in a row we had a current account deficit of about $4.5 billion. This would be comparable to annual deficits on current account of about $50 billion for you. Over $4 billion of this 4.5 billion Canadian deficit has been with the United States. It comprises a tourist deficit with you of $1 billion this year—due in no small measure to our overly zestful winter. Your recent restrictions on convention expenses hasn't helped this problem. We must also continue to make large payments on past borrowings and large payments arising out of United States investments in our country.

I could go on at some length, but I have given you enough to show, I hope, what whatever problems you have, ours are more acute.

This economic picture is far from a good environment in which to deal with our constitutional problems.

The Quebec situation is as uncertain as it was when we met nine months ago. No date has been chosen for a Quebec referendum on separation from Canada. Public opinion polls taken in Quebec indicate that the separatists—that is, those who really want separation—are still in a small minority. However, referenda are tricky and unpredictable political instruments at best, particularly when their management is in the hands of a government and party dedicated to bringing about one of the options to be voted upon. The major opposition party in that province has yet to choose a new leader, which it intends to do in April. So from these few words you may deduce the cloud of constitutional and political uncertainty that hangs over Quebec and disperses over the rest of the country.

Constitutional tensions in Canada are not limited to Quebec. As you may be aware your Vice-President and a former Senate colleague, Mr. Mondale, (accompanied by my co-chairman Senator Hathaway) went on to Alberta following a recent visit to Ottawa. Mr. Mondale has known Premier Lougheed for a number of years, but I think he discovered that Premier Lougheed is a tough defender of his province's interests. He underlined to your Vice-President that a decision by the federal government to export gas to the United States depends on his government's prior agreement. This situation illustrates some of the tensions which exist elsewhere in the Canadian federation.

Taken together our economic problems and constitutional crises today form the background of our concerns regarding trends in relations with the United States.

To strike a happier note let it be said that in many respects our relations have rarely been better. Your President has demonstrated a determination to develop a real entente cordial, with the neighbours of the United States and in this he has been very successful. Vice-President Mondale, whose forebearers came from Western Ontario, has—but not for that reason—participated enthusiastically in this effort. Both men have established a close personal relationship with our Prime Minister. These relationships have in turn set standards which penetrate both governments. It is not an exaggeration to say that relations are very good with every prospect of improving still.

There have also been in the past year some notable achievements in the field of intergovernmental negotiations. These will have beneficial consequences for relations between our two countries for decades to come.

One of these has been the agreement regarding the gas pipeline from Alaska to the mid-west and north-west. While many difficulties remain to be resolved, what is important is that the mutual interests of our two countries have been reconciled in what may become the largest private construction program in history. There are also good prospects for making arrangements to increase deliveries of gas to the United States in exchange for commitments to supply us with equivalent quantities of Alaska gas when the pipeline is completed. Another joint transportation arrangement, the St. Lawrence Seaway, has also been the subject of an agreement which we regard as most important, namely, raising tolls so that the system pays its own way.

Perhaps even more important, though less attention has been directed to it, has been the negotiations aimed at defining the four maritime boundaries between our two countries now that we have both established regimes out to the 200 mile limit. Although some difficult problems remain to be resolved, the negotiators have devised some imaginative solutions to our conflicting claims and there appears to be determination on both sides to reach an agreement. This would be a major achievement, for even among the best of friends, territorial differences can arouse strong passions. If and when our respective administrations reach agreement, I trust the resultant treaty will be supported in every respect within the Canadian Parliament and more importantly in the United States Congress and that the overall national interests and the importance of our bilateral relations will transcend parochial concerns.

If I stopped here, you might conclude that relations are in such shape that we call off our business session schedules for these two days and enjoy ourselves. But I must go on, as I see a number of difficulties looming on the horizon. I want to speak frankly about some of them, particularly because you—the Members of Congress—will be dealing specifically with these problems.

I have told you about some of our economic worries. We also know about yours. Indeed, most of our western world has similar problems to a greater or lesser degree. We are all concerned that these industrialized countries collectively and individually respond in a constructive way to internal domestic pressures to protect their economies and the jobs of their workers. The MTN talks in Geneva take on a new and heightened significance in this climate.

From this perspective, I would like to draw your attention to some United States protective actions, all based on powers conferred on the President by Congress and in some instances providing for Congressional review of the President's actions.

As Canadians, our grave concern is over actions taken by United States authorities to protect American interests against the actions of specific countries. These actions are through law clothed in general and overall terms and as a result may inadvertently damage us more than the countries for which the protection was really devised in the first place.

Let me illustrate what I mean with a few examples.

You have a steel reference price system which triggers an anti-dumping investigation. Your formula involves the cost of an efficient and low cost producer in Japan plus freight and other charges to various points in the United States. Canadian steel producers are well known as efficient and low cost producers but they are not in Japan but right on your back doorstep across the Great Lakes. In other words selling our steel into the United States at our domestic price plus the relatively small transport charges involved could automatically subject our steel exports to an anti-dumping investigation whereas in fact there has been no dumping—certainly not in the ordinary sense of that word.
